

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

1916 C.

DIBBLE ET AL.

CURRIER.

Georgia Supreme Court—December 18, 1914.

142 Ga. 855; 83 S. E. 949.

Wills — Testamentary Capacity — Monomania.

A caveat to the propounding of a will alleged that the testatrix made an unfortunate marriage; that her husband deserted her, and she obtained a divorce from him; that she brooded so much over the unhappy events and outcome of the marriage that her mind became unbalanced and incapable of ratiocination with reference to it and events associated with it or arising from it; that, under an insane delusion with reference to the relationship and the continuation of the affection between herself and her heirs at law, she sought to have her former husband killed or maimed by them, and, because of their refusal to comply with such request, she became imbued with the hallucination that they were not of her blood or family, were not related to her, and were not entitled to her affection and treatment as kinsmen; that she became possessed of an insane delusion that she was disgraced in the eyes of the community by her relatives, because they would not maim or kill her former husband; that she was mistaken as to their condemning her or not sympathizing with her, and in believing that they did not condemn her former husband; that they assured her of that fact, but she was possessed of the insane hallucination that nothing short of the maiming of her former husband would relieve her of the supposed contempt in which she thought she was held because of her unfortunate marital experience and because her heirs at law refused to comply with her request; and that, because her heirs at law refused to violate the law at her demand, under the influence of said insane delusion, she conceived and maintained a wholly insane and mistaken idea as to their conduct in the matter and as to their relations and feelings toward her; and that this delusion existed prior to and at the time of the making of the will and caused her to make it, leaving a large part of her property to different charities, instead of to her next of kin. It is held that such allegations sufficiently averred monomania to withstand a demurrer. [See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Allegations to the effect that the testatrix desired to have her male relatives maim or kill her former husband, and to have her female relatives urge them so to do, that because they refused to do so she believed that she was disgraced in the eyes of the community by them, and that they did not sympathize with her but with her former husband, and were prompted thereby in refusing her request, and that this constituted a mistake of fact as to the conduct of the heirs at law, were subject to demurrer. Such allegations amounted only to alleging erroneous inferences or conclusions drawn by the testatrix from their refusal to comply with her illegal request.

"Monomania," within Civ. Code 1910, § 3840, providing that a monomaniac may make a will in no way resulting from the mania, is a mental disease; not merely the unreasonable conduct of a sane person. It is a species of insanity. "Mania" is a form of insanity accompanied by more or less excitement which sometimes amounts to fury. An "insane delusion," such as will deprive a person of testamentary capacity, is the delusion which exists when a person conceives something extravagant to exist which has no existence whatever, and is incapable of being permanently reasoned out of that conception.

Mistake of Fact.

A "mistake of fact" such as under Civ. Code 1910, § 3836, will nullify in part the operation of a will is a mistake arising from mere ignorance, and not one resulting from an error of judgment after investigation, or wilful failure to make a proper investigation by means of which the truth could be readily and surely ascertained.

[856] LUMPKIN, J.—A will was propounded and a caveat filed by the heirs of the decedent. The case was carried from the court of ordinary to the superior court by appeal. The grounds of the caveat as amended, which set up monomania and mistake of fact on the part of the testatrix, were stricken on demurrer, and a verdict for the propounder was directed. The case turns on the striking of the grounds of the caveat.

1. The medico-legal discussions of monomania as distinguished from prejudice, animosity, ill will, bad judgment, drawing conclusions from insufficient premises or erroneous conclusions from facts—all of which may coexist with sanity—are often apt to confuse rather than enlighten the lay mind, and sometimes the professional mind. Our code recognizes such a thing as monomania as affecting testamentary capacity. Civil Code (1910) § 3840. But it means a mental disease, not merely the unreasonable conduct of a sane person. It is a species of insanity. Mania is a form of insanity [857] accompanied by more or less excitement, which sometimes amounts to fury. The person so affected is subject to hallucinations and delusions, and is impressed with the reality of events which have never occurred and things which do not exist, and his actions are more or less in conformity with his belief in these particulars. Hall v. Unger, 4 Sawy. 672, 2 Abb. 507, 11 Fed. Cas. No. 5,949. This mania may extend to all objects; or it may be confined to one or a few objects, in which latter case it is called monomania. It is not every delusion which will deprive one of testamentary capacity. It must be an insane delusion. A definition of such a delusion which has been approved by this court is that it exists wherever a person conceives something extravagant to exist which has no existence whatever, and he is incapable of being permanently reasoned out of that conception. Bohler v. Hicks, 120 Ga. 800, 804, 48 S. E. 306. The subject-matter of the insane delusion must have no foundation in fact, and must spring from a diseased condition of mind. It does not mean merely a mistaken conclusion from a given state of facts, nor a mistaken belief of a sane mind as to the existence of facts. Probably all men believe some things on slight evidence or that which is insufficient to prove the facts with any degree of certainty. But a bad reasoner, even one wanting in ordinary discernment or discrimination, is not necessarily insane. All men make some mistakes, and some men make almost constant mistakes. But this alone does not constitute insanity. Who is devoid of some prejudice? Some men are full of prejudices, and are largely governed by their likes and dislikes, often with little or no proper basis. But if mistakes, prejudices or dislikes, though unjust, would suffice to show insanity, how many men could make a will?

One who investigated the subject of spiritualism and became convinced and believed in it, though apparently on spurious or insufficient evidence, was held not to be a monomaniac for that reason. Middleditch v. Williams, 45 N. J. Eq. 726, 17 Atl. 826, 4 L.R.A. 738. Mere jealous suspicious, though groundless, are not enough. The test to distinguish between a delusion used in the sense of a mistake of fact, and a delusion which is the offspring of a deranged mind, is thus stated by Mr. Justice Evans in Bohler v. Hicks, supra: "The latter springs spontaneously from disordered intellect, while the former is the result of an erroneous conclusion based upon either a mistake of fact or an illogical deduction drawn [858] from facts as they really exist." Again he says: "The very name 'monomania' implies partial insanity and excludes the idea of any sort of ratiocination as to the particular subject to which the partial insanity relates. Monomania cannot be implied because a person takes a narrow, or prejudiced, or utterly illogical view of a particular subject." Tested by these views, how stands the case before us? The allegations on this subject, contained in the caveat as amended, were in substance as follows: The testatrix married one Garner, with whom she lived very unhappily, and from whom she was divorced after he had deserted her. She brooded over the unhappy events and outcome of her marriage, "and so brooded and worried over the same that her mind became unbalanced and incapable of ratiocination with reference to said marriage, and events associated, or arising therefrom, and especially with reference to relationship and the continuation of the affection between herself and said heirs at law; that, seized by said insane delusion, the said deceased, Barbara C. Dodd, sought the death or maiming of the said Garner, and requested the said heirs at law that they would maim or kill the said Garner; and, because of their refusal, and failure to comply with such insane request, she stated and became imbued with the hallucination that said heirs at law who refused to comply with her said insane desires were not of her blood or family, were not related to her, and were not entitled to her affection and treatment as kinsmen; that said insane delusion had no foundation in fact, but sprang from the diseased condition of her intellect, and was the inducing cause of the exclusion of said heirs at law from the benefits of said pretended will, which is therefore inoperative and void as to them." It was also alleged that this condition existed prior to and at the time of the making of the will, and continued until the death of the testatrix. In an amendment it was alleged, that her marital troubles rendered the testatrix insane on all subjects connected with her marital experiences; that she was irrational whenever she acted under the influences thereof; that she became possessed of an insane delusion that she was disgraced in the eyes of the community by her relatives, because they would not assail Garner and either permanently maim him in some physical manner or kill him, and that their failure to do this was due to their condemning her in the matter, and placed her in a disgraced position before the community and the public; that she was entirely [859] mistaken in this matter, and that they assured her of their sympathy and condemnation of Garner, but she was possessed of the insane hallucination that nothing short of a physical maiming of him at their hands would relieve her of the supposed contempt in which she thought she was held; that, under the influence of this insane delusion and insane and irrational dislike and hatred for the caveators, she conceived and maintained a wholly insane and mistaken idea as to their conduct, and as to their relations and feelings toward her; and that this delusion caused the testatrix to make the will.

We think that the averments of the caveat measured up to the requirements laid down in Bohler v. Hicks, supra. The allegations that the mind of the testatrix became unbalanced and incapable of reasoning with reference to her marriage and the events associated with or arising from it, that she became imbued with the hallucination that her heirs, who refused to comply with her insane desires, were not of her blood or family, were not related to her, and were not entitled to her affection or treatment as kinsmen, go beyond allegations of prejudice, passion, illogical reasoning, unfounded suspicion or the like, and set up an actually diseased condition of the mind, and delusions arising therefrom, —in other words, partial insanity or monomania. These allegations are of course to be treated as true for the purpose of the demurrer: and so treating them, it was error to sustain the demurrer as against them. Whether in fact there were insane delusions springing spontaneously from a disordered intellect, or merely erroneous conclusions based upon a mistake of fact, or illogical deductions from actual facts, groundless suspicion, or unjust dislikes or prejudices, will be for determination of the jury, under the evidence adduced at the trial. All that is now held is that the allegations in regard to monomania should not have been stricken on demurrer.

2. Another ground of the caveat was based on the allegation that the testatrix, in making the will, was governed by a mistake of fact. On this subject the caveators alleged in substance as follows: Prior to the making of the will the testatrix had contracted a marriage with one Garner, which resulted unhappily. He deserted her for another woman. She labored under the mistake that she was disgraced in the eyes of the community by her relatives, because they would not assail and either permanently maim him in some physical manner or kill him, and that their failure to do [860] so was due to their condemning her in the matter, and placed her in a disgraced position before the community and public. She sought to have her male heirs to make such an attack, and her female heirs to insist that the male heirs should do so. She was entirely mistaken as to their condemning her, or as to their not sympathizing with her, and also in believing that they did not condemn Garner. They did condemn him and did not blame her. She falsely believed that, in refusing to maim or kill Garner, they were prompted by, or their conduct was the result of, an approval by them of him and a condemnation of her. This mistake existed prior to the making of the will, and up to the time of the death of the testatrix, and caused her to make the will.

These allegations were insufficient to show a mistake of fact. They set out, in effect, that the testatrix had been deserted by her husband; that she sought to have her relatives wreak vengeance upon him by killing or maiming him; and that, because they did not comply with her request on that subject, she drew the erroneous conclusion that they did not sympathize with her but with her husband, and that this conduct on their part disgraced her before the community. It was not a case of failure to know the basal facts, or of a mistake in regard to any act or conduct. Her conclusion, from the refusal of her relatives to commit violence at her request, that their sentiments were hostile to her, may have been illogical or unsound. But this did not amount to a mistake of fact in a legal sense. It is an every-day occurrence that some person asks a favor of another, and, if refused, declares that the latter person is not his friend. This may be a mistake in reasoning from facts, but does not itself constitute a mistake of fact in the legal acceptance of the term. As was declared in Young v. Mallory, 110 Ga. 12, 35 S. E. 278:

"There is a difference between a 'mistake' arising from mere ignorance and one which results from an error of judgment after investigation or from negligence or wilful failure to make a proper investigation by means of which the truth could be readily and surely ascertained. It is to such a mistake as that first indicated that section 3262 [now § 3836] applies." That section declares that "A will executed under a mistake of fact as to the existence or conduct of the heirs at law of the testator is inoperative, so far as such heir at law is concerned, but the testator shall be deemed to have died intestate as to him." In the case just cited, [861] a testator knew that a certain woman claimed to be his niece and nearest of kin, and that she was the daughter of his deceased brother. The testator stated that he had been informed that she was not his niece, and he came to the conclusion that this was true. It was held that this did not amount to a mistake of fact, although he may have come to a wrong conclusion. In Bohler v. Hicks, supra, the mistake of fact alleged was that the testator falsely supposed that his wife advised or attempted to procure another to kill him, and also that he falsely believed that acts of kindness on her part toward one Bohler were the result of improper intimacy between her and such person. In Franklin v. Belt, 130 Ga. 37, 60 S. E. 146, the mistake of fact alleged was that the testatrix falsely believed that her husband intended to deprive her of the possession, custody, and control of her infant daughter. It will readily be seen that such mistakes of fact differ from that sought to be set up in the present case, where the testatrix endeavored to induce her heirs at law to commit an act of violence, and, upon their refusal to comply with her request, inferred or believed that they were not in sympathy with her but with the person whom she sought to have injured. This ground of the caveat was properly stricken on demurrer.

Judgment affirmed in part, and reversed in part. All the Justices concur, except Fish, C. J., absent.

IV. Influence of Delusion on Testamentary Disposition, 19.

I. Generally.

Though a testator has general testamentary capacity, comprehending the natural objects of his bounty, the nature and extent of his estate, and the disposition which he wishes to make of it, if he is at the time of making his will subject to an insane delusion as to a relative who would in the ordinary course of events be one of the beneficiaries of his will, and is controlled or materially influenced by that delusion, the will is invalid. Taylor v. McClintock, 87 Ark. 243, 112 S. W. 405; Layer v. Layer, 110 Ky. 542, 62 S. W. 15; Swygart v. Willard, 166 Ind. 25, 76 N. E. 755; Trumbull v. Gibbons, 22 N. J. L. 117; In re Forman, 54 Barb. (N. Y.) 274; Colhoun v. Jones, 2 Redf. (N. Y.) 34. And see the cases cited throughout this note. This view, admitted under the stress of extreme facts in the case of Dew v. Clark, 1 Add. Ecc. (Eng.) 279, 3 Add. Ecc. 79, is now universally upheld. Thus in Rivard v. Rivard, 109 Mich. 98, 66 N. W. 681, 63 Am. St. Rep. 566, it was said: "If a testator disinherits a daughter upon the belief that she is a bad woman or that she is not his own offspring, or a son upon the belief that he is a drunkard, or his grandchildren upon the belief that his son-in-law has threatened to kill him, and it appears that there is no foundation in fact for any such beliefs, and they are shown to be mere delusions, a will disinheriting such children and grandchildren is void, notwithstanding he was entirely sane upon every other subject, and fully competent to manage his business affairs. Justice Cooley makes the distinction clear in his able opinion in Fraser v. Jennison, at page 231 [42 Mich.] 'When the monomania is conceded, it is only necessary to inquire further whether the provisions of the will are or are not affected by it, and the will stands or falls by that test. [Citing a large number of authorities.] A man may believe himself to be the Supreme Ruler of the Universe, and nevertheless make a perfectly sensible disposition of his property; and the courts will sustain it, when it appears that his mania did not dictate its provisions.' The converse of the proposition is true,—that where the monomania or delusion does dictate its provisions, and results in the disinheritance of the subjects of the delusion, whom he would otherwise remember in his will, it cannot stand." So in American Seamen's Friend Soc. v. Hopper, 33 N. Y. 619, it was said: "If a person persistently believes supposed facts, which have no real existence, except in his perverted imagination, and against all evidence and probability, and conducts himself, however logically, upon the assumption of their existence, he is, so far as they are concerned, under a morbid delusion; and delusion in that sense is insanity. Such a person is essentially mad or insane on those subjects, though on other subjects he may reason, act and speak like a sensible man." Similarly in Matter of Mintzer, 5 Phila. (Pa.) 206, 20 Leg. Int. 380, the court said: "It is further to be observed, that a will made under the influence of delusion, which amounts in fact to a monomania, will be invalid. If a testator entertains against his own flesh and blood some monomaniacal delusion, and because of the existence of this delusion, and while laboring under its effects, he disinherits them, the act is evidently one for which he would not be morally or legally responsible; it is the act of a man laboring under a specific species of insanity, and the testator is not and cannot be deemed to be a rational being—he is not a free agent." In like manner it was said in the case of In re Segur, 71 Vt. 224, 44 Atl. 842: "Evidence of delusions is not necessarily countervailed by evidence of business capacity as to ordinary business transactions. The fact that a man is capable of transacting business, whatever its extent, or however complicated it may be, and however considerable the powers of intellect it may require, does not exclude the idea of his being of unsound mind. . . . To have the capacity to make a will, a man must be able to know the number of his children, or others, dependent upon his bounty, their deserts with reference to conduct and capacity, as well as need, and what he has before done for them relatively to each other, and the amount and condition of his property. . . . If he has an insane delusion in respect to one of his children, or other natural object of his bounty, and the instrument presented for probate is the product of such insane delusion, it is void, because he has not the testamentary capacity the law requires, and this is so, notwithstanding he may have had capacity to trade, and do all kinds of business, not involving such delusion." In the case of In re Ganson, 2 Misc. 329, 21 N. Y. S. 960, it was said: "In order to invalidate a will it is not necessary that the intellect should be in total eclipse and oblivion, or that the testator should be generally insane. There is a partial insanity, and a total insanity. Such partial insanity may exist as respects particular persons, things, or subjects, while as to others the person may not be destitute of the use of reason. A person may have upon some subjects, and even generally, mind and memory, and sense to know and apprehend ordinary transactions, and yet upon the subject of those who would naturally be the objects of his care and bounty, and the reasonable and proper disposition to them of his estate, he may be of unsound mind. In this case we think it clear that he was a monomaniac in respect to his wife's fidelity, and as to the disease which he claimed she had communicated to him. Monomania is a perversion of the understanding in regard to a single object, or a small number of objects, with the predominance of mental excitement; while mania is a condition in which the perversion of the understanding embraces all kinds of objects, and is accompanied with general mental excitement." So in Stanton v. Wetherwax, 16 Barb. (N. Y.) 259, it was said: "A monomaniac may make a valid will, where the provisions of the will are entirely unconnected with, and of course uninfluenced by, the particular delusion. But where there is good reason to believe that the will is the offspring of that particular delusion which has seized his mind, and controls its operations, the rule is otherwise. A will thus made, under the influence of a powerful delusion which has not only impaired but perverted his judgment and understanding in relation to subjects connected with the provisions of the will, so as to exercise a controlling influence in the disposition of his property, is not the will of a testator of sound mind. His mind is unsound quoad the very subject on which he is called to exercise its powers, in making the will."

II. What Constitutes Delusion.

1. IN GENERAL.

Substantially every definition of an insane delusion is based in substance on the language of Sir John Nichol, in the great case of Dew v. Clark, 1 Add. Ecc. (Eng.) 279, 3 Add. Ecc. 79, wherein it was said: "Wherever the patient once conceives something extravagant to exist, which still has no existence whatever but in his own heated imagination, and wherever at the same time, having so conceived, he is incapable of being, or at least of being permanently reasoned out of the conception, such a patient is said to be under a delusion, in a peculiar, half technical sense of the term, and in the absence or presence of delusion, so understood, forms, in my judgment, the true and only test or criterion of present or absent insanity." In Boughton v. Knight, 6 Meak 349, Sir John Hannen adopted the foregoing definition and expressed the belief that it would solve most if not all of the difficulties which arise in investigations of this kind. In Banks v. Goodfellow, L. R. 5. Q. B. 580, Cockburn, C. J. said: "When delusions exist which have no foundation in reality and spring only from a diseased and morbid condition of the mind, to that extent the mind must necessarily be taken to be unsound." In American Seamen's Friend Soc. v. Hopper, 33 N. Y. 624, it was said: "If a person persistently believes supposed facts which have no real existence except in his perverted imagination, and against all evidence and probability, and conducts himself, however logically, upon the assumption of their existence, he is, so far as they are concerned, under a morbid delusion; and delusion in that sense is insanity." In Middle-ditch v. Williams, 45 N. J. Eq. 726, 17 Atl. 826, 4 L.R.A. 738, Van Vleet, vice ordinary, said: "According to these definitions, it is only a delusion or conception which springs up spontaneously in the mind of a testator, and is not the result of extrinsic evidence of any kind that can be regarded as furnishing evidence that his mind is diseased or unsound: in other words, that he is subject to insane delusions. If, without evidence of any kind, he imagines or conceives something to exist which does not in fact exist, and which no rational person would in the absence of evidence believe to exist, then it is manifest that the only way in which his irrational belief can be accounted for is that it is the product of mental disorder. Delusions of this kind can be accounted for upon no reasonable theory except that they are the creations of the mind in which they originate." In Friedersdorf v. Lacy, 173 Ind. 429, 90 N. E. 766, it was said: "An insane delusion is a spontaneous conception and acceptance of that as a fact which has no existence except in the imagination and which is persistently believed in against all evidence and probability." In the case of In re Calef, 139 Cal. 678, 73 Pac. 539, an insane delusion was said to be the spontaneous and firmly fixed belief of a diseased mind which no argument or evidence can overthrow and which a rational mind could not entertain. In the case of In re Scott, 128 Cal. 57, 60 Pac. 527, it was said: "In ordinary language, a person is said to be under a delusion who entertains a false belief or opinion which he has been led to form by reason of some deception or fraud, but it is not every false or unfounded opinion which is in legal phraseology a delusion, nor is every delusion an insane delusion. If the belief or opinion has no basis in reason or probability, and is without any evidence in its support, but exists without any process of reasoning, or is the spontaneous offspring of a perverted imagination, and is adhered to against all evidence and argument, the delusion may be truly called insane; but if there is any evidence, however slight or inconclusive, which might have a tendency to create the belief, such belief is not a delusion. One cannot be said to act under an insane delusion if his condition of mind results from a belief or inference, however irrational or unfounded, drawn from facts which are shown to exist." See to the same effect. Morgan v. Morgan, 30 App. Cas. (D. C.) 436, 13 Ann. Cas. 1037. In Bohler v. Hicks, 120 Ga. 800, 48 S. E. 306, the court said: "The very name 'monomania' implies partial insanity and excludes the idea of any sort of ratiocination as to the particular subject to which the partial insanity relates. Monomania cannot be implied because a person takes a narrow, or prejudiced, or utterly illogical view of a particular subject. . . . It is not the result of any conclusion; the person does not arrive at his conviction because of any attempt either at reasoning or investigation; the partial insanity is the offspring of a disordered intellect." And see the reported case.

The essence of an insane delusion is that it has no basis in reason and cannot be dispelled by reason. Merrill v. Rolston, 5 Redf. (N. Y.) 220. In re Tracy, 46 Hun 675, 11 N. Y. St. Rep. 103. So it was said in Barr v. Sumner (Ind.) 107 N. E. 675: "Of course, there may be a belief, the falsity of which cannot be disproved by evidence, such as, for example, the supposed appearance of an angel to a testator, at night, when alone. Here, however, we are dealing with a mistake that could be disproved by evidence, and with a belief of the existence of a thing neither inherently impossible nor improbable. There was no evidence presented to testatrix of the mistake in her belief, nor was there resort to argument or persuasion to convince her of its falsity." Similarly in the case of In re Kendrick, 130 Cal. 360, 62 Pac. 605, it was said: "Finally, as to each and all of these alleged delusions, it does not appear that any of them were dominant ideas in the mind of Mrs. Kendrick. They were not always nor constantly referred to when Mrs. Masterson was under consideration, and very many witnesses never heard any such expressions from her. It is a characteristic of monomania and insane delusion that when the conversation turns upon the subject, the patient is dominated by it and cannot conceal his conviction."

2. ILLOGICAL OR UNREASONABLE CONCLUSION AS TO RELATIVE FROM FACTS.

Since the accepted definitions require that a belief shall, to be an insane delusion, arise spontaneously in the mind of the testator, a belief existing as a conclusion of the testator from facts is not such a delusion though the conclusion is illogical and the facts are insufficient to give it reasonable support. Taylor v. McClintock, 87 Ark. 243, 112 S. W. 405; In re Scott, 128 Cal. 57, 60 Pac. 527; In re Kendrick, 130 Cal. 360, 62 Pac. 605; Young v. Malloy, 110 Ga. 10; Bauchens v. Davis, 229 Ill. 557, 82 N. E. 365; Rush v. And see infra this note subdivision III. Unfounded Belief as to Particular Matter. "An insane delusion does not mean a mistaken conclusion from a given state of facts, nor a mistaken belief as to the existence of facts. An erroneous conclusion of a sane person may arise from incorrect reasoning or from a deduction from information which he supposed to be correct." Bohler v. Hicks, 120 Ga. 800, 48 S. E. 306. In Morgan v. Morgan, 30 App. Cas. (D. C.) 436, 13 Ann. Cas. 1037, it was said respecting an alleged delusion that a child of the testator was illegitimate: "The facts developed in that suit appear to have convinced the testator that he was not the father of the youngest child, and to have tended to raise some doubt in his mind as to the paternity of the two older ones. Then the evidence of his declarations made it to appear that he claimed to have acquired further information, relating to earlier misconduct of their mother, by which he was led to disclaim their paternity also. The source and nature of this information were declared to two persons. The information might have been false, and he might have been largely induced to give credit to it by the undoubted fact of the mother's later misconduct. While, therefore, he might have acted under a delusion, it was not an insane delusion, that is to say, a conception originating spontaneously in the mind, without evidence to support it, and which could be accounted for on no reasonable hypothesis." So in Stull v. Stull, 1 Neb. (unofficial) Rep. 380, 389, 96 N. W. 200, it was said: "Now, with reference to his belief that his wife had turned the children against him, this idea, while perhaps cruel and unjust, was not without some evidence for a basis; for the testimony clearly shows that in 1871 his sons, with the exception of Marinus, combined against him and coerced him into deeding his home place to his wife, by threatening to apply for a conservator of his estate unless he did so. The only reason that they allege for this was that he had signed a bond for his son Marinus and a note for one of his neighbors. The evidence clearly shows that after this the deceased became, as one of the contestant's witnesses said, 'dissatisfied,' and left his home, and resided from that time, until he came to the home of his son, John S. Stull, in 1895, among strangers. It is also in evidence that his children neglected him, and seldom, if ever, recognized him in any manner for several years after he had left his old home. During this time it is in evidence that he complained of the neglect of his children and blamed his wife for it. When a man, stricken in years and suffering from bodily infirmities, has been long taught, like King Lear, to feel

'How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is To have a thankless child'

—the fact that he complains of neglect is not sufficient to establish an insane delusion." The rule was stated and applied in Fulton v. Freeland, 219 Mo. 494, 118 S. W. 12, 131 Am. St. Rep. 576, the court saying: "There is no such thing as a delusion founded upon facts. It is a mental conception in the absence of facts. If the idea entertained has for a basis anything substantial it is not a delusion. There may be a misjudgment of facts or there may be an accentuated opinion founded upon insufficient facts, but not a delusion, rising to the dignity of a mental aberration. As to the conspiracy of his former wife and her relatives and friends forming a plot in the East to do him bodily injury, it cannot be said that this was a delusion in face of the facts. His brother had written him sufficient facts to remove his views from the realm of delusions." In the case of In re Merriman, 108 Mich. 454, 66 N. W. 372, it was said: "So, as regards the statement which Howard made after the making of the will, implying that his father was trying to cheat him, it can be said of this that Dwight Merriman delayed in turning over to Howard his money, and while such a judgment of his father was harsh, and perhaps unwarranted, it cannot be said it had no foundation in fact." So in Purdy v. Evans, 156 Ky. 342, 160 S. W. 1071, it was said: "The prejudice, resentment, or anger of testator toward his daughter may have been without reasonable cause; yet, it was not the spontaneous production of a diseased mind based upon no evidence whatever; for it had some basis in fact. It arose from the refusal of his daughter to live with him, and from her marriage with one to whom testator objected; and, however imperfect the process of his reasoning, or however illogical or unjust the conclusion that she was so greatly at fault as his conduct toward her proves his belief to have been, it was not without some basis in fact; at least there was sufficient to free it from the imputation of spontaneity, and, therefore, from the charge of having its origin in an insane delusion." Likewise in Owen v. Crumbaugh, 228 Ill. 390, 10 Ann. Cas. 606, 81 N. E. 1044, 119 Am. St. Rep. 442, the court said: "Take for example, the fact that the testator said that his brother and sister-in-law caused the death of his only child. The evidence explained what the testator meant. The child was being fed from the milk of a cow belonging to the testator's brother. It is not denied that the owner of the cow took it away from the testator's home without his consent, thereby making it necessary to feed the child upon the milk of another cow. It is not denied that the child sickened and died after the change in its food. Who would say that there was no evidence whatever for the charge that the taking away of the cow was the cause of the baby's death?" In the case of In re White, 121 N. Y. 406, 24 N. E. 935, it was said: "As to the testator's belief that there was collusion between neighbors, surveyor and his son to defraud him, we cannot say that there was absolutely no basis for any such reasoning by testator. There were the facts that the testator and his neighbors disputed on questions of boundary lines and fences; that his son disagreed with his views of his rights in the matters; and that one of the neighbors, his son and the surveyor, recommended by his son, were Masons. Can we say that because he could not believe anything good of the Masonic fraternity, and because he supposed them bound to stand by each other as against an outsider, that he was influenced by an insane delusion? Delusion is insanity, where one persistently believes supposed facts, which have no real existence, except in his perverted imagination, and against all evidence and probability, and conducts himself, however logically, upon the assumption of their existence. That was so held in American Seamen's Friend Soc. v. Hopper [33 N. Y. 619] supra. But if there are facts, however insufficient they may in reality be, from which a prejudiced, or a narrow, or a bigoted mind might derive a particular idea, or belief, it cannot be said that the mind is diseased in that respect. The belief may be illogical, or preposterous, but it is not, therefore, evidence of insanity in the person. Persons do not always reason logically, or correctly, from facts, and that may be because of their prejudices, or of the perversity, or peculiar construction of their minds. Wills, however, do not depend for their validity upon the testator's ability to reason logically, or upon his freedom from prejudice."

What was said in Phillips v. Chater, 1 Dem. (N. Y.) 533, to be "a very simple and practical standard" by which to determine the rationality of a belief was laid down in Boughton v. Knight, L. R. 3 P. & D. (Eng.) 64, wherein Sir James Harmon in charging the jury said: "The tribunal that is to determine the question (whether judge or jury), must, of necessity, take his own mind as the standard whereby to measure the degree of intellect possessed by another man. You must not arbitrarily take your own mind as the measure, in this sense, that you should say, I do not believe such and such a thing, and therefore the man who does believe it is insane. Nay, more; you must not say, I should not have believed such and such a thing, therefore the man who did believe it is insane. But you must of necessity put to yourself this question, and answer it: Can I understand how any man in possession of his senses could have believed such and such a thing? And if the answer you give is, I cannot understand it, then it is of the necessity of the case that you should say the man is not sane."

The question at issue being the state of the testator's mind facts not known to him which tend to support that belief cannot be considered. Matter of Stoll, 90 Misc. 266, 153 N. Y. S. 362.

3. UNREASONABLE ANTIPATHY TO RELATIVE.

a. In General.

An unfounded prejudice or antipathy on the part of a testator toward even a near relative is not ordinarily evidence of an insane delusion.

Rhode Island.—Jenckes v. Probate Ct. 2 R. I. 255.

"People may hate their relations for bad reasons and yet not be deprived of testamentary power." Carpenter's Estate, 94 Cal. 419, 29 Pac. 1101. In Carter v. Dixon, 69 Ga. 82, it was said: "A testator may entertain his animosities, cherish his prejudices, and nurse his wrath against heirs at law of his estate, and he may be guided and controlled by them in the disposition of his property; still, if he is competent in mind and makes a will freely and voluntarily, these conditions of his mind will not per se destroy his testamentary capacity." So it was said in Schneider v. Manning, 121 Ill. 876, 12 N. E. 267. "A man may become prejudiced against some of his children, and that, too, without proper foundation; and because he may make unjust remarks against them,—remarks not warranted by the facts,—it does not follow that he has insane delusions, or that he is devoid of testamentary capacity. If such was the rule, but few wills would be able to stand the test where an unequal distribution of property has been made by a testator among children." See to the same effect Huggins v. Drury, 192 Ill. 528, 61 N. E. 652. In Lowe v. Williamson, 2 N. J. Eq. 82, it was said: "It was further urged, that the testator was under a species of derangement or delusion as to his relative; that he took up a prejudice without cause. I have before said, that I find no good reason for this hostility, but it is plain that the testator had such feelings towards them. There was no intimacy with them. They visited him very little. He had an idea that they looked down upon him; and was no doubt jealous of their superior standing. There was, then, no delusion, but a reality in the fact, that there existed no cordiality between him and his relatives. It was of long standing; not sudden and accidental, but abiding." In the case of In re Spencer, 96 Cal. 448, 31 Pac. 453, wherein it appeared that the testatrix entertained a strong prejudice against her daughter-in-law it was said: "There is nothing to show anything like mental unsoundness or monomania on the part of the testatrix. It is quite probable that the conduct of Homer in various matters caused her to attach blame to Ella, when it should have fallen on Homer himself; but she did not know the real facts. She believed the son, whom she loved, rather than the daughter-in-law, whom she disliked and mistrusted; but would not any sane mother, under the circumstances, have done the same? The likes and dislikes of human beings—their confidences and mistrusts—are often capricious and arbitrary; but they are not evidences of insanity because they cannot be logically defended to the satisfaction of those who think them wrong. In the case at bar there is no warrant for the claim that the testatrix's dislike of her daughter-in-law and her family was an insane delusion; it was simply such a feeling, arising out of the recondite principles of attraction and repulsion, as is quite common among people of undoubted sanity." In Trumbull v. Gibbons, 22 N. J. L. 117, the court said: "In what does the alleged delusion exist, or how has it been exhibited in the present case? I have carefully looked through the testimony to be found in the case prepared, and in the documents, including the diary and the libels, which evidence I am not disposed to recapitulate or record. It is sufficiently referred to and stated in the charge of the Chief Justice for the present purpose, and it undoubtedly exhibits a sad instance of the extent to which family feuds may be carried. There seems to have been, on the one side, an imperious and haughty temper sustained by wealth and power, and restrained by no softening influences from moral or religious principles. On the other, as I take it, there was great imprudence on the part of a daughter and son-in-law in dealing with the errors of an uncontrollable and violent parent, upon whom they were dependent. But I can find nothing like delusion or insanity. The first dissatisfaction and incipient dislike were heightened, by continued disputes and irritation, into settled aversion and enmity; but this was the result of obvious causes having an actual existence, and not the consequences of imaginary difficulties. The rebukes for alleged licentiousness, the disputes and difficulties with regard to property, threatened divorce, the libel suit, all these matters, which embittered the feelings of the testator in the highest degree, were not mere imaginary causes of offence.

These and other successive bitter quarrels between the testator and his son-in-law, daughter, and family, certainly occurred, and they account for the provisions of the will, by which the latter were disinherited, without any necessity to resort for explanation to monomania or any other form of insanity." In Conner v. Skaggs, 213 Mo. 334, 111 S. W. 1132, wherein it appeared that the testator disinherited a daughter who married against his wishes, it was said: "Testator's opinions as to the soundness of Mr. Conner's morals, may have been grossly narrow and unjust, but there was no insanity about it. It is natural and usual for men to act on what they are told by others, in whom they trust. The solicitude of the father was natural. A clandestine courtship in the teeth of parental protest is a most dangerous domestic experiment. Mischief and unwholesomeness lurk in the shade of concealment. The resentment of the father was most human and natural though extravagantly exhibited. That he did not rise to the lofty and divine plane of complete forgiveness when time had healed his wounds, is unfortunate; but is still natural and human—not insanity."

However, an antipathy of a testator toward a near relative may be so violent, extravagant and baseless as to amount to an insane delusion. Dew v. Clark, 3 Add. Ecc. (Eng.) 79; Nicewander v. Nicewander, 151 Ill. 156; Higgins v. Drury, 192 Ill. 528, 61 N. E. 652; Miller v. White, 5 Redf. (N. Y.) 320; Thomas v. Carter, 170 Pa. St. 272, 33 Atl. 81, 50 Am. St. Rep. 770; Chaney v. Bryan, 16 Lea (Tenn.) 63. And see Brown v. Ward, 53 Md. 387, 36 Am. Rep. 422. As was said in Broughton v. Knight, L. R. 3 P. & D. (Eng.) 64: "It is unfortunately not a thing unknown that parents—and in justice to women I am bound to say it is more frequently the case with fathers than mothers,—that they take unduly harsh views of the characters of their children, sons especially. That is not unknown. But there is a limit beyond which one feels that it ceases to be a question of harsh unreasonable judgment of character, and that the repulsion which a parent exhibits towards one or more of his children must proceed from some mental defect in himself. It is so contrary to the whole current of human nature that a man should not only form a harsh judgment of his children, but that he should put that into practice so as to do them injury or deprive them of advantages which most men desire above all things to confer upon their children. I say there is a point at which such repulsion and aversion are themselves evidence of unsoundness of mind." In the leading case of Dew v. Clark, supra, an issue as to testamentary capacity was awarded, it appearing that the testator harbored the most unfounded and unreasonable impressions in regard to the character of an only daughter, against whom, in consequence, he entertained an unnatural dislike. He imagined that the daughter was vile, profligate, and depraved in the highest degree, and treated her accordingly with the utmost severity, and even cruelty, and finally cut her off in his will with an inadequate provision. It was a dislike founded purely on delusion. It was satisfactorily shown, that while this delusion had gained such possession of his mind that nothing could shake his belief, yet, in point of fact, she was amiable in disposition, engaging in her manners, of superior natural talents, diligent, dutiful, affectionate, modest, and virtuous, and giving no occasion for the extraordinary feelings exhibited by the father. In Ballantine v. Proudfoot, 62 Wis. 216, 22 N. W. 392, the court said: "It is rare that a mother, without the greatest provocation, entertains such an aversion to a daughter that she refuses to see her in her last illness. And yet, but a few hours before she died, Mrs. Stewart was asked if her daughter should not be sent for, and she replied that she did not wish to see her daughter; that the Proudfoots might come and look upon her after she was dead. Such unnatural feelings are so contrary to human nature that we are inclined to account for them on the ground that the mother at the time was not herself, but was laboring under some mental disorder." In Merrill v. Rolston, 5 Redf. (N. Y.) 220, the court said: "If she had taken the notion that George had become indifferent to her wishes, and rebellious against her authority, however unreasonable and untrue, it might have been said that there was some semblance of fact and circumstances to base the suspicion upon, in his marriage against her will, which an imperious disposition and over-jealous nature might have magnified into an unpardonable offense; but her extravagant and irrational exaggeration of his so-called offense, her apparently sincere imputation of an unworthy and depraved character, of his reprehensible, impure and immoral conduct, her baseless accusation of unworthiness and wickedness and impurity on the part of George and his estimable and accomplished wife, her utterly false and irrational statement that his adopted father from his visit to Liverpool, which appears to have been about 1852, discovered his innate depravity, and thereafter distrusted and disliked him, and refused him his name, and her alleged discovery of his baseness and subsequent dislike of him, all entirely and overwhelmingly disproved by numerous subsequent letters, full of extravagant expressions of confidence in his ability, education, moral purity, and her great pride in his talents and brilliant prospects; her extraordinary expressions of solicitude for his advancement, and especially for his safety in respect to the strike at the zinc works, and her anxiety lest his mind should be dethroned by his rejection; by the frequent conversation with different persons as to their estimate of and affection for him, years after the event which was stated by her as the beginning of their distrust, and especially by the terms of both of their wills, made and executed in 1856, four years after the time mentioned, wherein he was made the ultimate beneficiary by name, as their adopted son, and many other circumstances, which might be recalled. Taken in conjunction with the foregoing facts and circumstances, her vulgar and false charge, without the remotest foundation, of illicit intercourse between George and his intended wife, the general imputation of unchastity, equally baseless, her diabolical and fiendish imprecations upon George, just referred to, her incoherent and impious curses, her senseless mutilation of her will and his portrait, and the reasons given for it, all combine to show that, if decedent was of sound mind, an intelligent, affectionate, kind, modest, truthful Christian woman had been transformed into a bold, defiant, passionate, unfeeling, cruel, false, vulgar and obscene fiend incarnate, which cannot be pleaded even as a thoughtless ebullition of intemperance, ungovernable anger and jealousy, for the utterances were oft repeated and rewritten with deliberation at distances from the object of her malediction, with nothing apparently but a distorted brain to account for her transformation so complete and the delusions so marked, which would be a signal mercy to her memory and the fame of her sex, to ascribe it to a morbid or insane delusion." In Johnson v. Moore, 1 Litt. (Ky.) 371, it was said: "We are, therefore, satisfied that on this point, we mean that of hostility to his brothers, without cause, he was subject to a species of derangement which affected him there and nowhere else, except with regard to his assertions of his extraordinary wealth. As in one point only, except when under the influence of intoxication, he was subject to a peculiar species of derangement which cannot be explained but by the existence of the fact, unless we could measure and scrutinize the mind, we have no hesitation in saying he was competent to do any act, which was not subject to be influenced by that derangement, and that he might be the subject of responsibility both civilly and criminally, for any act which was not influenced or induced by it, and if the persons as to whom his mind was disordered were strangers, and could not be supposed by the ties of natural affection to be the objects of his bounty, we should have no difficulty in sustaining this will. But this is not the case. To them, it might be supposed, or to some of them, he would have given his estate. Once in 1820, he did make that sound and rational disposition. From that he departed, afterwards, and made them the objects of hatred and disgust. And at the time of making his last will now in contest, he labored strongly under the effects of this disorder of mind; for when he was inquired of by one of the subscribing witnesses, why he had pretermitted his relations, he became instantly irritated, and declared that they had endeavored to get his estate before his death, and that he had declared war against all the Moores. For this disaffection towards them, there never appeared to be the slightest cause, but the contrary; and the reasons for it, when assigned by himself, were futile and groundless. He cannot, therefore, be accounted a free agent in making his will, so far as his relatives are concerned although free as to the rest of the world. But however free he may have been as to other objects, the conclusion is irresistible that this peculiar defect of intellect did influence his acts in making his will, and for this cause it ought not to be sustained." And in Sherley v. Sherley, 81 Ky. 240, it was said: "While ill-will, prejudice, hatred, or the exhibition of violent passions, by a person usually good humored and affable, such as the evidence tends to portray Capt. Sherley, do not of themselves constitute insanity, they may be, and often are, the manifestations of mental derangement; and evidence of their existence with reference to persons so nearly related to those naturally entitled to his bounty as the maternal grandfather, against whom he entertains suspicions which might affect the disposition of his property, should be left to the jury to determine, whether they result from naturally ungovernable passions, or were produced by provocation, or were the indication or sign of a decaying or decayed mind, where the issue of sanity or insanity is being tried by them."

III. Unfounded Belief as to Particular Matter.

1. DISLOYALTY OR INGRATITUDE OF RELATIVE.

Since the proper manifestation of affection and gratitude is to a great extent a matter of personal judgment, a belief however unfounded of a testator that his immediate relatives have been deficient in that respect will not ordinarily be considered an insane delusion. Carpenter v. Bailey, 94 Cal. 406, 29 Pac. 1101; Bauchens v. Davis, 229 Ill. 557, 82 N. E. 365; Reichert v. Reichert, 144 Mich. 295, 107 N. W. 1057; Leffingwell v. Bettinghouse, 151 Mich. 513, 115 N. W. 731; Stull

v. Stull, 1 Neb. (unofficial) Rep. 380, 389, 96 N. W. 200; In re Weil, 48 Hun 621, mem. 1 N. Y. S. 91; In re Cline, 24 Ore. 175, 33 Pac. 542, 41 Am. St. Rep. 851. Alexander's Estate, reported, in full, post, this volume, at page 33. "To establish insane delusion, the contestant must do something more than simply show 'a mistaken notion' on the part of the testator as to the feelings or intentions of his relatives in reference to him or his property." Hall v. Hall, 38 Ala. 131, McBride v. Sullivan, 155 Ala. 166, 45 So. 902. And see Mosser v. Mosser, 32 Ala. 551. In Bean v. Bean, 144 Mich. 599, 108 N. W. 369, it was said: "I do not understand how it can be determined that the opinion of a father that a son has no regard for him, and is waiting for him to die in order to get a portion of his estate, can be said to have no foundation in fact, and to be the result of insane delusion, except it may be, in cases where relations, induced by a lifetime of dutiful conduct on the one side and of continued and known affection on the other, are suddenly and without known cause interrupted and succeeded by an attitude on the part of the father utterly inconsistent with past conduct." So in Buchanan v. Belsey, 65 App. Div. 58, 72 N. Y. S. 601, the court said: "The relations between this testator and his wife and children were not only strained, but there is evidence to show that those persons were ungrateful to him. His leaving each of them merely a nominal legacy he declares by his will to be in consequence of their ingratitude shown to him for many years. Upon the whole testimony, while the record is replete with accounts of unhappy relations existing between the testator and his family, the impression made by reading it is that the wife and daughters of the testator were not blameless in their conduct towards him, and that although he may have exaggerated their conduct in some respects and attributed to them persecutions which undoubtedly emanated from some one, and which from various indications he might well have believed came from them, we are not satisfied that it is shown by a preponderance of evidence that the provisions of this will were the result of insane delusions entertained by the testator." In Shorb v. Brubaker, 94 Ind. 165, in sustaining the refusal of an instruction as to the effect of an insane delusion, the court said: "The evidence upon which this instruction was asked did not relate to any fact. Its application was simply to an opinion given by the testator at the time of making his will, that the appellants had misused and mistreated him, and to a contrary opinion expressed by the appellants while testifying that they had never misused or mistreated him. Evidence of this kind is too intangible for judicial cognizance in determining the validity of a will. An act, which in the opinion of one person might be regarded as misuse or mistreatment, might, in the judgment of another, be esteemed as harmless, or, indeed, as a token of affection or friendship. Had the testator given any fact which if true, would have been a flagrant breach of filial duty upon the part of appellants, and had it been shown that this fact had no existence except in the imagination of the testator, it would have been right in that case to charge the jury that such evidence was proper for their consideration in determining the testator's mental capacity. But upon the evidence before the jury, the instruction, if given, would have tended to confuse and mislead." See to the same effect, Hite v. Sims, 94 Ind. 333. In Taylor v. McClintock, 87 Ark. 243, 112 S. W. 405, it was said: "Filial love and gratitude do not belong to a class of theoretical or metaphysical subjects not susceptible of proof. Indeed, there is scarcely anything in our civilization more concrete and real than these emotions growing out of the natural ties of blood, and incident to the family relation. Their presence or absence is manifested, and may be proved, in manifold ways. If a parent believes that his daughter does not love him, or love him as well as she does some others, or is ungrateful to him, the falsity of such belief, if it be false, may be easily shown. . . . But if the belief be that his daughter does not love him as much as he wishes, or as much as his daughter ought, or that his daughter is not as grateful as he wishes, or as grateful as she should be, then it is not a belief of the total want of affection and gratitude, but only as to the degree thereof. Such a belief necessarily is in the domain of speculation and theory, where no proof can discover its error; for no evidence can measure the quantum of love and gratitude that a father may wish his child to have towards him, nor the quantum of love and gratitude that child should have towards its parent. The unexpressed wishes of a parent as to the degree of love and gratitude that he desired his child to have for him, as well as the quantum of love and gratitude that the child should have for the parent, are so purely psychical and ethical that they are not susceptible of proof. A belief of that kind cannot be shown to be erroneous; nor can it be shown that such a belief would not be changed by evidence and argument. There is no criterion by which to demonstrate the error and unchangeability of such belief, and the whole subject-matter is in the wide realm of speculation, and cannot therefore be a delusion."

2. CHARACTER OF RELATIVE.

Subject to the qualification heretofore noted that an illogical conclusion from facts is not an insane delusion (see supra subdivision II.

2. Illogical or Unreasonable Conclusion as to Relative from Facts), a groundless and persistent belief by a testator that one of his relatives is a person of vile and worthless character may constitute an insane delusion. Dew v. Clark, 1 Add. Ecc. (Eng.) 279; Mills' Appeal, 44 Conn. 484. In Rivard v. Rivard, 109 Mich. 98, 66 N. W. 681, 63 Am. St. Rep. 566, it was said: "He disinherited his youngest daughter. If the testimony of the contestants is worthy of belief, he was under the insane delusion that she was an inmate of a house of ill fame. There is no shadow of a reason shown for this belief. If the jury found that this insane delusion was the cause of his disinheriting her, it alone would be sufficient to invalidate the will." So in Hardenburgh v. Hardenburgh, 133 Ia. 1, 109 N. W. 1014, it was said: "It is almost conclusively shown that the testator was the subject of the delusions which are said to have existed in his mind, and, from a very careful examination of the evidence, we are fully satisfied that these delusions were insane in their nature and quality. At the time of the contest the daughters were women well along in years. They were all women of respectability and high standing in the community where they resided. There had been nothing in their conduct, either in private life or in public, indicating that they were not women of the severest virtue, and yet the charges of unchastity were frequently made against them. It is true, the charges were not made to the public, but were confined to the members of his own family, and oftentimes made directly to the persons accused." In Swygart v. Willard, 166 Ind. 25, 76 N. E. 755, a finding that the testator was influenced by an insane delusion as to the character of a relative was sustained on facts stated by the court as follows: "During the last ten years of his [testator's] life the burden of his conversation was his money, his property and his children, and the manner in which he would dispose of his property. His children were all men and women of respectable standing, and treated him as kindly and affectionately as he would permit them to do. He lamented the fact that none of the family lived with him. He talked occasionally of his first wife—sometimes saying she was a good woman and helped to earn his property, and again that she was a spendthrift, recklessly extravagant and a strumpet, when in truth she was a good woman and of frugal habits. In speaking of his children he would sometimes say they were all good children, and he intended to treat them alike in his will; at other times he would denounce some of his daughters as extravagant spendthrifts and unworthy, and declared that he would give them nothing. In speaking of his children he would often become greatly excited, and sometimes abuse his daughters using vile and base names and epithets, and probably the following day would say they were dutiful and worthy women, and declare that his sons were thieves and rascals and should receive no part of his estate. His daughter Lillie, thirty-eight years of age, had been an invalid from childhood. He generally said she was unfortunate and unable to provide for herself, and that he would make abundant provision for her, and give her more than any other one of his children; but sometimes he would curse and abuse her. She lived at Elkhart the last three years of his life, and at one time he sent for her to come to South Bend to visit him. She came, and on arrival informed him that she only had enough money to pay her fare coming and would have to get from him the money for her return fare, about fifty cents, whereupon he flew into a rage, cursed and abused her, and drove her from his house; and she went penniless to a neighbor who sent her home on the following day. He afterwards frequently said he thought more of her than any other child."

Very closely related to a delusion of this kind is an unfounded antipathy to a relative, which is discussed in an earlier division of this note. See supra the subdivision II. 3, Unreasonable Antipathy to Relative.

3. INJURY BY RELATIVE OR INTENT TO INJURE.

A belief by a testator that a relative has injured or attempted to injure him or is engaged with others in a conspiracy to injure him is not an insane delusion if it is a conclusion, however unreasonable, from acts of the relative or information imparted to the testator. Rush v. McGee, 36 Ind. 69; Fulton v. Freeland, 219 Mo. 494, 118 S. W. 12, 131 Am. St. Rep. 576; American Seamen's Friend Soc. v. Hopper, 33 N. Y. 619; Coit v. Patchen, 77 N. Y. 533; In re White, 121 N. Y. 406, 24 N. E. 935; In re Gross, 47 Hun 633, mem. 14 N. Y. St. Rep. 429. Thus in Friedersdorf v. Lacy, 173 Ind. 429, 90 N. E. 766, it was said: "It is clear that the suspicion or belief of Mrs. Friedersdorf that her daughters designed to poison her was not a mere conception of her morbid fancy, or an insane delusion; but if the testimony is true, was a false belief founded upon the statements of men on whose word she might ordinarily rely." So in In re Kendrick, 130 Cal. 360, 62 Pac. 605, it was said: "The violated agreement, the recording of the deed, the detention of the keys, the locking of the chickenhouse, the sale and removal of Mrs. Kendrick's lard, while not sufficient to justify the conclusion that Mrs. Masterson did intend to eject her invalid sister from the house, afforded some ground of belief to the sick and irascible woman that her sister designed to take advantage of her helplessness. And it being further considered that Mrs. Kendrick, when aroused, seems to have been both violent and extravagant of speech, the matter of the accusation does not appear extraordinary. At least the belief did not originate in a diseased mind, but found color for its support in the matters that have been recited. It cannot, then, be considered an insane delusion." In the case of Skinner, 40 Ore. 571, 62 Pac. 523, 67 Pac. 951, the court said: "Some of the witnesses indicate that the decedent was imbued with the idea that the daughter-in-law would resort to extreme measures in order to possess herself of the property, if it should be divided or bequeathed to his son. If this be so, it was not shown that it was a delusion. It may, for aught that appears, have had its foundation in fact. We do not mean to say that the daughter-in-law was possessed of any such purpose, because there is not a scintilla of evidence in the record to bear out the statement. On the contrary, the proven admissions of the decedent show her treatment of him to have always been kind, indulgent and considerate. But what we mean is that his information may have been such as to superinduce the belief, and thus the state of his mind may have been the result thereof, and not of sheer delusion. Some of the witnesses relate that, when he was asked to give reasons for thinking that his daughter-in-law intended to possess herself of the property, he answered that the neighbors told him so. Further than this the matter was not pursued. Now, if he believed his neighbors, and acted upon neighborhood gossip, he was not possessed of a delusion: but the idea with which he was imbued had its basis in fact, and hence the will could not have been superinduced by an insane delusion."

It is, however, recognized that the delusion of persecution is one of the most common manifestations of monomania and a belief of that kind as to relatives of the testator, wholly without basis in fact, has frequently been held to destroy testamentary capacity. Fulleck v. Allinson, 3 Hag. Ecc. (Eng.) 527; American Bible Soc. v. Price, 115 Ill. 623, 5 N. E. 126; Woodbury v. Obeare, 7 Gray (Mass.) 470; Lathrop v. American Board of Foreign Missions, 67 Barb. (N. Y.) 590; Matter of Dorman, 5 Dem. (N. Y.) 112; Shaw's Will, 2 Redf. (N. Y.) 107; In re Keeler, 12 N. Y. St. Rep. 148. In Ballantine v. Proudfoot, 62 Wis. 216, 22 N. W. 392, it was said: "The evidence conclusively shows that, for a considerable period and up to the time of executing the will, Mrs. Stewart labored under the strange delusion that her only living child and the husband of that daughter had ill-treated her; had purposely made her uncomfortable and unhappy while she lived with them; had permitted their young children to annoy her in different ways, and had even attempted to poison her. Several of the proponent's witnesses testified to conversations had with the testatrix, in which she complained of her daughter and son-in-law's treatment of her, and said that she believed they proposed to poison her or make way with her in some way. So impressed was she with this notion that she would not eat food which her daughter or her family brought to her, and often repeated the story that she had thrown a piece of suspected meat, which had been given her to eat, to a dog; and that the meat poisoned the dog. It is not necessary to go over this testimony in detail. Suffice it to say that it establishes the fact, beyond doubt, that Mrs. Stewart was laboring under these insane delusions as to the conduct and motives of her daughter and son-in-law, and that these delusions, in all probability, influenced her in disposing of her property. It is needless to inquire whether this mental disorder was brought on by the sun-stroke, which some of the witnesses say she had some years prior to her death, or whether it was the result of constitutional irritability and weakness; but it is plain that her affections had become so alienated from her only child, and her sense of right so perverted, that she repeatedly imputed to her daughter the wish to poison her. This presents a clear case of unsoundness of mind, caused by insane delusions, which influenced and induced the testatrix to give her property to those not akin to her and having no claims upon her. In the execution of a will it is essential that the testator shall understand the nature of the act and its effects; shall be able to comprehend and appreciate the claims which he ought to regard and satisfy; and that no disorder of mind shall poison his affections, pervert his sense of right, or prevent the exercise of his natural faculties; that no insane delusion shall influence his will in disposing of his property and bring about a disposal of it, which, if his mind had been sound, would not have been made." So in the case of In re Kahn, 1 Connoly 510, 5 N. Y. S. 556, the court said: "They were in substance, that his children were endeavoring to get his property away from him; that a son and daughter had attempted to poison him; that his children, or some of them, had declared he ought to be in an insane asylum; that they had employed men to watch him for the purpose of taking him to an asylum; that his son had spoken with the captain of a steamer, in which he went to Europe, to have him arrested as a lunatic when he arrived at Bremen; that his children had conspired to place him in a lunatic asylum; that they had caused carriages to be employed to remove him from his house to an asylum; had threatened to have a lawsuit begun against him by the government because he had once brought from Europe a pair of earrings without paying duty thereon, and that they had caused the children in the street to cry out to him as he passed. These statements were made by the decedent in different forms to several persons, wholly disinterested. The testimony of the children and the friends of the family prove that these accusations were without foundation in fact; that he continued to make them more or less from the time of the marriage of his daughter Bella until within a week or ten days of his death. When reasoned with by friends he sometimes seemed convinced that he was in error, but at the next interview, he repeated his charges. On the 27th of January, Jacob Kahn a brother of the decedent died. During the week following his funeral, in conformity with a custom of the Hebrews, the decedent passed the time with Mrs. Yette Kahn, the widow of his brother, at her house, and then in conversation with her was especially emphatic in his assertions of the persecution of his children, and he refused to eat food which his daughter sent him, alleging that it contained poison. It was about this period that the instructions were given for the preparation of the instrument under consideration, which was executed a few days thereafter. I am compelled to conclude that the belief entertained by the decedent of persecution on the part of the wife and children was a delusion proceeding from a diseased brain, and that the instrument is the offspring of the delusion." In Lancaster v. Lancaster (Ky.) 87 S. W. 1137, it was said: "Under the testimony and the issues in the case at bar, the trial judge should have instructed the jury that if the deceased, at the time of the executions of the paper in contest, was under an insane delusion that his brother Robert had grossly wronged him in their business transactions, and was of unsound mind on this subject, and by reason of such unsoundness of mind made a different disposition of his estate from that which he would otherwise have made, they should find the paper not to be his last will and testament, although his mental capacity was sound on other subjects; but that, to invalidate the paper on this ground, the deceased must not only have been mistaken as to his brother's having grossly wronged him in their transactions, but must have been insane on the subject, and the will must have been induced by such insanity." In the case of In re Lapham, 19 Misc. 71, 44 N. Y. S. 90, the court said: "It is conceded that a person may have a delusion and still be competent to make a valid will; but the theory in such a case is that the delusion did not enter into the testamentary act. It is where the will is governed by or is the offspring of an insane delusion that the courts have invariably held that such a testamentary disposition is invalid. Such a conclusion must be applied to this case. The proponent herein insists that the decedent had no delusions which entered into the execution of the will; and that his acts and sayings in reference to himself and as to others were mistaken beliefs. Numerous cases were cited, and there can be no dispute as to the legal conclusions drawn in those particular cases. There was no evidence that the testator had been poisoned or that he acted in the manner as described by him; or that the effect of the poison was as he claimed. He was ill, as the doctor stated. Any other condition was the result of his perverted imagination. There was nothing from which he could draw the conclusion that his daughter-in-law had poisoned him, that Laura, his grandchild, had robbed him, or that his grandson Albert had committed some act which justified his being sent from home. He spread widecast his accusations and could not be reasoned with. Where a person tenaciously holds to the belief that a certain state of affairs exists, which in fact does not, and which can only be accounted for as the creation of a perverted imagination, without probable cause or evidence, he is suffering from a delusion and not a mistaken belief. From the entire evidence in the case the delusions of the decedent could not be confounded with unreasonable prejudice or mistaken beliefs. The persons who were the subjects of his accusations at the beginning and for a long time after treated him kindly, and were attentive to his wants. No other conclusion as to the relation of these parties can be drawn from the evidence." In Colhoun v. Jones, 2 Redf. (N. Y.) 34, it was said: "The testimony given on the trial, showing that Colhoun harbored intensely hostile feelings towards his father, at the time he executed the last will, is very strong. It is unnecessary to quote it at length, but it is sufficient to state that the fact was established by numerous witnesses. He justified this hostility on various grounds. He charged that his father and sister were Catholics—that his father hated him because of his Protestant faith, that his father had treated him harshly—that he had driven him away from home—that he had refused to aid him in getting an education—that they had not been on good terms for a number of years—and his father wanted to get him out of the way, so that he could get hold of his property, etc. It was clearly shown that there was no foundation for any of these charges, and that no reason existed why the testator should have entertained any of those beliefs against his only surviving parent. That the testator believed in the truth of what he said I have no doubt; that the facts which he asserted had no real existence is equally clear to my mind; and that the will was the direct offspring of the delusion, no one can deny. We therefore have the precise condition of the monomaniac."

4. FIDELITY OF HUSBAND OR WIFE.

The fact that one spouse entertains a belief unwarranted by the facts that the other has been unfaithful to his or her marital obligation of chastity does not necessarily establish the existence of an insane delusion. If such a belief is based on some facts or grounds for suspicion, however they may be magnified by a credulous or jealous disposition, it does not destroy testamentary capacity. In re Scott, 128 Cal. 57, 60 Pac. 527; Johnson v. Johnson, 105 Md. 81, 65 Atl. 918, 121 Am. St. Rep. 570; Thayer v. Thayer (Mich.) 154 N. W. 32; American Seamen's Friend Soc. v. Hopper, 33 N. Y. 619; Coit v. Patchen, 77 N. Y. 533; In re Gannon, 2 Misc. 329, 21 N. Y. S. 960; Potter v. Jones, 20 Ore. 239, 25 Pac. 769, 12 L.R.A. 161; Foster v. Dickerson, 64 Vt. 233, 24 Atl. 253; Cole's Will, 49 Wis. 179, 5 N. W. 346. In the case of Scott, supra, it was said: "There is no evidence in the record from which the court could find that the contestant was ever unfaithful to his wife or that he ever made any attempt or had any thought to poison her, or to cause her to be placed in an insane asylum. The court, however, was not authorized to hold that she was under an insane delusion in reference to these propositions unless it was satisfied, from the evidence before it, not only that these charges against him were without any foundation in fact, but also that there was no evidence of any facts brought to her knowledge from which she might form a belief, however irrational or inconclusive it might be, in the existence of the acts or purposes with which she charged him, and, in addition thereto, that she did in fact believe that he was guilty thereof." So in Cole's Will, 49 Wis. 179, 5 N. W. 346, it was said: "It must be conceded that the belief of deceased in respect to the unchastity of his wife, persisted in as it was without evidence to support it and against all reasonable probabilities of its truth, looks very much like insane delusion. Yet it is not necessarily so. Observation teaches us that there is a very large class of people, whose sanity is undoubted, who are unduly jealous or suspicious of others, and especially of those closely connected with them, and who, upon the most trivial, even whimsical grounds, will wrongfully impute the worst motives and conduct to those in whom they ought to confide. This insanity, which is developed in a great variety of forms, is altogether too common, and too many persons confessedly sane are to a greater or less extent afflicted with it, to justify us in saying that because the deceased was so afflicted he was insane, or the victim of insane delusion. The line between the unfounded and unreasonable suspicions of a sane mind (for doubtless there are such) and insane delusion is sometimes quite indistinct and difficult to be defined. However, the legal presumption is in favor of sanity, and on the issue of sanity or insanity the burden is upon him who asserts insanity, to prove it. Hence, in a doubtful case, unless there appears a preponderance of proof of mental unsoundness, the issue should be found the other way." In Phillips v. Chater, 1 Dem. (N. Y.) 533, the court said: "Now, does his behavior, in connection with those divorce proceedings, tend to establish the existence of an 'insane delusion' touching the purity of his wife? There are many circumstances, some trivial, some important, which lead to the contrary conclusion. Several of the witnesses, for example, testified to a certain freedom of intercourse between Mrs. Phillips and army officers stationed at posts where her husband was assigned for duty. Her conduct was thoroughly innocent, for aught that is established by the evidence, but it sometimes occasioned remark, and always angered the decedent, who was apparently of an inordinately jealous disposition. The intimacy between Auris and his wife was another circumstance which may very likely have excited a mind constituted like his, and the statements which Auris and the detective made, as to what took place after the former returned from the theatre with Mrs. Phillips, might well have furnished reasonable ground for his distrust. I certainly do not mean to intimate, in the least, that there was any just foundation for such vile suspicions, but simply to assert that the existence of the suspicions, under all the circumstances, may have been quite consistent with the decedent's sanity. What is an 'insane delusion?' Bouvier, in his law dictionary, defines a 'delusion' to be 'a diseased state of the mind, in which persons believe things to exist which exist only in their own imaginations, with a persuasion so fixed and firm that neither evidence nor argument can convince them to the contrary.' Tried by this standard, I can find no warrant in the evidence for holding that Dr. Phillips was suffering from any delusion whatever in relation to his wife. He does not, indeed, seem to have been constant in his opinion of her infidelity, for on several occasions he was apparently in the state of mind which was illustrated by his remark to the witness Grant, that 'sometimes he believed it, and at others he could not.' This is by no means the condition of a monomaniac such as he is claimed to have been. 'A sane man in error,' says Wharton, 'retains the power of doubting; not the madman' (Med. Juris. 4th ed. sec. 727)." In Potter v. Jones, 20 Ore. 239, 25 Pac. 769, 12 L.R.A. 161, it was said: "Tested by these definitions, can it be said, upon facts as disclosed by this record, that the testator was beset with an insane delusion in respect to the legitimacy of the contestant and her brother? The circumstances which he relates, and upon which his belief is founded, fix the place, identify the person and the manner of the improper meeting, and there is no evidence to show, nor is there any attempt to deny, that there was such a place or person or that such a meeting might not have occurred, only that the adulterous purpose which he ascribed and professed to believe to be the object of such meeting was so absolutely inconsistent with her known character for chastity as to be utterly unworthy of belief and only to be accounted for in him upon the theory of an unnatural dislike or aversion which amounted to an insane delusion. The evidence in contradiction of his belief proceeds on the assumption that there may have been such a place and man and meeting; and if so, her known character for chastity, her every-day walk and life, render it impossible that it could have occurred for the foul purposes which he imputes, or otherwise than accidentally and without concert or evil design in thought or deed. But these facts, however falsely or unjustly he may have reasoned from them, or however absurd his conclusions, as applied to the wife and contestant impugned by them, nevertheless furnished the evidence which inspired his suspicions and the ground upon which his belief was founded. It is conceded that the conclusions he drew from the facts are wholly unwarranted and without any justification, indicating at least an unrelenting jealous disposition; but unjust and absurd as they may be, they were not the pure creations of a perverted imagination, without any foundation in reality. Delusions are conceptions that originate spontaneously in the mind without evidence of any kind to support them, and can be accounted for on no reasonable hypothesis. The mind that is so disordered imagines something to exist or imputes the existence of an offense which no rational person would believe to exist or to have been committed without some kind of evidence to support it. They are as baseless as the fabric of a dream conjured into existence by a disordered or perverted imagination, without any sort of foundation of fact. As in Smee v. Smee, 5 P. D. (Eng.) 84, the testator imagined himself to be the son of George IV., and that when he was born a large sum of money had been put in his father's hands for him, but which his father, in fraud of his rights, had distributed to his brothers; or, as in Smith v. Tebbitt, L. R. 1 P. & D. (Eng.) 398, the testatrix imagined herself to be one of the persons of the Trinity, Ann. Cas. 1916C.—2.

and her chief legatee to be another. In cases like these the belief is the offspring of a disordered mind, and not induced by the existence of any facts or occurrences which could lend any sort of countenance to it. The case at bar is not such. Here there is a claim of facts upon which the belief is founded, and unjust and unfeeling as may be such belief, in view of the known character of his wife for chastity, it is not the spontaneous product of pure fancy, but a grave error, showing a lack of judgment or a want of reasoning powers—the outcome of an over-sensitive, jealous disposition, prone to exaggerate any trifling circumstance with which his wife may be connected into an unworthy and wicked importance, and to draw from them conclusions untenable, illogical and unworthy of belief. . . . To support the contention for the contestant, the belief or suspicion the testator entertained of his wife's infidelity and the illegitimacy of the children to be an insane delusion, must have been wholly without foundation in reality, and the mere figment of his perverted imagination. But the evidence discloses that it was formed on an apparent cause, leading on his part to a view of his wife's conduct, which we have admitted was erroneous, unjust, and unnatural, yet this only shows an unfortunate error of judgment or a want of reasoning power, but not an absolute want of intellect upon the subject. The conclusion which he drew from the facts was untenable and erroneous, and showed that he formed a bad judgment upon an insufficient state of facts, but does not show that his conclusion or belief was formed without any foundation in fact whatever." So it was said in Coit v. Patchen, 77 N. Y. 533. "The proof certainly does not establish the infidelity of the husband; and it may therefore be assumed that the deceased acted upon an unfounded suspicion as to his fidelity. But as other causes, as we have seen, co-operated to influence her judgment and action, which may have been sufficient to account for her discrimination as to him in making her will, it cannot, we think, be said that this act of itself was conclusive upon the question of insane delusion."

But if such a belief arises spontaneously in the mind of the testator without any basis in fact and is held as a fixed conviction it constitutes an insane delusion. Haines v. Hayden, 95 Mich. 332, 54 N. W. 911, 35 Am. St. Rep. 566; In re Gannan, 2 Misc. 329, 21 N. Y. S. 960; In re Long, 43 Misc. 560, 89 N. Y. S. 555. And see Burkhart v. Gladiah, 123 Ind. 387, 24 N. E. 118. In the case of In re Jenkins, 39 Misc. 618, 80 N. Y. S. 664, it was said: "Shortly after their marriage he began to talk with neighbors and friends about his wife's infidelity, and, up to the time of his death, made untrue allegations as to her character. The evidence emphasizes the fact, however, that during her entire life in the neighborhood where she lived her reputation for chastity was good, and no suspicions were held against her. Untrue reports were circulated only by her husband. People with whom he talked endeavored to persuade him that he was mistaken, and insisted that his accusations against his wife were the creations of his own imagination; but, in opposition to evidence and argument, he asserted in positive terms that his wife was guilty of immoral acts. A person has a delusion who believes that a certain state of affairs exists which in fact does not, and which can only be accounted for as the result of a perverted imagination, without cause or evidence. . . . Applying these definitions to the facts in this case, it cannot be argued that testator had a mistaken belief or an unreasonable prejudice. It went beyond these. It was an insane delusion."

5. PATERNITY OF CHILD.

A false belief by a testator that one of his children is illegitimate, being of course closely related to a similar belief in the infidelity of his wife (discussed in the preceding subdivision), is governed by the same rules and does not constitute an insane delusion if it exists as a conclusion illogically or unreasonably drawn from facts. Johnson v. Johnson, 105 Md. 81, 65 Atl. 918, 121 Am. St. Rep. 570; O'Dell v. Goff, 149 Mich. 152, 112 N. W. 736, 119 Am. St. Rep. 662, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 989; Thayer v. Thayer (Mich.) 154 N. W. 32; Potter v. Jones, 20 Ore. 239, 25 Pac. 769, 12 L.R.A. 161. And see Smith v. Smith, 48 N. J. Eq. 566, 25 Atl. 11, wherein it was held on a review of the evidence that the testator's denial of the legitimacy of his child was a wilful falsehood and not a delusion. In Clapp v. Fullerton, 34 N. Y. 190, 90 Am. Dec. 681, it was said: "It was also insisted, that, aside from the issue of imbecility, the testator was disqualified by lunacy. This claim rested on the assumption, that during the last year of his life, he was laboring under an insane delusion as to the legitimacy of his elder daughter. To sustain the allegation, it is not sufficient to show that his suspicion in this respect was not well founded. It is quite apparent, from the evidence, that his distrust of the fidelity of his wife was really groundless and unjust; but it does not follow, that his doubts evince a condition of lunacy. The right of a testator to dispose of his estate, depends neither on the justice of his prejudices, nor the soundness of his reasoning. He may do what he will with his own; and if there be no defect of testamentary capacity, and no undue influence or fraud, the law gives effect to his will, though its provisions are unreasonable and unjust. . . . The testator, in view of his own approaching end, very naturally recurred to the circumstances attending the death of his first wife, which had been the most marked event in his own family history. He unfortunately recalled a declaration made by her on her deathbed, that the contestant, though born in wedlock, was not his daughter. He knew that it was uttered in the delirium of a fatal disease of the brain, but he permitted it to be a source of uneasiness and disquietude, until it made an impression on his mind, in his then feeble and morbid condition, which it had not produced when the incident occurred. He connected it with the circumstances of his occasional absence from home, during the first year of his married life, of her light-hearted youth and gayety, and of suspicions which had fallen upon some who had been early associates of the family; and he was thus led to apprehend, that her statement, though made when she was delirious, was more significant than he had deemed it at the time. He admitted, that he had attached no importance to the declaration, when it was made, and expressed his surprise, that it had not impressed him more deeply. He spoke of it, however, only to his nearest relatives, and evidently appreciated the embarrassment and delicacy of alluding to it at all. He continued to refer to Mrs. Fullerton in terms of kindness and affection, acknowledged that he did not, and could not know that she was not legitimate, and declared, that he should always continue to claim and treat her as his daughter. It is manifest, that his original judgment was right. He dismissed the delirious expression of his wife, as of no moment, when all the circumstances were fresh, and his mind healthy and vigorous; but when his affection for her had waned, with the lapse of time, and he was no longer able to recall the grounds of his former confidence in her fidelity, the recollection of the incident produced undue impression on a mind enfeebled by age and disease. The fact should be referred to weakness and credulity, rather than to insane delusion." So in the case of In re Smith, 24 N. Y. S. 928, it was said: "It is beyond question that he believed that the contestant was not his child, and that such belief was without foundation in fact. But was this belief the creature of his imagination? I cannot but believe from the evidence that 'the stories' which were in circulation had much to do with this belief. The gossip of the neighborhood had lodged in his mind a position, the venom of which, in his sober hours, he was able to restrain, but which, when reason was driven out by rum, exhibited itself in the charge of unchastity of his wife. It must be remembered that on the first occasion in which she says he mentioned the matter to her he said he had heard that Henry was not his child. The continued repetition of this charge for years in drunkenness produced such an effect upon his mind that he came at last to believe it, and at length he reveals his convictions to his priest. Thus the element of a delusion, a belief existing without cause other than the imagination of the deluded, is wanting. The other element of a delusion—that it must be belief maintained in opposition to evidence and argument that would convince the ordinary mind of its falsity—is also wanting. So far as the evidence in this case goes, it does not appear that the wife whose chastity was impugned, nor the good priest to whom he went for advice, made any attempt by argument or evidence to convince him of his error. It must be apparent that if Owen Smith heard the report that contestant was not his child, and that report was true, he labored under no delusion in regard to the matter. If the report was not true, it was still evidence upon which he could act, however unjust and mistaken his action might be, without rendering what he did the result of insanity. If no such report was heard by him, and he never believed his wife to have been untrue to him, then he can be accused of depravity, not of insanity. Upon all the evidence I cannot escape the conclusion that at the time of the execution of the instruments offered for probate Owen Smith was not the subject of a delusion in regard to the paternity of the contestant, and the instruments must, therefore, be admitted to probate." In the case of In re Bennett, 201 Pa. St. 485, 51 Atl. 336, the court said: "But all delusions are not insane delusions. A man may, from information given him, believe that his son is dead, when, in point of fact, the son is alive. The father's belief is a delusion; and if, when his son appears to him in person and explains that the information was false, the father persists in thinking him dead, his belief becomes an insane delusion. The difference between the two species is that one is the product of the reason, and the other a figment of the imagination. The belief of the testator rested upon very practical realities—upon confessions, oral and written, made to him and repeated to others, and upon other circumstances which we need not narrate, but which were almost as convincing as confessions. We do not say whether, in our judgment, the confessions were true or false, or whether the circumstances were or were not misleading; but we do say that both were of a character which might fairly persuade a sensible man to the belief which they induced in the testator. He acted under this conviction just as any sane man would have acted; he became for a time indifferent as to his personal appearance, and moody and reserved in his manner; and these very natural expressions of rational grief are sought to be tortured into exhibitions of madness."

But the belief of a testator that one of his children is illegitimate may be so baseless as to constitute an insane delusion. Drinkhouse's Estate, 14 Phila. (Pa.) 291, 38 Leg. Int. 214; Bell v. Lee, 28 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 150. In Morgan v. Morgan, 30 App. Cas. (D. C.) 436, 13 Ann. Cas. 1037, it was said: "Had there been evidence showing that there was no possible foundation for the impeachment of the mother's chastity before the birth of those children, and that the statements made to the testator of her misconduct were false and had been maliciously made, yet if, in the absence of such proof, the testator believed them to be true and acted under that belief, it still could not be said that he was the victim of an insane delusion. That condition could only be shown by evidence that proof of their falsity, which no sane mind could fairly reject, had been furnished him, notwithstanding which he clung to his unfounded opinion and acted in accordance with it. So in Layer v. Layer, 110 Ky. 542, 62 S. W. 15, the court said: "It is hard to understand how a father could treat his only son in the manner described by a number of witnesses in this record, unless we credit the testimony of the repeated declarations of this man that he was not the father of the boy. There seems to have been absolutely no ground for this belief, which was so exhibited in the conduct of the father as to impress upon the boy's mind the idea that he was an adopted child. There was also some proof of insanity in other members of testator's family, and that he had once set out to drown himself. Independently of the opinions of the witnesses, the jury, on the testimony for appellant, might well have inferred that the testator labored under an insane delusion that he was not the father of appellant, and for that reason left him out in his will. It is true there was testimony for the appellees from which the jury might have drawn the opposite conclusions; but the credibility of the witnesses was to be determined by the jury under proper instructions, and this court is not the tribunal in which it may be decided." In Florey v. Florey, 24 Ala. 241, it was held that the fact that the testator, a white man married to a white woman, believed the principal beneficiary, a negro, to be his son was sufficient to go to the jury on the issue of testamentary capacity.

IV. Influence of Delusion on Testamentary Disposition.

In a few early English cases it was said that the mind is a unit and that an insane delusion on any subject, however disconnected from the testator's disposition of his estate, deprives him of testamentary capacity. Waring v. Waring, 6 Moo. P. C. 341; Smith v. Tebbitt, L. R. 1 P. & D. 398, 36 L. J. P. 97, 16 W. R. 18. However, the doctrine of those cases was repudiated in Banks v. Goodfellow, L. R. 5 Q. B. 549 (followed in Murfett v. Smith, 12 P. D. 116, 57 L. T. N. S. 498 and Smee v. Smee, 5 P. D. 84, 49 L. J. P. 6). And in the United States it has been held uniformly that an insane delusion as to a relative of the testator does not invalidate a will unless the disposition therein made of the testator's estate is materially influenced by the delusion to which he is subject. Florey v. Florey, 24 Ala. 241; Taylor v. McClintock, 87 Ark. 243, 112 S. W. 405; In re Kendrick, 130 Cal. 360, 62 Pac. 605; Lucas v. Parsons, 24 Ga. 640, 71 Am. Dec. 147; Zinkula v. Zinkula (Ia.) 154 N. W. 158; Gesell v. Baugher, 100 Md. 677, 60 Atl. 481; Johnson v. Johnson, 105 Md. 81, 65 Atl. 918, 121 Am. St. Rep. 670; Fraser v. Jennison, 42 Mich. 231, 3 N. W. 892; Rivard v. Rivard, 109 Mich. 98, 66 N. W. 681, 63 Am. St. Rep. 568; In re Forman, 54 Barb. (N. Y.) 274; Colhoun v. Jones, 2 Redf. (N. Y.) 34; In re Hart (Pa.) 89 Atl. 818. "Even a monomaniac may make a valid will if the delusion has no relation to the subject or object of the will, or the persons who would be likely, ordinarily, to be the recipients of his bounty." In re Lang, 9 Misc. 521, 30 N. Y. S. 388. In Lathrop v. American Board of Foreign Missions, 67 Barb. (N. Y.) 590, it was said: "A monomaniac may undoubtedly make a valid will if the delusion which affects the general soundness of his mind has no relation to the subject or object of the will, or the persons who would otherwise be likely, ordinarily, to be the recipients of his bounty; or where, as Judge Gridley states the rule in Stanton v. Wetherwax, 16 Barb. 263, 'the provisions of the will are entirely unconnected with, and of course uninfluenced by, the particular delusions.'" So it was said in Sayre v. Princeton University, 192 Mo. 95, 90 S. W. 787: "Medical men of great learning maintain that a mind diseased on one subject must be classed as unsound, but the law of this State is too well settled to be gainsaid that a man's mind may be impaired in one faculty and practically unimpaired in all others. Derangement of mental faculties does not incapacitate one under our laws from making a will, if it does not render him unable to transact his ordinary business, and incapable of understanding the extent of his property and of appreciating the natural objects of his bounty."

A delusion on the part of a testator that he has been told something derogatory to a relative does not invalidate his will if he does not believe the supposed statement to be true. In re Bartels (Tex.) 164 S. W. 859, wherein the court said: "The only evidence of any insane delusion on the part of Mrs. Bartels is the testimony as to her statement that Mrs. Sonet had told her that Mrs. Milam would poison her. Mrs. Sonet did not make this statement, and, if Mrs. Bartels believed that she had made such statement, she was under a delusion. But, conceding this to be true, the undisputed evidence is that Mrs. Bartels, whenever she mentioned the matter, stated that she did not believe that Mrs. Milam would poison her, and the fact, which is also shown by the undisputed evidence, that she allowed Mrs. Milam to prepare her meals for her, and always waited for her to prepare and bring her meals to her, conclusively shows that she did not believe the statement in regard to Mrs. Milam. This being so, her delusion as to Mrs. Sonet having made the statement could not possibly have influenced her bequest to Mrs. Milam."

A will is not invalidated by a delusion of the testator with respect to a relative who is provided for with reasonable liberality by the will. Rice v. Rice, 50 Mich. 448, 15 N. W. 545; In re Iredale, 53 App. Div. 45, 65 N. Y. S. 533; Cole's Will, 49 Wis. 179, 5 N. W. 346. In the case first cited, it was said: "But the existence of a delusion that his wife was unworthy of esteem, or was abusing him, would be a singular reason for setting aside a gift which he had deliberately made in her favor." In Skinner v. Farquharson, 32 Can. Sup. Ct. 58, reversing 33 Novia Scotia 261, it was held that a delusion that the testator's wife and son had been guilty of a heinous crime would not be deemed to have affected his will, it appearing that after the delusion was entertained he reduced the bequests theretofore made to them, but still left to each of them a liberal amount. The court said: "If the deceased's delusions had influenced the disposal of his property, the respondent's contention should perhaps prevail. But that is a question of fact. And twelve average men could not, reasonably, but come to the conclusion that if that had been the case, if he had had present to his mind, when he went to his solicitor, that his wife was the vile, loathsome creature that he intermittingly had believed her to be, if that had been the impulsive cause of his making a new will, he would not, by that new will, have appointed her guardian of his children and one of his executors; besides bequeathing to her and his son a substantial amount of his property. Such dispositions cannot have been the offspring or result of this delusion. On the contrary the inference from them is that the delusion cannot have been in actual operation at the time when he made them. Then this will cannot be said to be an inofficious one as regards the wife and the son. It was a rational act rationally done, according to the solicitor's evidence. The respondent's reasoning is, in my opinion, fallacious. This testator must have been insane, he argues, because, though under the belief of his wife and son's heinous criminality, yet he did not disinherit them altogether, but left them a considerable portion of his estate. But there is, in that theory, no compatability between the efficient cause and the effect. It is petition principii, it is assuming that the will was made because of that delusion. Now that is the very question to be determined. And I cannot but help thinking that if it were that delusion that had guided the mind of the testator when he made this will, he would not have given a cent to his wife and to his son. If he had disinherited them altogether, they would be justified in contending that it was an insane delusion that had influenced him to do so. But I cannot see that they can base such a contention on the ground that he left them a portion of his estate. What he left them, it is true, is less than what he had left them by the first will, but that he left them anything at all, that he appointed his wife one of the executors, that he appointed her guardian to his infant children, seems to me utterly irreconcilable with the proposition that he was, at that time, acting under the impulse of hatred or of vengeance and under the impression that he had suffered a most grievous tort at their hands."

While an unnatural or unjust disposition of property does not evince insanity (see the note to Morgan v. Morgan, 13 Ann. Cas. 1037), it may afford some evidence that a delusion of the testator as to a relative who was disinherited by the will was effective in producing the will. Evans v. Arnold, 52 Ga. 169.

A delusion of a testator will not be deemed to have effected his will unless it was entertained by him at the time the will was made. In re Merriman, 108 Mich. 454, 86 N. W. 372; Stull v. Stull, 1 Neb. (unofficial) Rep. 380, 389, 96 N. W. 200; Philadelphia Trust, etc. Co. v. Drinkhouse, 17 Phila. (Pa.) 23, 41 Leg. Int. 164.

It requires a very strong case to induce a court to set aside a will at the instance of persons not heirs-at-law at the time the will was made on the ground that the testator entertained towards them an insane aversion, though by an unlooked for casualty they have become the heirs. Cleveland v. Lyne, 5 Bush (Ky.) 323.

CARNAHAN

v.

HAMILTON

Illinois Supreme Court—December 16, 1914.

205 ILL. 508; 107 N. E. 210.

Appeal — Questions Reviewable — Failure to Ask Peremptory Instruction.

On a direct appeal to the Supreme Court, the failure to ask a peremptory instruction in the trial court does not preclude the contention that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence.

Wills — Testamentary Capacity — Age and Infirmary.

Infirmary from old age does not render a person incapable of making a will unless it has so far impaired the testator's mind that he is incapable of understanding his business at the time he is engaged in making the will.

Same.

To sustain an allegation of want of testamentary capacity, something more than mere physical disease and old age on the part of the testator must be shown.

Insane Delusion.

An "insane delusion" which will render one incapable of making a will is a belief in a state or condition of things in the existence of which no rational person would believe, or a belief in something impossible in the nature of things, or impossible under circumstances surrounding the individual, and which refuses to yield either to evidence or reason.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Prejudice of the testator against a relative is not ground for setting aside a will unless it can be explained upon no other ground than that of an insane delusion.

[See note at end of this case.]

Unequal Division as Indicating Incapacity.

The unequal division of property among his heirs does not itself justify a finding of want of testamentary capacity, as the testator has the right to dispose of his property as he thinks best.

[See 13 Ann. Cas. 1044.]

Same.

Unequal disposition of property is a circumstance which the jury may consider in connection with other evidence in passing on the mental capacity of the testator.

Ancestral Insanity — Presumption.

It cannot be presumed that the testator is insane merely because his father was insane, as, until the disease manifests its presence, its existence cannot be inferred in the mind of the person in question.

Belief in Spiritualism and Witchcraft.

The fact that a person believes in witchcraft, clairvoyance, spiritual influences, pre-sentiments of the occurrences of future events, dreams, mind-reading, and the like does not show testamentary incapacity as a man's belief cannot be made a test of sanity.

[See Ann. Cas. 1914C 1049; Id. 1915D 573.]

Excitability as Evidence of Incapacity.

The fact that testator shed tears when conversing about his deceased daughter, or grew excited when talking about business affairs that were troubling him, does not in itself prove testamentary incapacity.

Disease as Evidence of Incapacity.

Hardening of the arteries is no proof of testator's mental incapacity without a showing that it actually did affect the mind.

Test of Testamentary Capacity.

A person who is capable of transacting ordinary business is capable of making a valid will.

[See generally Ann. Cas. 1915A 362.]

Same.

To incapacitate the person from making a will, the derangement must be of that character which renders him incapable of understanding the effect and consequences of his act; it must be a want of capacity which prevents him from understanding the relation of cause and effect in ordinary business matters.

Foolish Conduct as Evidence of Incapacity.

That an old man, a widower 72 years of age, after his daughter's death, proposed marriage to two different women, is not very strong proof of unsoundness of mind, especially where he was unhappy with his home life with his son-in-law.

Evidence of Incapacity Insufficient.

In a will contest, a finding that a testator 72 years of age was wanting in testamentary capacity held against the great weight of the evidence.

Evidence — No Change in Testator's Condition Observed.

In a will contest in which it was claimed that testator did not have testamentary capacity, a witness may state that he had observed no change in testator, and that he was, on the day the will was executed, the same as he was any other day the witness ever saw him.

Testamentary Capacity — Comprehension of Estate "Without Prompting."

An instruction in a will case basing mental capacity on understanding the nature and extent of his property "without prompting" is erroneous, where there is no evidence that he was prompted.

Same.

It is not a rule of law that testator should have sufficient strength of mind to know what property he owned "without prompting."

Instructions — Injustice of Will.

An instruction on mental capacity of a testator that testator, if mentally unsound, did not have the right to cut off his grandchild with $100, was erroneous as assuming that only $100 was given, where there was evidence that she received personal property in addition to the money.

Same.

An instruction on testamentary capacity that if testator was of sound mind he had the right to cut off his grandchild, as only heir at law, and had the right to give his property to persons who would not have been heirs at law had he died without a will, but if he did not possess a sound mind or memory then he had no right to cut her off and give his property to persons not his heirs, is erroneous as having a tendency to permit the jury to decide whether the will was just or unjust as to the various relatives.

Instruction Not Warranted by Evidence.

Where at the time a testator made a will there was no evidence that he was suffering from mental derangement, anger, or jealousy, an instruction based on those facts is erroneous.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Shelby county:
JETT, Judge.

Action to contest will. Mary E. Carnahan, plaintiff, and Nathan Hamilton, executor, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Whitaker, Ward & Pugh and Steidley & Crockett for appellant.

William H. Ragan and George B. Rhoads for appellee.

[509] CARTER, J.—This was a bill filed by appellee, Mary E. Carnahan, to contest the will of her grandfather, Payton A. Bond, of whom she was the only heir-at-law. After an answer and replication were filed an issue of fact was submitted to the [510] jury as to whether the instrument in question was the last will and testament of Payton A. Bond, deceased. The jury found in the negative. A motion for new trial was overruled and a decree entered in accordance with the verdict. Thereupon this appeal was prayed.

The will was executed on April 4, 1910, at which time Bond was seventy-two years of age. He lived until May, 1913. His wife died some fifteen years previous and he never afterward re-married. At the time of his wife's death they had one child living, Julia Ann. After his wife died Bond lived on his farm in Shelby county with said daughter, Julia Ann, and her husband, William Carnahan, until her death, January 25, 1910. She left surviving two children, one of whom was appellee, then fifteen months old, and the other a baby just born and who died within a few days after its mother. At the time of making the will Bond had three sisters living and one sister deceased, who left surviving her several children and descendants of deceased children. Very shortly after the will was executed Bond took a trip to Oklahoma, where he visited relatives. After his return he lived with one of his sisters in the city of Pana, Christian county, Illinois, until the time of his death. At the time the will was made he owned 160 acres of land in Shelby county, upon which he and his son-in-law were then residing, besides some personal property. Some time thereafter he purchased a house and lot in Pana, which he continued to own until the time of his death. By his will he gave his grand-daughter, appellee herein, $100 and all his household goods and effects. To his sisters then living, and the heirs of the deceased sister, he gave the 160-acre farm, the will further providing that all other personal property, goods and chattels should go to the heirs heretofore mentioned. The will contained no residuary clause as to real estate, and consequently the house and lot that he afterward acquired in the city of Pana would descend to his grand-daughter, appellee herein.

[511] The bill averred that Payton A. Bond, the testator, was of unsound mind and memory at the time of the execution of the will; that at that time he was suffering from insane delusions and therefore did not possess testamentary capacity. Upon the trial of the case appellant produced forty witnesses who testified they were acquainted with the testator, and that in their opinion he was capable of transacting ordinary business affairs and understood the nature of his property and the natural objects of his bounty, relating various conversations they had had with him during the last few years of his life. Among this number of old acquaintances and neighbors,—farmers, physicians and bankers,—most of them having known him all the way from ten to fifty years, and many testified their acquaintance had been of an intimate nature. On behalf of appellee thirteen witnesses were introduced, the majority of them relatives of her father. Most of these thirteen witnesses testified they had seen and talked with Bond near the time he executed the will, and that at that time they did not think he was of sound mind and memory or had sufficient mental capacity to transact ordinary business, or was able mentally to understand the extent of his property or who his relatives were. It is apparent, however, from the testimony of at least one or two of these witnesses, that they were not certain on this point. The allegations of the bill admit, and it is conceded in the briefs of appellee, that subsequent to the execution of the will the testator took care of and transacted his business. The theory of counsel for appellee is that mental incapacity existed at the time of the execution of the will by reason of delusions, jealousy and sickness, from which he subsequently recovered though he never fully regained his ordinary health.

Appellant contends that the verdict is manifestly against the great weight of the evidence. Appellee contends that this question cannot be raised in this court as no motion was made at the close of all of the evidence asking for a [512] peremptory instruction, citing in support of this contention Dowie v. Sutton, 227 Ill. 183, 81 N. E. 395, 118 Am. St. Rep. 266. That case was brought to this court by way of the Appellate Court. What was there said about the failure to give a peremptory instruction being a waiver of the question as to whether there was sufficient evidence to support the verdict has no bearing on a case like this, brought here directly from the trial court. In that case the court cited Long v. Long, 107 Ill. 210, where it was said the rule is well settled by the previous decisions of this court that in will contests like the present "the finding of the jury is conclusive unless clearly against the weight of evidence [citing authorities], and in this respect they are put upon the same footing with cases at law. Such being the case, it would seem to follow—and we so hold—the finding of the Appellate Court in conformity with the verdict of the jury is conclusive upon all questions of fact. Ordinarily the finding of the facts by the Appellate Court, in a chancery proceeding, is not conclusive on this court, but this class of cases, under the construction given to our statute, does not fall within the general rule, but such cases are treated in this respect, as we have already seen, as actions at law." This case was properly brought directly to this court because a freehold was involved. In all cases of this kind thus brought here this court has always reviewed the evidence regardless of whether a peremptory instruction was asked of the trial court, and has reversed such cases when in the judgment of the court the verdict of the jury was clearly and manifestly against the weight of the testimony.

The physician who attended the testator at the time of his death had known him for about ten years and testified that he had hardening of the arteries, and that this condition, in the three or four years before his death, had gradually grown worse; that he had poor circulation, generally, but mostly complained of pain in his feet; that his death was caused by gangrene, beginning in one of his feet, which condition was superinduced by hardening of the arteries; [513] that a man of the age of the testator at that time who has been active in his life is more or less troubled with hardening of the arteries. We judge from the record that the testator had been in fair health most of his life. There is evidence tending to show that he had an attack of la grippe in December, 1909, and remained in bed until near the middle of February; that he was troubled at the same time with piles and fistula; that on this account he was unable to attend either the funeral of his daughter on January 25, 1910, or that of the new-born child four days later. We think the weight of the evidence shows that he was up and around during the month of March that year, going on business or otherwise to Pana, Assumption and other near-by places. There is some evidence on the part of appellee that during this time he complained that his head troubled him. Two days after the will was drawn Dr. Martin, who had treated him in the preceding January for the "grip," testified he was called from Tower Hill to treat him; that on April 6 in question he found him in bed with a high temperature and apparently suffering intensely, and that the cause was an abscess just over the nose, in the forehead; that he saw him later, on April 25, and the abscess had broken and he was practically recovered. He testified, also, that he noticed that the testator's arteries were hardening, and other conditions arising from old age. This is substantially all the testimony in the record bearing on the testator's physical condition during the last three or four years of his life. So far as the record discloses he was in fair health, considering his age, after April, 1910, until his final sickness, which lasted only a few days.

In the forenoon of April 4, 1910, testator left his farm, where he was residing with his son-in-law, William Carnahan, and walked to the home of a neighbor, Joseph Kelly, living about three miles and a half away, where he had the will in question drawn by Kelly. Charles Simmons, another neighbor, who lived about a mile south of the Bond home, [514] testified that he had met the testator going to Kelly's, and the two, having been acquainted for years and having often transacted business together, stopped and had quite a visit; that during the conversation Bond asked Simmons if he had seen Kelly pass there that morning, stating that he was going to Kelly's to have his will made; that he was going to take a trip out west and might meet with an accident or might get sick, and he wanted his business matters fixed up before he went away. Simmons further stated that after they parted testator went on toward Kelly's home. Joseph Kelly, who drafted the instrument here in question, died in May thereafter. His wife testified that the testator came to their house the morning of April 4 and talked with her husband about making his will. The witness had known testator all his life and talked with him on that day. Her husband and testator sat down at a table to write the will, Mrs. Kelly leaving the room. After the will was written, some time that afternoon, Bond left to get someone to witness it, and came back with Isaac Lockwood and George W. Simpson, who signed as witnesses. Mrs. Kelly further testified that in her conversation with testator he spoke of his sisters and said they were always good to him and that he wanted to leave something to them, and also spoke of his grand-daughter (appellee herein) in a friendly way; that he said nothing while he was there to indicate that he was angry with any of his relatives. Lockwood and Simpson were plowing in a field about a quarter of a mile from Kelly's house when the testator asked them to witness his will. They consented and walked with him to Kelly's, where the will was signed and witnessed. They talked with him in a general way from the field to the house, and both testified that he showed no anger at the time the will was signed or at any time that day when they saw him. Both of these witnesses had known him for years. Mr. and Mrs. Kelly, Lockwood and Simpson were the only ones present with testator in the house at the time the will was signed and witnessed. [515] The three that were living all testified that they believed him to be of sound mind and memory at that time, and that he was able to transact the ordinary business affairs of life and understood what property he owned, who were his heirs and the natural objects of his bounty. Charles Simmons testified that testator on that or the next evening came to his house and drank a cup of coffee at the supper table, remaining there, visiting, some twenty or thirty minutes. Simmons and Simpson saw him frequently between the time the will was drawn and the date of his death, and both testified that they thought he had testamentary capacity at all of their interviews. Many farmers who lived near Bond, and a number of merchants and business men who had known him and met him before, about the time and after the will was drawn, all testified substantially to the same effect,—that in their judgment he was a man of sound and disposing mind and memory. The physician who attended him during his last illness testified that in his judgment Bond's mental condition was such in 1910, and until his death, that he was able to transact ordinary business affairs, understand what property he owned and who were his relatives. He stated on cross-examination that a person having hardening of the arteries was sometimes affected thereby so that he might be predisposed to irrational likes and dislikes. There was, however, nothing in the testimony of this witness that indicated that he was of the opinion that the testator was predisposed in this way. Dr. Martin, to whose testimony we have heretofore referred with reference to treatment for an abscess on April 6, 1910, stated on direct examination for appellant that in his judgment, in the years 1909, 1910 and 1911, testator was competent to transact the ordinary affairs of life and understood the extent of his property, who were his heirs and the natural objects of his bounty. He stated on cross-examination that on April 6, 1910, when he treated testator for this abscess, he did not think testator was in condition to transact ordinary [516] business, and that from what the testator said to him then and what he saw, the condition he found him in was one that in his opinion had existed for several days. We do not understand this witness' testimony as stating, as contended by counsel for appellee, that he (the doctor) thought testator lacked testamentary capacity at that time, but only that he was in such pain then that witness would not say he was in a condition to transact ordinary business.

There was nothing in the testimony of any of the forty witnesses who testified for the appellant, except that of Dr. Martin, to which we have just referred, that could in any way be construed as indicating that the testator was not of sound and disposing mind and memory at or about the time the will was executed or at any other time, or that there was anything in his actions or talk that in the slightest degree indicated that he was possessed of an insane delusion or harbored an unreasonable jealousy against any of his relatives or friends. It would serve no useful purpose to set out in detail the testimony of all these forty witnesses. They are all in substantial accord upon the issue here involved.

Mrs. Alta Rowley, who was a niece of William Carnahan, appellee's father, lived in testator's family from the time of his daughter's death, in January, 1910, until June after the will was executed. She was at that time seventeen years of age and unmarried. She testified that she thought testator was not of sound mind from February to June of that year; that she did not mean that he was of unsound mind at all times, but that he had spells, and when he had these spells he was not of sound mind; that usually he talked naturally, just as anyone else would, but would get worked up and nervous at times. The witness further testified that while she worked there Bond proposed marriage to her; that she advised him to get someone older than she was, and he replied she was his choice; that he would only live a few years, and if she married him she would have a [517] home after he was gone and could take someone younger; that he never talked to her about marriage but this once; that she overheard him ask Mrs. Halbrook, who was then living there, to marry him.

Mrs. Mary Halbrook (now Mrs. Carnahan, the wife of appellee's father), testified that from February 20 to April 4, 1910, testator was not of sound mind and memory, did not understand what property he owned or its value or who his relatives were; that she had known the testator as long as she was old enough to remember, and that she was keeping house for him and Carnahan, with the assistance of the witness last referred to, after Mrs. Carnahan's death until she married Carnahan, in June of that year. She testified that the testator proposed marriage to her in March, 1910; that during that conversation he asked her if she would drop one of her admirers and marry him; that if she would do that she would have a home the rest of her days. She testified that during that or another conversation on the subject he asked her whether she was engaged to Oscar Pope or William Carnahan, saying it was all right if she was going to marry the former but he did not want her to marry Carnahan; that he stated that if she did not marry him he would change his will and go out west; that when she refused him he became sullen and remained in that condition for several days; that during these talks about marriage he would sometimes cry and seem quite excited; that the last conversation he had with her about this matter was April 4, 1910; that she did not see him again until late that evening. Mrs. Carnahan further testified that when Bond came home after the will was drawn he was taken sick in the night, and the next morning Dr. Martin was called and treated him for the abscess heretofore referred to. The witness further stated that during her conversations with the testator he had talked about some money he said his father had buried on the old home place by a stump, and that he had dug for this money and believed he would be able to find it. The witness further [518] testified that she had been married three times and that she had been divorced from her second husband; that shortly before the testator had proposed to her she had been engaged to Oscar Pope, but had broken that engagement prior to her talks with the testator.

William Carnahan, the father of appellee, testified that he believed that when the testator left home on the morning of April 4, 1910, he knew what he was talking about and had sense enough to know who his relatives were and what property he owned. He testified that after the testator's daughter's death he (the witness) told Bond he did not know what he was going to do with appellee; that he did not see how he could take care of her and keep the home; that he had about decided to put her in an orphanage; that testator broke down and cried and said to the witness to get somebody to come and keep house; that he did not want the child taken away; that it was not right to take her to a strange place; that because of this they got Mrs. Halbrook and Alta Hoover (now Mrs. Rowley) to keep house for them and look after the little girl; that he (the witness) had a sale of some personal property on testator's farm in March, 1910, and that the testator on the day of the sale began piling up some chairs and a patent churn and washing machine and articles of furniture that he owned and said he was going to sell them at the sale; that he looked at the witness with a glare in his eyes when talking about the subject; that he finally decided not to sell the goods and said he would leave them to Mary, the appellee; that testator was a peculiar man, with a very high temper at times, and that he would get mad and go all to pieces, and you could not reason with him during these mad spells; that during the spring of 1910 testator had a row with him about the way he was plowing the garden. The testimony in the record tends to show that William Carnahan had trouble at one time with his wife, testator's daughter, and that they [519] were separated, but that several years before her death they began living together again.

George Kelly, the brother of the man who drew the instrument in question, testified that he met the testator on the morning of April 4 at the cross-roads near his brother's place and that they had quite a long talk; that the testator talked about his proposal to Mary Halbrook; that he told Kelly of a dream he had of money in a glass jar buried by an old stump; that during the conversation testator cried and wrung his hands and waved his arms to such an extent as to scare a team of horses that approached, driven by a lady, so that they wheeled around and started in the other direction and witness was compelled to help her get them under control again. The witness was not asked, and did not state, just what he did with his own horse and buggy during these proceedings. This witness testified he did not think the testator was of sound mind. He is a brother-in-law of appellee's father.

The wife of George Kelly, sister of William Carnahan, also testified that she did not think the testator was of sound mind at the time the will was executed; that she saw him at her house on April 5, 1910, and that the way he talked then she did not know whether he had mental power to know what property he owned or not; that he told her on that day that he had fixed it so that the appellee would get everything.

Mr. and Mrs. George Morgan testified that they lived near the home of testator; that on, or a day or two before, the fourth of April (they could not fix the date with certainty) the testator visited them at their home and was complaining bitterly of William Carnahan; that he was also complaining of his forehead. Mrs. Morgan testified that what he said did not sound sensible, and that it sounded "like a man that was insane." Her reason for this belief was, apparently, that he stated he was not going to stay any longer on his farm because Carnahan did not want him [520] around, and that she thought this sounded like an insane man. Both she and her husband testified that he said he had had trouble with Carnahan about plowing the garden, and other things. Both of them stated that they did not think he was of sound mind on the day in question.

Some of the witnesses for the appellee testified to additional details as to what they alleged were the testator's peculiarities about the time the will was executed. Two of them stated they heard him talking aloud to himself about his property when confined to his bed with la grippe, the winter previous to the execution of the will. Others testified as to his worrying over business affairs on the ground that some money he had loaned was not paid according to agreement, and that he expressed a fear he would not have enough to live on in his old age. Several witnesses also stated that the testator told them he was worrying as to the future life of his daughter, until he found something, by studying the Bible, with reference to a woman dying in childbirth that greatly relieved him.

We have set out, in the main, the substantial facts relied on by counsel for appellee to show the mental incapacity of the testator. It is urged that he was possessed of insane delusions. The principal grounds relied on to support this argument were his proposal of marriage to the two women, Mrs. Halbrook and Miss Hoover, his alleged unreasonable prejudice toward his son-in-law, William Carnahan, and his extreme excitability when talking about his daughter's death and other matters of great interest to him.

Infirmity from old age does not render a person incapable of making a will, unless such infirmity has so far impaired the testator's mind that he is incapable of understanding his business at the time he is engaged in making the will. (Schmidt v. Schmidt, 201 Ill. 191, 66 N. E. 371.) To sustain an allegation of want of testamentary capacity something more must be shown than mere physical disease and old age on the part of the testator. (Woodman v. Illinois Trust, [521] etc. Bank, 211 Ill. 578, 71 N. E. 1099, and cases cited; Waters v. Waters, 222 Ill. 26, 78 N. E. 1, 113 Am. St. Rep. 359.) An insane delusion which will render one incapable of making a will is difficult to define. This court has said that it is a belief in a state or condition of things in the existence of which no rational person would believe. (Schneider v. Manning, 121 Ill. 376, 12 N. E. 287; Snell v. Weldon, 243 Ill. 496, 90 N. E. 1061.) Again, it has been stated that an insane delusion is a belief in something impossible in the nature of things, or impossible under the circumstances surrounding the individual, which refuses to yield either to evidence or reason. (Scott v. Scott, 212 Ill. 597, 72 N. E. 708; Drum v. Capps, 240 Ill. 524, 88 N. E. 1020; Louby v. Key, 258 Ill. 558, 101 N. E. 946.) Prejudice of the testator against a relative is not ground for setting aside a will unless it can be explained upon no other ground than that of an insane delusion. A person may be prejudiced against some of his children or persons who are the natural objects of his bounty and make unfair remarks about them without having a proper foundation for his conduct, but it does not necessarily follow that he is without testamentary capacity. Unreasonable prejudice against relatives is not ordinarily ground for invalidating a will. That can only be done when the testator's aversion is shown to be the result of an insane delusion, his conduct not being able to be explained on any other ground. (Nicewander v. Nicewander, 151 Ill. 156, 37 N. E. 698; Schmidt v. Schmidt, supra; Scott v. Scott, supra; Snell v. Weldon, 239 Ill. 279, 87 N. E. 1022; Drum v. Capps, supra.) An unequal division of testator's property among his heirs does not, of itself, justify the court in holding that testator did not possess testamentary capacity. The testator has the undoubted right to dispose of his property as he thinks best, and the fact that it is unequally divided among those who have claims on his bounty does not impair the validity of the will. It is only a circumstance which the jury may consider, in connection with other evidence, in passing upon the soundness of mind of the testator. (Cunniff v. Cunniff, 255 Ill. 407, 99 N. E. 654; Schmidt v. Schmidt, [522] supra.) It cannot be presumed that the testator is insane merely because his father was insane. Until the disease manifests its presence we cannot infer its existence in the mind of the person in question. (Snow v. Benton, 28 Ill. 306.) The fact that a person believes in witchcraft, clairvoyance, spiritual influences, presentiments of the occurrences of future events, dreams, mind-reading, and the like, does not necessarily affect the validity of his will. Manifestly, a man's belief cannot be made a test of sanity. When we leave the domain of experience or knowledge and enter upon the field of belief the range is limitless, extending from the highest degree of rationality to the wildest dreams of superstition. What to one man may be a reasonable belief is to another wholly unreasonable. While, under certain circumstances, belief in what men generally understand to be supernatural may tend to prove insanity, it is well known that some of the brightest and clearest intellects have honestly believed in spiritualism and other apparently supernatural influences. (Whipple v. Eddy, 161 Ill. 114, 43 N. E. 789, and cases cited.) It is the settled law that testamentary capacity cannot be determined, alone, by what one believes, nor by the character of the tales he tells concerning hidden treasure, spirits, spooks and supernatural things. Where the acts of the testator in the conduct of his business affairs and in his ordinary life are uniformly intelligent, rational and reasonable, proof that he has related stories concerning hidden treasures that in no way appear to have influenced him in the execution of his will does not prove testamentary incapacity. (Wait v. Westfall, 161 Ind. 648, 68 N. E. 271; Middleditch v. Williams, 45 N. J. Eq. 726, 17 Atl. 828, 4 L.R.A. 738.) The fact that the testator shed tears when conversing about his daughter or grew excited when talking about business affairs that were troubling him does not, in itself, prove that he lacked testamentary capacity at the time he executed the will. Whether hardening of the arteries has affected the mind is not a question of what the tendency of that disease [523] is, but the proof must be as to its effect in the particular case. (Brainard v. Brainard, 259 Ill. 613, 103 N. E. 45; Drum v. Capps, supra.) It is difficult to adopt any absolute or fixed rule as to what will constitute insanity in all cases. Temperament, nervous force and physical organization differ in infinite degree, and these may all have a direct or remote influence upon the intellect. While each case must depend in some measure upon its special facts, it is the settled law that a person who is capable of transacting ordinary business is capable of making a valid will; that is, if he is capable of acting in all ordinary affairs he possesses testamentary capacity. The derangement, to incapacitate the person from making a valid will, must be of that character which renders him incapable of understanding the effect and consequences of his act. It must be a want of capacity which prevents him from reasoning correctly and from understanding the relation of cause and effect in ordinary business matters. (Meeker v. Meeker, 75 Ill. 260.) That an old man in the condition of the testator, after his daughter's death should want a home and would be looking for a wife and companion certainly cannot, under the circumstances shown in this record, be very strong proof of unsoundness of mind. Such a desire is usually recognized as strong proof of a sane mind. If his home life with his son-in-law was not pleasant,—and the evidence tends strongly to show it was not,—it would be most natural that he should be thinking of how he could bring about proper home surroundings for himself. On this point, however, the character of the evidence tending to prove this desire on the testator's part may well be subject to close scrutiny. All who testified to this fact, with one exception, were relatives of William Carnahan. One of them was his present wife, whose experiences in matrimony, as shown by her own evidence, are certainly not such as to justify any strong reliance upon her statement that such an offer of marriage was proof of an unsound mind.

[524] Counsel for appellee contend that the record shows conclusively that there was no ground for the testator having a dislike for his son-in-law, William Carnahan. A number of the witnesses testified that the testator had said to them that he always got along well with Carnahan and had been treated right by him. Other witnesses, however, some of whom testified for appellee, said positively that the testator claimed that he had trouble with Carnahan. Manifestly, the conditions were such that he did not care to live at his old home, on his own farm, after his daughter's death.

If it be admitted that Dr. Martin is correct as to the date (April 6, 1910), when he treated the testator for the abscess above his nose, it is most improbable from the evidence in the record that this abscess was causing him severe pain or making him trouble in marked degree on April 4, the day the will was executed. No person testifying for appellee testified that he did or said anything on that day that indicated that he was suffering physically. If the witness George Kelly is correct as to the time when he met the testator on the road to his brother's, and if his testimony is conceded to be correct as to the talk and actions of Bond at that time, it by no means follows that this proves that the testator lacked testamentary capacity on the day in question. The testimony of all the witnesses in the record proves conclusively that for some time before the execution of the will the testator had been up and around and attending to his business affairs; that he was physically able to walk miles by himself; that the son-in-law did not seem to think it was at all improper for the testator to leave home at any time he desired; that he went alone, on foot, to Joseph Kelly's house on the day in question, and the four witnesses who were present on that day at that house and talked with him saw or heard nothing that indicated in the slightest degree that he was not as mentally sound and vigorous as would be expected of any man of his age. The evidence also shows conclusively that although he did not [525] return to his home until the next evening, or later, the son-in-law or his present wife did not think such actions on testator's part were at all out of the way. Furthermore, there is not a scintilla of testimony offered by any witness that after April, 1910, the testator did or said anything that indicated that he was not of sound mind or memory. It is conceded by counsel for appellee that there is no evidence of that character. The witnesses who testified for appellant as to the testamentary capacity of testator were most of them fully as well qualified by long acquaintance with him, and in every other way, to judge of his mental capacity as any of the witnesses for appellee. The great majority of witnesses for appellant were not interested in any manner in this litigation. The same cannot be said as to the majority of the witnesses who testified for appellee. On this record we can reach no other conclusion than that the great weight of the testimony is against the verdict of the jury on the question of the testator's testamentary capacity.

The attesting witness Simpson was asked the question what Bond's appearance was on the day that he signed the will. The witness replied that "he was just that day as he was any other day that I ever saw him." This answer was stricken out by the trial court on motion of counsel for appellee, as was another answer of the same witness that he did not observe any change in testator, and the same ruling was made as to a question asked of the other subscribing witness. The trial court's ruling on this question is in conflict with the rule laid down by this court in Kellan v. Kellan, 258 Ill. 256, 101 N. E. 614, where we said that it was proper for the witnesses to state that they had not observed any change in the mental condition of the testator; that as witnesses can testify as to the mental condition of the testator before and after the time the will was executed, this would necessarily result in a direct or indirect comparison.

Counsel for appellant insist that the court erred in giving various instructions for appellee. Among others, they [526] urge that instruction 5 so given was incorrect. That instruction states that the testator, at the time he executed the will, in order to possess the sound mind and memory required by law, must have had "the strength and clearness of mind, sufficient to know in general, without prompting, the nature and extent of his property, the persons who were the natural objects of his bounty and their relation to him and natural claims upon him, and he must know and understand what he is doing and be able to keep things in his mind long enough to form a rational judgment in regard to them." In view of the nature of the evidence in this record we think this instruction was wrong in using the term "without prompting." There is not the slightest evidence in the record that he required or had any prompting at the time the will was executed. On the contrary, all the evidence as to what he said and did at the time the will was executed showed that he was not prompted in any way. Furthermore, this court has never laid down the rule of law that it was essential that testator should have sufficient strength of mind to know what property he owned "without prompting." So far as we are advised such a rule has never been laid down by any authority. Nothing was said by this court in Piper v. Andricks, 209 Ill. 564, 71 N. E. 18, that should be construed as holding to the contrary.

Appellee's instruction 10 is also criticised. It stated that the jury were instructed "that while, as a matter of law, Payton A. Bond, if he at the time was of sound mind and memory, had a right to cut off his grandchild, Mary A. Carnahan, (who, had he died without a will, would have inherited all of his property), with but $100, and had a right to give the rest of his property to persons who would not have been his heirs-at-law had he died without making a will, yet if, in fact, at the time he made said will he did not possess the sound mind and memory required by law, then he had no right to cut her off with this $100 and give his property to persons not his heirs." This instruction is erroneous [527] in assuming that he gave his grand-daughter only $100. The will showed that he gave her also the personal property that he owned at the time of his death. Counsel for appellee argue that the testimony shows that this personal property amounted to very little. The record is not at all clear as to its value. But there is a more serious objection to the instruction. The tendency of an instruction so worded would be to cause the jury to think they had a right to decide whether the will was just or unjust as to the various relatives. This court has frequently said in contests concerning wills, where the testator has made, or seemingly made, an unequal or inequitable distribution of his property among those related to him, that there is a disposition in the minds of most men to seek to hold the will invalid; that such an inclination has been found to exist in the minds of most jurors to such an extent that it cannot be controlled by instructions; that while the law is that the testator may make such disposition of his property as he sees fit and may bestow his bounty where he wishes, "the common mind is disinclined to recognize it, and jurors will too frequently seize upon any pretext for finding a verdict in accordance with what they regard as natural justice." (Nieman v. Schnitker, 181 Ill. 400, 55 N. E. 151; and cases cited.) The jury has nothing to do with the equity or inequity of the will. (Rutherford v. Morris, 77 Ill. 397.) Appellee had no property rights in testator's property and therefore could not be deprived or "cut off" from them. Instructions similar to this were held error in Brainard v. Brainard, supra, and Rowcliffe v. Belson, 261 Ill. 566, Ann. Cas. 1915A 359, 104 N. E. 268.

Instruction 8 given for appellee was also erroneous in telling the jury that if the testator "at times had attacks of mental derangement, anger and jealousy, which, while the attacks were upon him, rendered him, during their continuance, of unsound mind and memory," and if they believed, from the evidence, that at the time he executed the purported will he was suffering from one of these attacks, they [528] should find the will not valid. There is no evidence that at the time he executed the will at the house of Joseph Kelly he was moved by anger or jealousy or was suffering from one of these attacks.

Counsel for appellant argue that several other instructions given for appellee were erroneous. While they may be subject to criticism in some particulars along the same lines as the instructions already referred to, we do not deem them so misleading as to require consideration at our hands.

What has already been said, together with what is laid down in the cases cited in this opinion, indicates clearly the general rules of law that should govern in the trial of a case of this character. To discuss in detail all of these various questions raised would be to unduly extend this opinion, already too long.

The decree of the circuit court must be reversed and the cause remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings not in conflict with the views herein expressed.

Reversed and remanded.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that the fact that a testator entertains an unfounded prejudice against certain of his relatives does not ordinarily establish that he is subject to an insane delusion or affect his testamentary capacity. The cases on this subject are reviewed in the note to Dibble v. Currier, reported ante, this volume, at page 1.

COFFEY ET AL.

v.

MILLER ET AL.

Kentucky Court of Appeals—October 21,

*160 Ky. 415; 169 S. W. 852.Wills — Testamentary Capacity — Insane Delusion.

An "insane delusion" is an idea or belief which springs spontaneously from a diseased or perverted mind without reason or without foundation in fact. It is distinguishable from a belief which is founded upon prejudice or aversion, no matter how unreasonable or unfounded the prejudice or aversion may be, and if it is the product of a reasoning mind, no matter how slight the evidence on which it is based, it cannot be classed as an insane delusion.

Same.

Evidence in a will contest held insufficient to show testamentary incapacity, in that testator had an insane delusion that certain of his nieces and nephews had mistreated him.

[415] TURNER, J.—Armstead Miller, a bachelor over sixty years of age, died in Wayne County on the 21st of December, 1911, leaving an estate valued at forty thousand dollars or more, and leaving as his heirs at law two brothers and a number of nieces and nephews, the children of deceased brothers and sisters.

He left an original will dated the 18th day of June, 1905, which is as follows:

"I Armstead Miller of the county of Wayne and State of Kentucky being of sound mind and disposing memory do ordain and publish this as my last will and testament hereby revoking all others heretofore made by me.

[416] "First: It is my will and desire that all my just debts be paid out of my estate. It is further my will and desire and I hereby give and bequeath to my cousin F. C. Miller Ten Thousand Dollars to have in cash or real estate either one that I may have in my possession at my Death. For her kindness shown me during my sickness.

"Second and it is further my will and desire and I hereby give and bequeath to my Beloved Brother John W. M. Miller the Remainder all and every interest that I may own or have in any real or personal property or estate at the time of my death.

"It is my further Will and I hereby appoint Brother John W. M. Miller my executor of this my last will and testament, and request the county court of Wayne county not to Request Bond of said Miller.

"Given under my hand and seal this 18th day of June, 1905.

"ARMSTEAD MILLER."

On the 20th of August, 1908, he executed what is called a codicil to this will, which is as follows:

"Codicil.

"It is my will and desire to Dispose of my property at my death in the following Way and Manner.

"I bequeath to my cousin, F. C. Miller, Ten Thousand for her kindness shown me during my sickness.

"I also Bequeath to my nieces and nephews all their lawful parts except four namely, Maud Shearer, P. M. Coffey, C. L. Cooper, which they shall pay four thousand Dollars each of them out of their parts which shall be equally Divided among the other heirs for their unkindness shown me in my sickness, and also being agains me in the Burning of my Barns and shooting in my House.

"I bequeath to my nephew F. F. Cooper Ten Dollars and this is to be in full of his part for his unkindness shown me in the Burning of my Barnes and shooting in my House and also for the way he conducted the goods business for me while a Pardner.

"this is my last Will and Testament given under my hand signed and sealed this 20th day August, 1908.

"A. MILLER."

[417] On the 15th day of December, 1911, and just six days before his death, another codicil was executed by him, which is as follows:

"Sumpter, Ky., Dec. 15, 1911.

"Coticell of A. Miller.

"Willed to F. C. Miller the amount of Ten Thousand Dollars.

"Willed to Robert Hurst the amount of One Thousand Dollars.

"This same to be paid him after he becomes of age—that is 21 yrs.

"Willed to William Homer Hurst Five Hundred Dollars; this sum to be paid when he becomes of age—21 yrs. old.

"Willed to P. E. Cooper, my nephew Five Dollars, no more or no less.

"Willed to F. F. Cooper Five Dollars, no more or no less.

"Willed to Clem Cooper his equal share after his debts are paid, that he owes me.

"Willed to Miller Cooper his equal share after his debts are paid, that he owes me.

"Willed to Janson Cooper his equal share after his debts are paid, that he owes me.

"Willed to M. H. Miller his equal share after his debts are paid, that he owes me.

"I will to Pearson Miller my nephew his equal part.

"I will to Pearson Coffey, my nephew Five Hundred Dollars, less than his equal share for his unkindness shown me during my trouble, The Burning of the barn.

"I will to Maud Coffey Shearer, my niece, Five Hundred Dollars less than her equal share for her unkindness to me during trouble, that is the burning of the barn.

"I will to Frank Miller my brother, his equal share, after all his debts are paid to me that he owes me.

"I will my brother Marion an equal share.

"I don't want my land that Marion and I own divided until his death.

"A. MILLER."

"Witness: G. M. Ferrell,

"Witness: 'Miss' Marion Casey, Nurse."

[418] These three papers were offered for probate in the Wayne County Court, and were admitted to record by that court, from which judgment an appeal was prosecuted to the Wayne Circuit Court, where a trial resulted in a peremptory instruction by the court directing the first two papers to be found as the last will and first codicil of the deceased, and submitting to the jury the question as to the competency of the deceased when he executed the last named paper; the jury found against the last named codicil, whereupon, judgment was entered directing that the first two papers be recorded as the last will and testament of the decedent, and from that judgment this appeal is prosecuted, there being no cross-appeal as to the validity of the last named codicil.

The decedent and his brother, J. W. M. Miller, who was named as executor, were near the same age and lived together all of their lives, and owned a great deal of property in common, and by their combined efforts had each accumulated a competency.

Some fifteen or sixteen years before the death of A. Miller his brother was paralyzed, and while he was able to get around the house and yard and occasionally go to the county seat, he was never thereafter an active man, although he retained his mental faculties.

The two brothers owned the old home farm which had been left by their father, and there lived with them as housekeeper their cousin Miss Fayette C. Miller; in fact she had lived with their mother and father in their lifetime.

At the time the papers involved were executed by A. Miller the household consisted of the two bachelor brothers, the cousin Fayette C. Miller, a negro man named Ingram, and a white cook named Coffey.

The contest is grounded upon two ideas:

First. That the testator was at the time each of the papers were executed laboring under an insane delusion toward some of the natural objects of his bounty, which delusion resulted from fraud practiced upon him by Fayette C. Miller and others inducing him to believe that certain of his nieces and nephews were his enemies; and that because of chronic alcoholism and his diseased condition resulting therefrom he did not have sufficient mind to understand the nature and value of his estate or his obligations to his relatives, or to dispose of his property according to a fixed purpose of his own.

[419] Second. Because each of the papers were procured to be executed through the fraud and undue influence of Fayette C. Miller and others acting in concert with her.

The evidence shows that from about 1902 until his death A. Miller was afflicted with chronic alcoholism, although during all that period, except the last few months of his life, he was an active business man, managed his own affairs and those of his paralytic brother, ran the farm, bought and sold stock, carried on a mercantile business, acted as director in a bank, and attended to all these things in an efficient and businesslike way. As to his general mental capacity in 1905 and 1908 there is no conflict in the evidence, one physician testifying that he had known him for forty years, that he had never seen him except within a few weeks of his death when he was not capable of transacting any kind of business.

But the charge that he was laboring under an insane delusion, that some of his nieces and nephews were his enemies, grows out of some most unusual and unexplained occurrences at and around his home during the late winter and early spring of 1904. It appears that during that period there was something approaching a reign of terror; two of his barns were burned, a grain house was set afire, shots were frequently fired around his house at night, the house was actually fired into upon one or more occasions, rocks were thrown against the house and around and about him. Guards were employed to guard the place, the neighbors and relatives came and stayed at night to assist, and the sheriff and his deputies stayed on the premises several nights to aid in ascertaining the cause of these disturbances.

Out of this condition two theories as to their cause were evolved. First. The sheriff and his deputies, a number of the neighbors and some of the relatives reached the conclusion that the negro man Ingram and the Coffey woman, possibly aided and assisted by others, were responsible therefor; and second, the two old men and Miss Miller believed that certain men in the neighborhood with whom the Millers had had a protracted and bitter litigation were at the bottom of the trouble.

Warrants were issued for Ingram and the Coffey woman, and upon their examining trial they were held to the grand jury, when they were indicted; but the attorney for the Commonwealth filed the indictments away. Warrants were also issued for the three men suspected by the Millers, and two of them were arrested, [420] the other leaving the State; but it does not appear whether any of them were ever tried or convicted.

The decedent, A. Miller, believed firmly in the innocence of his two servants, went on their bond, and otherwise actively assisted in their defense. He was very much incensed and outraged at their arrest, and fell out with a number of his neighbors and relatives because of their belief in their guilt. The negro man Ingram had lived with the Millers since his boyhood, and the Coffey woman had lived with them several years.

It grows out of this situation that the charge that he was laboring under an insane delusion that certain of his nieces and nephews were his enemies.

It will be observed that he did not charge any of his relatives with being guilty of any of these outrages themselves, but, as expressed in the first codicil, merely with "being against me in the burning of my barns, and shooting in my house;" that is he felt that they had unjustly sided against him and his trusted servants about a matter which vitally involved his welfare and happiness; and it might very well have been that he felt the stand they had taken as to the guilt of his two trusted servants, of whose innocence he was fully convinced, might have prevented him from punishing the real guilty parties.

An insane delusion is an idea or belief which springs spontaneously from a diseased or perverted mind without reason or without foundation in fact; it is distinguishable from a belief which is founded upon prejudice or aversion no matter how unreasonable or unfounded the prejudice or aversion may be. If it is the product of a reasoning mind no matter how slight the evidence upon which it is based it cannot be classed as an insane delusion. In every day life men of the strongest minds, being in possession of the same facts, reach different conclusions. In this case Miller being presumably in possession of at least as much knowledge about these occurrences as his relatives and neighbors, reached a different conclusion as to who were the guilty parties, and the fact that he reached a different conclusion from most of his relatives and neighbors does not make his belief an insane delusion.

This question was exhaustively treated in the recent case of Purdy v. Evans, 156 Ky. 342, 160 S. W. 1071. In that case the court quoting from Schouler on Wills, said:

[421] "Insane delusion should be distinguished from prejudice, or error, as well as from eccentricity. It differs essentially from some rational belief, not well founded, however perversely the testator may have clung to it. An ill founded belief, not actually insane, does not destroy testamentary capacity. And where one indulges in an aversion, however harsh, which is the conclusion of a reasoning mind, on evidence, no matter how slight or inaccurate, his will cannot be on that account overturned."

And again, after reviewing the authorities, the court said:

"Viewed in the light of these authorities, what was there in the conduct of Thomas C. Purdy to invalidate his will? The prejudice, resentment, or anger of testator toward his daughter may have been without reasonable cause; yet it was not the spontaneous production of a diseased mind based upon no evidence whatever; for it had some basis in fact. It arose from the refusal of his daughter to live with him, and from her marriage with one to whom testator objected; and, however imperfect the process of his reasoning, or however illogical or unjust the conclusion that she was so greatly at fault as his conduct toward her proves his belief to have been, it was not without some basis in fact; at least there was sufficient to free it from the imputation of spontaneity, and, therefore, from the charge of having its origin in an insane delusion."

Tested by the rule therein laid down it cannot be said that the decedent in this case had an insane delusion that certain of his nieces and nephews had mistreated him. It cannot be said to have been unnatural for this old man to have thought and felt that in this trying period of his life when his property was being destroyed, and his very life threatened, as he believed, that he was entitled to the fullest support and comfort from his relatives.

The only remaining question to be determined is whether there was any evidence of undue influence. The uncontradicted evidence is that Fayette C. Miller never saw the original will or the first codicil until after they were prepared by Miller in his own handwriting. There is an absolute failure of evidence to show that she exerted or attempted to exert any influence in the preparation of either of those papers. Nothing was more natural than that this old bachelor should have amply [422] provided for his first cousin and housekeeper who had for long years presided over his home, and who doubtless in many ways had aided him and his brother in the accumulation of their property.

It may be said that the theory of appellant that Miss Miller instigated the trouble at the Miller home and aided and assisted Ingram and the Coffey woman in the preparation of those outrages for the purpose of frightening the decedent in the making of a will, is not founded upon the least evidence. It is, at most, a bare supposition without any tangible evidence to base it upon.

We are of opinion that the lower court properly instructed the jury, and the judgment is affirmed.

NOTE.

In the reported case it is held that the belief of a testator that certain of his relatives are his enemies will not be considered an insane delusion, though it has no other support than the fact that they do not give him active assistance at a time when he believes that he is in danger. For a review of the cases on an insane delusion respecting relatives as affecting testamentary capacity, see the note to Dibble v. Currier, reported ante, this volume, at page 1.

IN RE ALEXANDER'S ESTATE.

Pennsylvania Supreme Court—July 1, 1914.

246 Pa. St. 58; 91 Atl. 1042.

Wills — Testamentary Capacity — Insane Delusion.

A "delusion" of a testator, such as will invalidate a will, is an insane belief or a mere figment of the imagination.

[See note at end of this case.]

The burden is on a party, relying on the existence of a delusion to invalidate a will, Ann. Cas. 1916C.—3.

to prove that such delusion controlled the testator's volition and destroyed his freedom of action in disposing of his estate.

Same.

Evidence in support of a petition for an issue devisavit vel non held insufficient to show that the will was executed in consequence of an insane delusion on the part of the testator, the petitioner's father, though testator practically disinherited her and may have been mistaken in his judgment that she had been guilty of unnatural conduct toward him and her mother.

Appeal from Orphans' Court, Berks county: BUSHONG, Judge.

Proceeding for probate of will of Edgar W. Alexander. Decree by register of wills refusing an issue devisavit vel non. Decree affirmed by Orphans' Court. Nettie I. Moyer appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Cyrus G. Derr and E. H. Deysher for appellant.

Isaac Hiester, E. Carroll Schaeffer and C. H. Ruhl for appellees.

[61] BROWN, J.—Edgar W. Alexander died November 12, 1912, leaving personal property appraised at $332,956.87 and real estate worth about $10,000. He left to survive him but one child, a daughter, Nettie, born to him by his first wife, who died May 11, 1897. The daughter subsequently married J. Harry Moyer and became the mother of two children, Josephine and Dorothy. By a will, dated September 4, 1912, and a codicil executed a month later, appellant's father gave the bulk of his estate to his second wife, collateral relatives, step-children and charities. To each of his two grandchildren, Josephine and Dorothy Moyer, he gave $5,000. He practically disinherited his daughter and only child by the following clause in his will: "I give and bequeath to Mrs. Nettie I. Moyer, wife of J. Harry Moyer, the sum of One Thousand ($1,000) Dollars, on condition that should she take any exceptions to the provisions of this my will she shall not participate in my estate to the extent of One Dollar. I make this a condition in view of the unnatural conduct of said Mrs. Nettie I. Moyer towards her deceased mother as well as myself in her relation as a child and daughter." The daughter appealed from the decree of the register admitting the will of her father to probate, and in a petition to the Orphans' Court, in which she averred that the will, so far as it affected her, was the result of a delusion on the part of the testator, prayed for an issue to determine,

(1) Whether he was the victim of a delusion with respect to her conduct towards himself and her mother, so affecting him as to have rendered him insensible to his parental obligations and to have caused him to execute the paper admitted to probate as his will; and (2) whether at the time he executed the same he was of sound and disposing mind. This appeal is from the refusal to award the issue prayed for.

[62] The habits of the decedent, upon which we need not dwell, were not good, but nothing was shown to indicate that he was not of sound mind and good business judgment, and the prayer for an issue to determine whether he had testamentary capacity was groundless. This does not seem to be questioned, for we are asked to reverse the decree of the court below solely on the ground that the decedent was the victim of a delusion with respect to his daughter which controlled him in making his will.

A delusion which will render invalid a will executed as the direct result of it is an insane belief or a mere figment of the imagination—a belief in the existence of something which does not exist and which no rational person, in the absence of evidence, would believe to exist: Taylor v. Trich, 185 Pa. St. 586, 30 Atl. 1053, 44 Am. St. Rep. 679; In re McGovran, 185 Pa. St. 203, 39 Atl. 816; In re Bennett, 201 Pa. St. 485, 51 Atl. 336. The burden was upon the appellant to show that such a delusion controlled the will of her father and destroyed his freedom of action in disposing of his estate. In her effort to do so she submitted much testimony, the recital of which in detail will serve no useful purpose. It was shown by a number of witnesses that she had nursed her mother during a long period of sickness with the tender solicitude of an affectionate child; that her father and mother had both praised her for what she had done for them, and that after the death of her mother the father had exhibited great affection for her and her two children. In view of all the testimony as to this, it is difficult to understand why he left but $1,000 of his large estate to her, and it would almost seem that he must have been under an insane delusion in giving his reason for doing so; but there was evidence from which he may have believed that his daughter's conduct towards himself and her mother had been unnatural. It was, therefore for him alone, being of sound mind, to pass judgment on that evidence, and, however harsh, unnatural and cruel his judgment may have been, it was not, in legal contemplation, a delusion—a mere figment of his [63] imagination, all-controlling with him in the execution of his will. For ten years prior to his death he and his daughter had been estranged. This appears from her own testimony. She admits that she talked about him to members of his family, and it may be, as she says, not maliciously or unkindly, but for the purpose of helping him to do better. He, however, manifestly thought otherwise. On two occasions prior to her leaving his home in 1902, where she and her family were living with him, she had reproached him for his indecent conduct towards an orphan girl who was living with them as a domestic. While he did not resent this at the time, he may subsequently have done so and regarded her reproof as "unnatural conduct" on her part. In a letter written to him in 1910, when she was about to undergo a serious operation, she pathetically refers to his long time estrangement from her and asks his forgiveness for what he may have thought it was not her privilege as a daughter to ask and demand from him as a father. This appeal was unavailing and he died unreconciled to his daughter, whose conduct he believed to have been unnatural towards him, in view of what she had said or done and of what she was reported to him as having said about him.

From the testimony submitted by the proponents it appeared that, for years before the testator's death, the appellant had repeatedly spoken of his failings; that she had been reproached for doing so by those to whom she had complained of him, and that what she said about him had been repeated to him, leading him at times to say that what she had said of him had nearly made him crazy and almost ashamed to stay in Reading. It further appeared that she had charged her mother with over indulgence in drink, and this, too, was repeated to her father, who expressed his grief that she should have so accused her mother. In September, 1903, in response to a request from her, he sent her the earrings of her mother, and in an accompanying letter wrote that he preferred [64] sending them by a messenger to having her come to his house for them, and that he could no longer submit to her vilification of him, threatening her that, if she did not desist from it, he would prosecute her. All this may have been unjust on his part, but there is nothing to show that it was a mere delusion which drove him into an unnatural attitude towards his daughter. He has stated why he discarded her. It may be—and we are inclined to so believe—that he was unreasonable in characterizing her conduct towards him and her mother as unnatural, and that his treatment of her as the natural object of his bounty was most harsh, but he acted upon what was his belief, and, if it was error, we are powerless to correct it. His opinion of his daughter's conduct, upon which he acted in making his will, may have been wholly unreasonable, but this can have no weight in the present inquiry, unless it be shown that the opinion rested on an imagined state of facts: McGovran's Estate, supra.

The burden was upon the appellant to show, by proof sufficient to sustain a verdict in her favor, that what she most naturally regards as the injustice of her father to her resulted from the delusion which she avers in her petition for the issue. After a review of all the testimony, we are constrained to say that she has failed to do so, and that we must concur in the following conclusion of the court below: "It may safely be asserted as a clear fact from the testimony that there were many stories afloat about Mr. Alexander which he believed to have been started by Mrs. Moyer. She, herself, tells her father not to believe what he hears without giving her a chance to defend herself, and he speaks of stories in his own letter about the earrings. Whether Mr. Alexander is to be condemned for listening to rumors and idle gossip or, perhaps, to false stories told by persons to discredit his own child, is not a question that this court is called upon to decide. The only inquiry is whether there is evidence from which a jury might reasonably infer [65] that Mr. Alexander was laboring under a mental disorder; and the result of that inquiry is that there is nothing to show that he did more than take the stories as they came to him, including the story about his dead wife, believe them and pass a very severe judgment upon the daughter."

Decree affirmed at appellant's costs.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that a belief by a testator that his daughter has been guilty of unnatural and ungrateful conduct toward him is not an insane delusion where it is founded on facts giving some cause for complaint on his part, although it may be a harsh and unreasonable conclusion from those facts. The cases discussing an insane delusion concerning a relative as affecting testamentary capacity are collected in the note to Dibble v. Currier, reported ante, this volume, at page 1.

PETTIT

v.

COUNTY COMMISSIONERS OF WICOMICO COUNTY.

123 Md. 128; 90 Atl. 993.

Counties — Liability of Commissioners — Injury to Property — Widening Road.

Though county commissioners condemn a strip of land for widening a road, if they, in doing the work of widening unnecessarily injure land outside that condemned they are liable therefor.

Eminent Domain — Collateral Attack on Proceedings.

County commissioners having had jurisdiction in condemning land for the widening of a road, the question of disqualification of one of the examiners, or a mere irregularity in that statutory provisions were not strictly followed, may not be inquired into collaterally; direct appeal from the action of the commissioners being the remedy.

Damages — Instructions — Damage to Land.

An instruction on damages for taking and injuring land should lay down a definite rule to guide the jury in estimating the damages.

Eminent Domain — When Title Passes.

Until the report of the examiners in condemnation by county commissioners under Acts 1904, c. 583, of land for widening a road, is ratified by the commissioners, as thereby required, they do not acquire title to or interest in the land, and therefore in constructing the road on it are wrongdoers.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Worcester county: JONES, Judge.

Action of trespass. Linden H. Pettit, plaintiff, and County Commissioners of Wicomico County, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Elmer H. Walton and John H. Handy for appellant.

L. Claude Bailey, Joseph L. Bailey and John W. Staton for appellee.

[129] BURKE, J.—The appellant is the owner of a tract of land which binds upon a county road leading from Rocka Walking milldam to Catchpenny, in Wicomico County. The road is referred to [130] in the declaration and mentioned in the evidence. The County Commissioners of Wicomico County determined to widen and straighten this road in front of the appellant's property.

The Act of 1904, Chapter 583, conferred upon the commissioners of that county the power to widen and straighten the road and prescribed the procedure to be followed. Section 128 of the Act provided that: "The County Commissioners of Wicomico County shall have the power by ordinance or resolution of condemning, laying out, opening, extending, and making new roads, and for altering, straightening, widening, grading, improving or closing up, in whole or in part, any existing road . . . when in their opinion the public necessity or convenience requires the same, without any previous application or petition. . . . If, however, the County Commissioners aforesaid shall proceed by condemnation in the exercise of the powers herein granted, all benefits or damages done, suffered, or incurred by laying out, opening, and making new roads, or by altering, straightening, widening, grading, improving, or closing up, in part or in whole, any existing road . . . shall be determined or assessed by three disinterested persons, freeholders and residents of Wicomico County and above the age of 21 years, who shall be appointed by the County Commissioners aforesaid and shall, within ten days, after notice of their appointment, take an oath before a justice of the peace of Wicomico County that they will faithfully and fairly, and without partiality or prejudice, view and assess the cost and damage to be suffered and incurred by any person interested in said property over, through or by which the said road . . . is to be opened, closed, extended, widened, graded or improved; and also to estimate the benefits that may accrue therefrom to any subsequent property owner, through and by which the said road, drain, waterway, or landing is to be opened, closed, extended, widened, graded or improved, or any property adjacent thereto, or any other property injured or benefited by said road; . . . but they shall give at least fifteen days' notice in one or more [131] newspapers published in Wicomico County of their purpose to lay out, open, extend, close up, widen, straighten, grade or improve the road . . . as directed to be laid out, etc., and of the day and hour of place of meeting for said purpose; and shall meet at the time and place mentioned in the notice given by them and proceed to exercise the powers and perform the duty assigned and required of them, and to ascertain whether any and what amount in value of the damages will be caused thereby for which the owner or occupant of any rights or interests claimed in any ground improved ought to be compensated over and above the amount in value of benefits which will thereby accrue to said owner or occupant thereof, and ascertain what amount in value or benefits will thereby accrue to any lot or parcel of ground by or through which the same may pass or improvements be made, or any other property, or to the owner or occupant thereof, which said lot or parcel of ground or owner or occupant thereof ought to pay. They shall locate boundaries and prepare an explanatory map giving description of the road opened, closed, extended, widened, straightened . . . with each separate lot or parcel of ground deemed to have sustained or received benefit, and they shall, within twenty days, return to the County Commissioners such maps, together with the amount of damage awarded such owner or occupant and the amount of benefits assessed to any lot or parcel of ground or the owner thereof, together with a certificate of their qualifications, which may be ratified or rejected, or allowed, and amended, in whole or in part, by said County Commissioners; provided, that the County Commissioners shall give ten days' notice, at least, by publication in one newspaper published in Wicomico County, or by ten days' notice, at least, in writing to each property owner so interested, of the time set for final action on the return of said examiners, and the County Commissioners shall act on said return within twenty days after the expiration of said notice and may issue a new commission as in their judgment may seem proper; and before proceeding to actually open, widen, [132] extend, straighten, or close any such road . . . the County Commissioners shall pay or tender to the person, his agent, guardian or representative, the amount of damages so awarded; and if anyone shall feel aggrieved by the decision of the County Commissioners in any matter affected by their decision, he may appeal to the Circuit Court for Wicomico County by giving written notice, within twenty days from said decision, filed with the clerk of the County Commissioners, of his desire to appeal. And on filing of said notice it shall be the duty of said clerk to deliver the papers connected therewith to the clerk of the said Court, and the same proceeding shall be had on the appeal as in cases of appeal from judgments of justices of the peace; provided, nevertheless, that the County Commissioners may decline to open, lay out, extend, grade, widen, or straighten any road . . . notwithstanding the decision of the said Court, but in case of refusal to do so they shall be liable for all cost incurred and shall pay the same; all benefits assessed by virtue of the above provisions shall be prior liens on the respective lots or parcels of ground which are assessed from the time of the final ratification of the aforesaid return, and shall be collected as taxes are now collected or may be collected by action."

On December 2nd, 1909, the County Commissioners appointed James M. Jones, A. W. Gordy and H. M. Clarke, commissioners or examiners to lay out, extend, widen, etc., said road, and to assess benefits and damages as provided for in the act, and to locate boundaries, prepare an explanatory map, showing each separate lot or parcel of land deemed to have sustained injuries or received benefits, together with the amount of damages and benefits awarded, with directions to report their proceedings to the County Commissioners, with a certificate of their qualifications, within twenty days from the date of their meeting upon the premises. The commission was issued January 5th, 1910. Messrs. Jones and Gordy qualified before a justice of the peace for Wicomico County, but H. M. Clarke qualified before the clerk of the Court. [133] The examiners met on the premises on March 7th, 1910, having first given the notice required by the act. They made their return, to which was attached as a part thereof, the commission, certificate of publication and plat; they estimated the cost of construction to be $650.00; they assessed the damages to the various property owners at $180.00 and the benefits at $64.00. The appellant was awarded one dollar as damages and assessed one dollar for benefits. Upon the return of the examiners, the County Commissioners published in the Wicomico News for two weeks prior to October 25th, 1910, the following notice: "The County Commissioners of Wicomico County hereby give notice that the report of James M. Jones, A. W. Gordy and H. M. Clarke, commissioners to widen and straighten the Rocka Walking to Catchpenny road, in Quantico District, has been filed in this office and will be taken up for final ratification on Tuesday, October 25th, 1910. Objection to the ratification must be made by noon on the above date. If the commissioners' meeting is postponed from this date the report will be taken up at the next regular meeting of the board. By order of the board. Thomas Perry, clerk."

The record does not show when the report of the examiners was filed. Mr. Clarke, one of the examiners, was the road engineer of Wicomico County, and was appointed and paid by the County Commissioners. The return of the examiners was admitted in evidence over the objection of the appellant, and the action of the Court in overruling the objection and admitting the return in evidence constitutes the first bill of exceptions. The appellant bases his objection to the admissibility of the examiners' return upon five grounds: First, that no ordinance or resolution was passed by the commissioners as required by the act; secondly, that Clarke was disqualified as an examiner, for the reason that he was an appointee of the County Commissioners, and, therefore, was not a disinterested freeholder; thirdly, that the examiners did not take the oath within ten days after their appointment, as required by [134] law; fourthly, that one of them took the oath before the clerk, and not before a justice of the peace, as the law directed; and, fifthly, that the return was not made within the time prescribed by the act.

Acting under the proceedings, the County Commissioners proceeded to widen and straighten the road. The work of construction upon the plaintiff's land was begun by Mr. Orlando Taylor, one of the County Commissioners and whose son was in charge of the men doing the work. They appropriated a strip of the plaintiff's land about four feet wide and binding on the county road from a thousand to twelve hundred feet, and, against the protest of the plaintiff, dug up and destroyed a number of shade trees, and, without any necessity for so doing, they hauled parts of the trees and branches over the plaintiff's property, and deposited them upon his strawberry patch, located quite a distance beyond the boundaries of the new road. The plaintiff instituted an action of trespass in the Circuit Court for Wicomico County to recover damages for these injuries. Upon his suggestion and affidavit the case was removed to the Circuit Court for Worcester County for trial. At the conclusion of the evidence of both parties a verdict and judgment were entered for the defendant under the direction of the Court upon the ground that no legally sufficient evidence had been offered under the pleadings to entitle the plaintiff to recover.

There are some questions of pleading presented which will be first stated. The declaration contained four counts, to each of which the defendant demurred. The Court overruled the demurrer to the first count and sustained those to the second, third and fourth counts. We can discover no error in the first, third and fourth counts. The first count alleged that the defendant broke and entered certain land of the plaintiff lying and being and situate on the public county road from Rocka Walking to Catchpenny, Quantico District, in the said Wicomico County, owned in fee simple and occupied by the plaintiff, and dug up and cut down the trees [135] thereupon growing and took possession of a large quantity of said land and wrongfully dispossessed the plaintiff of the same on or about the month of March, or a little later, in the year 1910. The third count charged that the defendant "wrongfully seized and took possession of a large quantity of the plaintiff's land situated in Quantico Election District, in Wicomico County, Maryland, owned and occupied by him as a residence lying on the county road from Rocka Walking to Catchpenny, in said Wicomico County. The said defendant under some claim that such taking was under some pretended right that was necessary for the public use, seized and took possession of the same and says that the defendant did not pay him or any one for him, anything for the same, contrary to the Constitution of the State of Maryland, and the defendant never paid for the same or tendered him any payment therefor or any one for him, to the great wrong and injury of the plaintiff, etc."

The fourth count alleged that the defendant "wrongfully entered the land of the plaintiff and dug up and cut down and carried away a large quantity of shade trees, ornamental trees, timber trees, and other valuable trees, strawberry plants, and other valuable plants and shrubbery, and converted the same to the defendant's own use, etc."

The second count was bad. It alleged that the defendant was acting under its power as County Commissioners of Wicomico County to open, alter, close, and straighten public county roads and then proceeded to set out certain acts which could only be taken advantage of by exceptions to the return of the commissioners or by a direct appeal to the Court from the action of the commissioners ratifying the return. The count conceded the jurisdiction of the commissioners and upon that concession any inquiry into practically all the facts alleged is precluded under the authority of the cases presently referred to.

The defendant filed two pleas to the first count: First, that the alleged wrong was done in the execution of legal proceedings [136] to widen and straighten the said public county road from Rocka Walking mills to Catchpenny; and, secondly, the general issue plea. The plaintiff joined issue upon the second plea and demurred to the first. The Court sustained the demurrer, whereupon the defendant filed the following amended plea: "That on October 25th, 1910, the County Commissioners of Wicomico County, after notice, duly ratified finally the report of James M. Jones, Allison W. Gordy and Horace M. Clarke, three disinterested freeholders of said Wicomico County, duly appointed by the County Commissioners of Wicomico County, under provisions of Chapter 583 of the Acts of the General Assembly of 1904, to determine and assess all benefits and damages to be suffered and incurred by any person by widening and straightening the public county road from Rocka Walking mills to Catchpenny, and no appeal having been taken by anyone interested therein from the said decision of the said County Commissioners after payment or tender to the respective persons entitled thereto of any and all damages awarded them—the alleged wrong was done in widening and straightening said public county road from Rocka Walking mills to Catchpenny in accordance with the report and explanatory map and location of boundaries by the commission aforesaid."

It also refiled the general issue plea. The defendant joined issue on the general issue plea and demurred to the amended plea. The Court overruled the demurrer, and the plaintiff then filed five replications to the plea. Issue was joined upon the first replication, which was a direct traverse of the facts alleged in the plea, and rejoinder was filed to the third, fourth and fifth replications, and issue was joined thereon. A demurrer was filed and sustained to the second replication. The result of the pleadings was to raise the following issues in the case: First, an issue of fact under the first count; secondly, an issue of fact under the amended plea; thirdly, an issue upon the disqualification of the examiners; fourthly, an issue of tender or payment of damages to the plaintiff for the [137] property taken; and, fifthly, an issue of law as to the constitutionality of section 128 of the Act of 1904.

Assuming that the County Commissioners had jurisdiction in the premises, it would seem clear that the third issue was improper, and should not have been submitted to the jury; it was likewise improper to have presented an issue of law namely, the constitutionality of section 128 of the Act of 1904. The case proceeded to trial, and the plaintiff offered evidence tending to prove the injuries alleged in the declaration, and also the extent of those injuries. The defendant then called Horace M. Clarke, one of the examiners, and the road engineer of Wicomico County, and proved by him the quantity of land taken, and put in evidence the report of the examiners, above referred to, and closed its case. The plaintiff submitted six prayers, all of which were refused. The first prayer is based upon the proposition that the plaintiff was entitled to recover for injuries done to his property, including injury to his strawberry patch and other crops, not embraced in the condemnation proceedings and not necessary to the execution of said proceedings. The second told the jury that if they found that there was no payment or tender of payment to the plaintiff for the land condemned then their verdict should be for the plaintiff, "and in estimating the damages they may take into consideration all the damage of every nature which may have directly resulted from the widening and straightening of said road." The third prayer was similar to the first, but concluded as to the damages which the plaintiff might recover. The fourth presented the question as to the disqualification of one of the examiners, and the fifth asserted that the condemnation was null and void if the commissioners did not "follow strictly the statutory provisions." The sixth prayer was as follows: "The plaintiff prays the Court to instruct the jury that if they shall find for the plaintiff under the fourth and fifth prayers of the plaintiff, then in estimating the damage they shall take into consideration all the damage and injury which the plaintiff sustained [138] by reason of the taking of said land by the defendant, and the injury to the trees and the loss and damage sustained by the cutting down and removal of said trees and the loss and damage sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the injury to the strawberry beds and other growing crops of the plaintiff." If the case was entitled to go to the jury, we think the Court should have granted the second and third prayers in connection with each other. If the County Commissioners had jurisdiction in the premises, the fourth and fifth prayers were properly refused, for the reason that the facts submitted by those prayers were not open to inquiry in this case, but should have been availed of by a direct appeal from the action of the commissioners. The second and sixth prayers were defective in not laying down a definite rule to guide the jury in estimating the damages. It is a perfectly well settled principle of law, that where the proceedings of a Court are collaterally attacked, and it appears on their face that the subject matter and the parties were within the jurisdiction of the Court they are not impeachable for mere errors or irregularities that may be apparent. Such errors and irregularities must be corrected by some direct proceeding either in the same Court to set them aside or on appeal. If, however, there be a total want of jurisdiction either of the parties or the subject matter, the proceedings are void and can confer no right, and will be rejected, though the objection to them be taken in a collateral proceeding. This principle applies likewise to condemnation proceedings. In Huling v. Kaw Valley R. etc. Co. 130 U. S. 559, 9 S. Ct. 603, 32 U. S. (L. ed.) 1045, Justice Miller, discussing a collateral attack upon condemnation proceedings upon the ground that one of the commissioners appointed to locate a railroad and assess damages for land taken was disqualified, said: "The plaintiffs cannot recover in the present action without holding in this collateral proceeding that all that was done by these commissioners is void by reason of this want of qualification in one of their number. The proper time for these plaintiffs to have taken this objection [139] to Mr. Wood as a commissioner was either at the time of his appointment or at the time he proceeded to act as commissioner. If it be objected that they could not be supposed to have any notice of the application for the appointment of these commissioners and of the time and place when the judge would act on that application, the law presumes that they had notice, and might have attended at the time the commissioners entered upon their duties. If this objection had been then taken, it might have been sustained, or it could have been taken advantage of by way of appeal from the proceedings of the commissioners; but to permit such an objection as this to prevail at this time, and thus defeat the whole of the proceedings upon this narrow ground is a proposition unsupported by sound principle or by authority. It is a collateral attack upon a proceeding which has been completed according to the forms of law. There is no more reason why this want of qualification should, when shown at this stage of the proceeding, invalidate it all, than there is why the discovery, after a judgment, and after that judgment has passed beyond the control of the Court, that one of the jurors was disqualified, should make absolutely void the verdict and the judgment. It is only one of those cases frequently occurring in the administration of the law, in which it is better that errors not pointed out at the proper time should be disregarded, than that, by attempts to correct them, evils much worse should follow than those incident to the error."

In Jenkins v. Riggs, 100 Md. 427, 59 Atl. 758, in which the proceedings of the County Commissioners of Baltimore County in the opening of certain roads were attacked in a Court of Equity the Court said: "If the County Commissioners acted within their jurisdiction in reference to these roads the other matters alleged in the bill were subject to their determination, and mere errors made by them or irregularities in their proceedings were reviewable only upon appeal taken, as provided for in the statute, to the Circuit Court for Baltimore County, and do not form a proper foundation for a bill in [140] equity. Greenland v. Hudson County, 68 Md. 62; Gaither v. Watkins, 66 Md. 581; Allegany County v. Union Min. Co. 61 Md. 548."

The Act of 1904, Chapter 583, under which the proceedings in this case were taken, provided for the return of the examiner to the commissioners and for an opportunity for all persons interested to object thereto, and it gave all such persons who felt aggrieved by the decision of the County Commissioners a right to appeal therefrom to the Circuit Court. There must be a ratification by the commissioners of the action of the examiners, or a judgment by a Court of law upon appeal and payment and tender of the damages sustained by the land owner before his rights are concluded, or title vested in the condemning corporation. The amended plea, which set up the condemnation proceedings as a part of the suit, alleged that the report of the commissioners had been "duly ratified finally" by the County Commissioners. But the record shows no ratification of the report. It merely discloses the appointment of the examiners and their proceedings, upon which no action appears to have been taken by the commissioners, except the publication of the notice, above transcribed, that the report of the examiners would be taken up for final ratification on October 25th, 1910. There is nothing in the report to show that the defendant acquired any title or interest in the land taken, and, therefore, in the construction of a road upon the land of the plaintiff the defendant must be treated as a wrongdoer. But had the report of the examiners been finally ratified, as alleged in the plea, the plaintiff under the evidence would have been entitled to recover for injuries done to his property outside the boundaries of the land actually taken. "The authorities undoubtedly hold that the assessment of damages will be presumed to include all damages which arise from constructing the works in a reasonable and proper manner, having regard to the efficiency of the works on the one hand and the interest of the land owner on the other. Where a subsequent claim for damages is made, [141] arising from the construction of works, the question will be whether the works have been constructed in a proper manner, and whether the damage necessarily results from the works as so constructed. If these questions are answered in the affirmative, then the damages complained of will be presumed to have been considered in estimating the damages, and no further recovery can be had. If they are answered in the negative, then a recovery can be had in an appropriate common law action. . . . The rights of the party condemning are confined to the land taken, and if any damages are done to adjoining lands by blasting, by occupation, or encroachments, or by using it as a roadway, a recovery may be had." Lewis on Eminent Domain, secs. 567 and 573. Such damages are not included in the award of compensation.

The defendant has appropriated permanently a portion of the plaintiff's property upon which was growing certain trees described in the evidence, and in addition thereto, the plaintiff offered evidence tending to show other injuries not of a permanent character. In cases of tort "the Court must decide and instruct the jury in respect to what elements and within what limits damages may be estimated in the particular action." Baltimore, etc. R. Co. v. Carr, 71 Md. 143, 17 Atl. 1052; Western Maryland R. Co. v. Martin, 110 Md. 554, 73 Atl. 267. The rule of damages to be applied in cases of this kind is stated in Redemptorists v. Wenig, 79 Md. 348, 29 Atl. 667. It follows that the judgment must be reversed and a new trial awarded.

Judgment reversed and new trial awarded, the appellee to pay the costs.

NOTE.

Collateral Attack on Eminent Domain Proceeding.

Voidable Proceeding:
General Rule, 40.
Application of Rule, 42.
Void Proceeding, 43.

Introductory.

This note reviews the cases dealing with the right to attack collaterally the validity of a proceeding to take property under the power of eminent domain. It excludes, however, the cases wherein relief is sought through an injunction against the prosecution of eminent domain proceedings.

Voidable Proceeding.

GENERAL RULE.

Eminent domain proceedings conducted by a court of competent jurisdiction are in the absence of fraud not subject to collateral attack because of errors or irregularities which render the proceedings voidable on a direct attack.

The general principle underlying this rule was pointed out by the court, in St. Joseph Hydraulic Co. v. Cincinnati, etc. R. Co. 109 Ind. 172, 9 N. E. 727, as follows: "It is a principle running through many cases, and enforced in many forms, that an objection made seasonably and in the original proceeding will be given force, which would be utterly unavailing in a mere collateral attack. We can perceive no reason why the general principle should not apply here, for the judgment of the court in the condemnation proceedings must settle all questions as to the sufficiency of the instrument of appropriation, or else it settles none." And in Evans v. Haefner, 29 Mo. 141, the court, pointing out the necessity for the rule, said: "The condition of railroad companies would be a hard one, if they could not be assured, before a road was built, that they might rely with confidence on the validity of the condemnation under which they acted. If the law, under which they proceed, is a valid and binding one, and they conform to its provisions in condemning the land necessary for their purposes, it would be ruinous if the validity of those proceedings could be called in question in a collateral suit. . . . A railroad company would never be safe in building a road. After condemning land under a law which authorized it, they would be left to the fluctuating opinions of the courts, and would have no assurance that the steps they had taken would be of any avail in a subsequent action against them. If the construction of railroads is a measure encouraged and promoted by the community as one in which its interests are involved, there would be no policy in leaving companies in this defenceless state." In Indiana Oolitic Limestone Co. v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. 107 Ind. 301, 7 N. E. 244, the court said: "In its complaint appellant has sought to make a collateral attack upon the validity of appellee's appropriation proceedings. As in other cases of collateral attack, of course, in the absence of averment or showing to the contrary, every reasonable presumption must be indulged in the case in hand in favor of the regularity, legality and validity of such appropriation proceedings as against the appellant, who was a party to such proceeding. . . . Thus, in the case under consideration, appellant's complaint shows that on June 4th, 1884, the appellee deposited in the clerk's office of the proper court its instrument of appropriation of a strip of appellant's land, for its switch, sidetrack or turnout. But the complaint fails to show whether or not appellee delivered to appellant a copy of such instrument of appropriation, as required by section 3907, supra. In such case we presume in aid of the appropriation proceedings, and in favor of their regularity, legality and validity, that appellee did deliver to appellant, as required by the statute, a copy of such instrument of appropriation. So, the complaint shows that the judge of the court in vacation appointed by warrant three named persons to appraise appellant's damages by reason of appellee's act of appropriation; but it fails to show whether such appraisers were, or were not, disinterested freeholders of the proper county, or were, or were not, duly sworn, as required by the statute. In such case, also, we conclusively presume in aid of the appropriation proceedings, that the persons appointed were competent appraisers, under the statute, and were duly sworn as such, as required thereby." And in Secombe v. Milwaukee, etc. R. Co. 90 U. S. 108, 23 U. S. (L. ed.) 67, it was said: "The judgment of condemnation in this case was rendered by a competent court, charged with a special statutory jurisdiction, and all the facts necessary to the exercise of this jurisdiction are shown to exist. A judgment thus obtained is no more subject to impeachment in a collateral proceeding than the judgment of any other court of exclusive jurisdiction. If it were so, railroad companies would have no assurance that the steps taken by them to procure the right of way would conclude any one, and they would be constantly subject to vexatious litigation." The rule was stated forcibly in Byrnes v. Douglass, 23 Nev. 83, 42 Pac. 798, wherein the court said: "The order in the condemnation proceeding authorized the defendant, during the pendency of those proceedings, to take possession of that part of the tunnel which passed through the Atlantic mining claim. This order, if valid, would seem to be a complete defense as to that part of the ground. Its validity is attacked only upon one point, and that is that a tunnel constructed for the purpose of one mine cannot be condemned for the use of another mine; and a long list of authorities are cited wherein that principle has been asserted. We do not, however, deem it necessary to decide the point upon this appeal. As this is a collateral attack upon the order, the question is not whether it is erroneous, but whether the court had jurisdiction to make it." In New Madrid County v. Phillips, 125 Mo. 61, 28 S. W. 321, the court said: "The county acquired by the condemnation the right to maintain the road as against Mr. Murray Phillips. If the county paid too much for the easement, the time to have had that error corrected was in that very proceeding. The present action is nothing else than an attempt to review collaterally the finding for damages in favor of Mr. Murray Phillips then made by the commissioners. The finding cannot be thus revised. It is binding on the county as well as on Mr. Murray Phillips, until set aside in some direct way. This is so firmly settled by recent adjudications that it is unnecessary to repeat the reasons for the ruling." And in Foltz v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. 60 Fed. 316, 19 U. S. App. 576, 8 C. C. A. 635, it was said: "There are three questions that the trial court must determine in every condemnation proceeding, viz: First. Has the plaintiff corporation legal capacity to exercise the power of eminent domain? Second. Is it necessary for the plaintiff to take the land it seeks to condemn? Third. Does it seek it for a public use? Every judgment of condemnation is necessarily an affirmative decision of each of these questions. If either of them is erroneously decided, the judgment may be reversed by a writ of error for that purpose; but to hold that either of these questions can be tried de novo in an action of trespass or of ejectment, or in any other collateral proceeding, would be counter to our views of justice, of the reason of the case, and of the uniform decisions of the courts."

APPLICATION OF RULE.

Where the judgment in a condemnation suit recites that process was duly and regularly served on a certain party defendant, the recital is conclusive evidence on collateral attack that the defendant named, whether sui juris or laboring under disability, was served with process in the manner prescribed by law. McDonald v. Ft. Smith, etc. R. Co. 105 Ark. 5, 150 S. W. 135.

Whether one of the commissioners who conducted the proceedings was a freeholder as required by the statute is not open to consideration in a collateral action brought by the owner of the land taken. Huling v. Kaw Valley R. etc. Co. 130 U. S. 559, 9 S. Ct. 603, 32 U. S. (L. ed.) 1045; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Griesser, 48 Kan. 663, 29 Pac. 1082; Van Steenberg v. Bigelow, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 42; Gulf, etc. R. Co. v. Ft. Worth, etc. R. Co. 86 Tex. 537, 26 S. W. 54.

Whether the land taken was necessary for the public use cannot be raised in a collateral suit. Hamilton v. Annapolis, etc. R. Co. 1

Texas*, etc. R. Co. 29 Tex. Civ. App. 54, 67 S. W. 1093.

In an action for trespass the plaintiff cannot attack eminent domain proceedings by showing that a condition precedent to condemnation was not complied with. Ney v. Swinney, 36 Ind. 454. So the conclusion of the court that the facts of the case brought it within the meaning of the statute cannot be impeached in a collateral action for damages. Merchantile Trust Co. v. Pittsburgh, etc. R. Co. 29 Fed. 732. Similarly the claim that the legislative acts under which the property was condemned were not broad enough to cover that property cannot be set up in an action of ejectment. New York v. Wright, 53 Hun 607 mem. 12 N. Y. S. 20. The authority of a railroad company to construct a certain branch road for which the plaintiff's property was taken cannot be assailed in an action of ejectment or trespass. Evans v. District of Columbia, 33 App. Cas. (D. C.) 366.

Where the board of county supervisors is authorized to condemn land for public highways, the order of the board cannot be collaterally attacked. Humboldt County v. Tisdale, 136 Cal. 474, 69 Pac. 141.

Void Proceeding.

Where, however, the judgment or award in eminent domain proceedings is absolutely void, a different rule applies; and in such a case the proceedings can be impeached collaterally. Kanne v. Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. 33 Minn. 419, 23 N. W. 854; Ells v. Pacific R. Co. 51 Mo. 200; Williams v. Monroe, 125 Mo. 574, 28 S. W. 853; Clement v. Barna, 43 N. H. 609; *Adams v. Co. 110 Mo. 147, 19 S. W. 77; Norwood v. Gonzales County, 79 Tex. 218, 14 S. W. 1057. And see the reported case. Thus, in Williams v. Monroe, supra, the court said: "We all agree that condemnation proceedings under these statutes are judicial, and that, when once the court has acquired jurisdiction over the persons and subject matter, the judgment, if within the power of the court, is not open to collateral attack. . . . But this doctrine, when rightly understood, does not in the least shake the authority of those decisions in this state which hold that, although the record of a court of general jurisdiction recites that defendants have been duly served with process, it is competent to overthrow such recital by showing by other portions of the record of equal dignity, and importing equal verity, that such recital of service is not true."

Accordingly, it was held in Kanne v. Minnesota, etc. R. Co. 33 Minn. 419, 23 N. W.

854, that the owner of land taken under proceedings void for want of notice could recover possession and damages in a separate action. And in Adams v. Washington, etc. R. Co. 10 N. Y. 328, it was held that evidence was admissible to prove the falsity of the record of the eminent domain proceedings in order to show a lack of jurisdiction.

In Hamilton v. Annapolis, etc. R. Co. 1 Md. 553, the court seemed to think it necessary to determine, though in a collateral suit, whether the corporation that had exercised the rights of eminent domain had been forbidden to act in that particular case by its charter.

In Justice v. Georgia Industrial Realty Co. 109 Va. 366, 63 S. E. 1084, the court said: "We have the case of a municipal corporation, under the guise of acquiring private property for public use, in point of fact fraudulently procuring the condemnation of private property for private use. The question which confronts us, therefore, is shall a court of equity sanction a proceeding of this character upon the hypothesis that a judgment thus obtained is not amenable to collateral attack at the suit of the appellant, whose inchoate right of dower has since become consummate. The decision of the trial court is placed upon the ground, 'that Mr. Justis was the only necessary party interested in the condemnation proceedings had in the hustings court, except the city of Richmond, and that the decision of the hustings court upon all questions involved in that controversy is impregnable to collateral attack.' The conclusion of the learned court would unquestionably be sound in a lawful proceeding against the husband to condemn land in which the wife had an inchoate right of dower. In such case the wife, not being a necessary party under the statute, on the principle of representation, would be concluded, however irregular the proceedings or erroneous the judgment might be. But the view taken by the lower court loses sight of the distinction between a judgment which is voidable simply by reason of error of judgment of the court which rendered it, upon matters within the pleadings and issues, and a judgment voidable for fraud practiced upon the court which rendered it, and which is extrinsic and collateral to any issue submitted to its determination. The judgment in the first instance can only be corrected by writ of error or other direct proceedings, but in the last it may be impeached collaterally. . . . That distinction seems to be clearly recognized by the authorities. For instance, if a court of general jurisdiction in condemnation proceedings, with the facts before it, erroneously appropriates private property for private use, that is an error of judgment for which its sentence may be reversed on writ of error. But if, on the other hand, the court could be induced to render such judgment by the fraudulent concealment of the facts upon which it is founded, such judgment is liable to collateral impeachment."

AMERICAN-HAWAIIAN ENGINEERING AND CONSTRUCTION COMPANY

v. .

BUTLER ET AL.

California Supreme Court—May 28, 1913.

165 Cal. 497; 133 Pac. 280.

Building Contracts — Termination for Default of Contractor — Requisites of Notice.

Where a building contract contains provisions authorizing the owner, on certificate of the architect, and after notice to the contractor, to provide labor and materials, or terminate the contract, the certificate of the architect must substantially comply with the contract, and the notice to the contractor, following the certificate, must fully advise the contractor of what the owner demands.

Right of Owner to Complete Work.

A building contract which provides that, on the architect certifying to the failure of the contractor to supply skilled workmen or proper material, or to prosecute the work with promptness, the owner may, after three days' notice, provide labor and materials and deduct the cost thereof from any money then or thereafter to become due the contractor, and that, if the architect shall certify that the failure is sufficient grounds for such action, the owner may terminate the employment, and enter on the premises, and employ persons to finish the work, and, in case of discontinuance of the employment of the contractor, he shall not receive any further payment until the work shall be finished, does not contemplate a termination of the employment of the contractor for only a part of the work, but as to any part of the work touching which, according to the architect's certificate, the contractor is delinquent, the owner may furnish the necessary labor and material to be used by and charged to the contractor, but may not oust the contractor from that part of the work and undertake to perform it independent of him, though, where the contractor has become so delinquent as to justify a termination, the owner, on the architect's certificate to that effect, may, after proper notice, terminate it.

Same.

Where an owner, employing a building contractor, fails to give lawful notice to the contractor of the termination of the contract, as authorized by the contract, on receiving a proper architect's certificate, the owner may not take charge of the work, or any part thereof, and the contractor may resist the attempt of the owner to do so.

Conclusiveness of Architect's Certificate.

Where a building contract authorizes the architect to determine and certify the existence of a fact, material to a proceeding under the contract, the certificate of the architect, duly made, that the fact exists is conclusive on the parties as to the thing to be done to which the fact relates, or as to which, under the proceeding, it is to affect the rights of the parties, except for fraud or gross mistake amounting to fraud.

Right of Contractor to Instalment — Delay in Prosecuting Work.

The provisions in a building contract, which authorize the owner to terminate the contract on the architect certifying that the delinquencies of the contractor justify such action, and which authorize the owner, on terminating the contract, to enter on the premises and complete the work, and provide that, in case of discontinuance of the employment, the contractor shall not be entitled to receive any further payment until the work is finished, do not affect the right of the contractor, under the provision for partial payments as the work progresses, to receive moneys due him for work already done, unless there is an actual discontinuance of the employment, in which case he is not entitled to any further payment until the work has been completed by the owner, and the architect's certificate of delinquency, authorizing a termination of a contract, is conclusive for the purpose of authorizing a termination, and for the purpose, after termination, of authorizing the owner to refuse further payments, and where the architect merely certifies to the failure of the contractor to prosecute the work diligently, the contractor is entitled to the partial payment stipulated for during the month preceding the making of the certificate.

Judgment for Contractor. — Provision for Paying Subcontractor.

Where an owner, required to pay the building contractor monthly as the work progressed, refused to make a monthly payment on the ground that he had lawfully terminated the employment, and the owner, when sued by the contractor for the value of the work done, did not rely on the existence of a claim against the contractor, in favor of a subcontractor, as an excuse for the refusal to pay, the owner could not complain of a judgment for plaintiff with a direction that a subcontractor's claim should be paid out of the amount of the judgment.

Right to Payment — Architect's Certificate Refused.

Where it was the custom for a contractor, entitled to monthly payments on certificates of the architect, to present each month to the architect an estimate of the work done and material furnished the preceding month, and for the architect to examine the work and certify that it was done to his satisfaction, and when a monthly estimate was presented to the architect, the architect replied that he had been instructed by the owner not to give the certificate, and the owner declared that he would not make any more payments, and there was no claim that the work for the preceding month had not been properly done, or any suggestion that the want of the architect's certificate was the ground for refusing payment, and the work for the month was, in fact, well done, the payment for the work becomes due, though the architect did not approve and certify to the work.

Rescission by Contractor — Failure to Pay Instalment.

Where an owner, required to make monthly payments to the contractor as the work progressed, wrongfully refused to make a monthly payment, it is a breach of contract, and the contractor can rescind and sue on a quantum meruit for the work done and materials furnished.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The rule that a rescission of a contract by one party thereto, without the consent of the adverse party, cannot be made except by one who is not in default applies where the obligations on which each party is in default are dependent and concurrent, or where the rescinding party's default is so related to the obligation in which the adverse party has failed that it, in some manner, affects performance, or the duty of the latter to perform, but does not apply to a building contractor whose sole default is that he has not been diligent in performance; and where the owner refuses to make a monthly payment due under the contract, the contractor may rescind.

Conclusiveness of Architect's Certificate.

A certificate of an architect that the contractor has failed to prosecute the work with diligence, made pursuant to a stipulation in the contract authorizing a termination of the contract on the architect certifying that the delinquencies of the contractor justify it, is at most only prima facie evidence in any collateral matter, and is not conclusive in an action by the contractor for the value of work done and material furnished.

Time for Completion of Work — Waiver.

Evidence held to sustain a finding that an owner, employing a contractor to construct a building, waived the time of performance specified in the contract, so that he could not recover damages for delay in completing the work.

[See 134 Am. St. Rep. 693.]

Oral Extension of Time.

A substantial performance of an oral agreement for an extension of time for the completion of a building contract reduced to writing makes the oral agreement a lawful alteration of the written contract.

Effect of Waiver of Stipulation as to Time.

Where time of performance of a building contract, made of the essence, is once waived, another date for performance can only be fixed by definite notice, or by conduct equivalent thereto.

Harmless Error — Overruling of Demurrer.

Where the issues on a cross-complaint are tendered by the affirmative allegations of the answer of defendant, and the evidence relating thereto is fully presented, and the findings embrace them all, overruling of demurrers to the answers to the cross-complaint is not prejudicial error.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco: STURTEVANT, Judge.

Action for labor and material furnished. American-Hawaiian Engineering and Construction Company, plaintiff, and Emma G. Butler, et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant named appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Charles W. Slack for appellant.

Edgar C. Chapman for plaintiff.

Robert H. Countryman for defendant Western Expanded Metal and Fireproofing Company.

[502] SHAW, J.—The defendant Butler, appeals from the judgment and from an order denying her motion for a new trial. The following statement of the case and discussion of the first question presented are taken from the opinion prepared by Mr. Justice Henshaw, upon which the case was decided in department:

"Plaintiff's complaint is in the form of a common count for the value of labor and material furnished defendant. Defendant's answer is by denial, by certain affirmative defenses and by counterclaim. To the end that complete equity might be done, the court ordered the respondent, the Western Expanded Metal and Fireproofing Company, corporation, and a subcontractor of plaintiff, to be brought in. This was done under a cross-complaint filed by defendant. The purpose of so bringing in the Metal and Fireproofing Company was that there might be made by the court an apportionment to it of such share of the judgment awarded to the plaintiff as might be just, so that the defendant might not be subjected to further litigation and perhaps compelled to pay a double judgment. The judgment was in favor of plaintiff in the sum. [503] of $67,326.43, of which the

"The plaintiff had been engaged in the construction of a building for defendant under a written contract. Defendant, contending that plaintiff had violated the terms of the contract, completed the building at her own expense, and her counterclaim is composed of the items of liquidated damages, of the excess which she was obliged to pay for the completion of plaintiff's contract over and above the contract price and of lost rents. The contractor, upon the other hand, insists that defendant first breached the contract, and that by reason of this breach he was justified in rescinding, as in fact he did rescind, and therefore is entitled to recover in his action of quantum meruit and valebat the value of the labor and material which he had bestowed upon and placed in defendant's building. This, in skeleton form, presents the general controversy between the parties. As one of the specific defenses, defendant set up the contract, pleaded the failure and neglect of plaintiff for more than the period of two years to supply the sufficiency of workmen and material and a failure to prosecute the work with promptness and diligence, pleaded the certificate of the architect authorizing the defendant to terminate the employment of plaintiff, and that accordingly 'on or about the 12th of September, 1907, the defendant terminated the employment of the plaintiff as mentioned in said notice, and attempted by her agents and servants to enter upon the premises;' that the entry of her agents and servants was resisted and 'thereafter, on or about the fourteenth day of September, A. D. 1907, the defendant, because of such resistance and because of the continued failure and neglect of the plaintiff to supply a sufficient number of workmen and of materials, and the continued failure of the plaintiff to prosecute the work, wholly terminated the employment of the plaintiff for the said work provided in the said contract, and thereafter, on or about the seventeenth day of September, A. D. 1907, the plaintiff quit work on the said building and left the said building in an unfinished condition.'

"The contract between these parties is in the form approved by the Architects' Association and is in general use throughout the United States and Canada. The terms of this contract [504] pertinent to the questions under consideration are the following:

"By paragraph one the contractor agreed that it would 'well and sufficiently perform and finish, under the direction and to the satisfaction' of the architects all work agreed by the contractor to be performed by it.

"By paragraph seven time is declared to be of the essence of the contract.

"By paragraph eight the contractor agreed to prosecute the work with diligence and to complete it according to the plans on or before September 1, 1906. The contractor agreed to pay $200 a day as liquidated damages for every day after the date fixed for completion on which the contract stood uncompleted.

"By paragraph ten provision is made for extending the time for the completion of the contract when delay was caused by the owner or by the act of God but extensions were not to be recognized unless a claim were presented in writing by the contractor at the time of the delay whereupon the architects were to ascertain and certify the amount of additional time to be allowed.

"Paragraph sixteen is as follows: 'Should the contractor at any time refuse or neglect to supply a sufficiency of properly skilled workmen, or of materials of the proper quality, or fail in any respect to prosecute the work with promptness and diligence, or fail in the performance of any of the agreements on his part herein contained, such refusal, neglect or failure being certified by the architects, the owner shall be at liberty, after three days' written notice to the contractor, to provide any such labor and materials, and to deduct the costs thereof from any money then due or thereafter to become due to the contractor under this contract; and if the architects shall certify that such refusal, neglect or failure is sufficient grounds for such action, the owner shall also be at liberty to terminate the employment of the contractor for the said work and enter upon the premises and take possession of all materials thereon, and to employ any other person or persons to finish the work, and to provide the materials therefor; and in case of such discontinuance of the employment of the contractor, he shall not be entitled to receive any further payment under this contract until the said work shall be wholly [506] finished at which time, if the unpaid balance of the amount to be paid under this contract shall exceed the expense incurred by the owner in finishing the work, such excess shall be paid by the owner to the contractor, but if such expense shall exceed the unpaid balance, the contractor shall pay the difference to the owner. The expense incurred by the owner, as herein provided, either for furnishing materials or for finishing the work and any damage incurred through such default shall be audited and certified by the architects.'

"By paragraph seventeen payments of monthly installments were to be made to the contractor. These payments were to be seventy-five per cent of the value of the workmanship and materials incorporated by the contractor in the building during the previous month. No progress payments were to be made until the architects certified in writing that all the work upon the performance of which the payment is to become due had been done to their satisfaction, and until satisfactory evidence was produced that the premises were free from liens and claims chargeable to defendant.

"Paragraph eighteen is as follows: 'It is further mutually agreed between the parties hereto that no certificate given or payment made under this contract, except the final certificate or final payment, shall be conclusive evidence of the performance of this contract, either wholly or in part against any claim of the owner, and no payment made (even the final payment) or the partial or complete release of any sureties given in connection with this contract shall be construed as an acceptance of defective work, or as a release of the contractor from the obligation to promptly repair and make good such defective work, as soon as discovered, and to reimburse the owner for any loss or damage resulting from such defective work.'

"The certificate given by the architects to the owner is as follows:

"August 26, 1907.

"To Mrs. Emma G. Butler, 2005 Sutter St.,

"San Francisco, California.

"We hereby certify that the American-Hawaiian Engineering and Construction Company, Ltd., the contractor for certain work on your building in course of construction on the southwest corner of Geary and Stockton Streets in the City [506] and County of San Francisco, State of California, has failed and neglected to supply a sufficient number of workmen and has failed and neglected to supply sufficient materials to perform the following of the said work according to the terms of its contract,—namely: The plumbing work, the ornamental iron work, the work on the sidewalk arches, the sidewalk work generally, the work on the elevator tops and the work connected with the main roof of the said building.

"And we hereby further certify that the said contractor has failed and neglected to prosecute the above mentioned work, and the work generally to be performed by it under its said contract with promptness and diligence.

"And we hereby further certify that the said failure and neglect of the said contractor is seriously delaying, interrupting and preventing the proper prosecution of the work on other branches of the said building not included in the said contract.

"And we hereby further certify that the said failure and neglect of the said contractor are sufficient grounds to warrant you in terminating the employment of the said contractor for the said work, and to warrant you in entering upon the said premises and taking possession of all materials thereon, and in employing any other person or persons to finish the said work and to provide the materials therefor.

"REID BROS.

"By Jas. W. Reid,

"Architects of the said Building."

"The notification given by the owner to the contractor is as follows:

"San Francisco, Cal., September 3, 1907.

"To the American-Hawaiian Engineering and Construction Company, Ltd., 332 Turk St., San Francisco, Cal.

"You are hereby notified that Reid Brothers, architects of the building in course of construction for the undersigned on the southwest corner of Geary and Stockton streets, in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, have issued a certificate, of which the inclosed is a copy.

"And you are hereby further notified to supply a sufficient number of workmen and sufficient materials to perform the following work on said building which you are required to perform under your contract with the undersigned, and [507] to prosecute the said work with promptness and diligence: The plumbing work, the ornamental iron work, the work on the sidewalk arches, the sidewalk work generally, the work on the elevator tops, and the work connected with the main roof generally.

"And you are hereby further notified that if you fail or neglect, for the period of three (3) days after this notice shall have been served upon you, to supply a sufficient number of workmen and sufficient materials to perform the said work and to prosecute the said work with promptness and diligence, the undersigned will terminate your employment for the said work, and will enter upon the said premises and take possession of all materials thereon, and will employ others to finish the said work and will provide the materials therefor, and will otherwise proceed as in the said contract provided.

"Yours, etc.,

"EMMA G. BUTLER,

"By H. C. Breeden,

"Her attorney in fact."

"Certain of the court's findings are as follows:

"8. That on the 4th day of September, 1907, plaintiff made and presented to defendant its estimate of all of the materials and labor incorporated in said building by plaintiff during the month of August, 1907, amounting to the sum of $16,311.58; accompanied with a demand that seventy-five per cent of the amount thereof, to wit, $12,233.64, be paid to plaintiff; but said seventy-five per cent of said last mentioned estimate was not then or ever paid by defendant, nor did defendant ever pay or offer to pay plaintiff any portion of the same, nor has defendant ever paid or offered to pay plaintiff for any materials and labor incorporated in said building subsequent to the month of July, 1907.

"9. That on or about the 17th day of September, 1907, plaintiff again demanded of defendant the payment to it of the sum of $12,233.69, the same being seventy-five per cent of the value of the materials and labor so as aforesaid incorporated in said building during the month of August, 1907, but defendant, without stating any reason, cause, or excuse for so doing, did then and there refuse, and has ever since refused, to pay seventy-five per cent, or any per cent, of said last named sum or any sum of money whatever."

[508] "10. That after such last mentioned refusal on the part of defendant on to wit, the 17th day of September, 1907, plaintiff, rescinded the said contract so as aforesaid made and entered into on said 29th day of June, 1905, by and between defendant and plaintiff, and did cease to furnish any materials or perform any labor for or upon or about said building after said 17th day of September, 1907."

"17. That from and after the 1st day of September, 1906, down to and including the 17th day of September, 1907, the defendant paid plaintiff monthly as the work of the construction of said building progressed, excepting only for work done thereon during the months of August and September, 1907, without deducting or attempting to deduct from any of the said estimates of plaintiff, so as aforesaid presented by it, or making any claim for damages, liquidated or otherwise, by reason of any delay in completing said contract of June 29th, 1905, within the time fixed therein for completion thereof, to wit, September 1, 1906. And in this connection the court finds the fact to be that both plaintiff and defendant well knew that said building could not be completed pursuant to the terms and provisions of said original contract pertaining thereto, unless and until defendant should first complete the work so as aforesaid damaged and destroyed, and that the conditions surrounding and affecting all building operations in said city and county of San Francisco were so uncertain and abnormal that neither plaintiff nor defendant was in a position to determine the time within which the said restoration work could be completed. And the court further finds that shortly after said fire and earthquake, and at the time said last mentioned contract was so as aforesaid entered into, plaintiff and defendant then and there mutually agreed to carry out the work of the construction of said building according to the original plans and specifications thereof and under the terms and provisions of said original contract, except as to time of completing said work; and in this behalf the court finds that no time was agreed upon by and between plaintiff and defendant as to time of completing said building.'

"18. That, except as herein otherwise stated, it is not true that plaintiff failed and neglected, or failed or neglected, for more than a period of two years, or any other period of [509] time, to supply a sufficiency of workmen and materials, or a sufficiency of workmen or materials, or failed to prosecute the said work as provided in said contract with promptness and diligence, but in this behalf the court finds that plaintiff proceeded with said work with promptness and diligence from and after the 29th day of June, 1905, to and including the 17th day of September, 1907, and except as to time of performance complied with all of the terms and provisions of said contract on its part to be performed.'

"19. . . . And in this behalf the court finds that plaintiff at the time said notice of September 3d, 1907, and the copy of said certificate of August 26, 1907, were so as aforesaid served upon plaintiff, there had been no delay upon the part of plaintiff in the work of constructing said building, nor had plaintiff failed to supply a sufficient number of workmen or sufficient materials to perform the work mentioned in said notice; or in said certificate, but on the contrary, the court finds the fact to be that all of the work specified in said notice and said certificate was being performed with promptness and diligence and in a manner to meet all of the requirements of the terms and provisions of said contract on the part of the plaintiff to be performed. That on the 28th day of August, 1907, and subsequent thereto, the general progress of the work of the construction of said building did not require the immediate furnishing of any ornamental iron work, the putting in of the sidewalk arches, the building of the sidewalks generally, the work on the elevator tops, or the work connected with the main roof generally. And, in this connection, the court finds that said last named work could have been performed within the period of thirty (30) days, while the interior work of the building was being performed, which interior work would necessarily require several months to perform. That after, as well as at all times prior to the receipt of said notice of September 3d, 1907, by plaintiff, plaintiff performed the plumbing work pertaining to said building with promptness and diligence; and also performed with promptness and diligence all other work pertaining to said building at all of the times and during all the periods of time from and after the 29th day of June, 1905, to and including the 17th day of September, 1907.'

[510] "20. That on the 12th day of September, 1907, without any fault on the part of plaintiff, defendant, without cause, provocation or excuse, attempted to terminate the employment of plaintiff to as much only of said work as is set forth in said notice of September 3d, 1907, by entering upon said premises by her agents and servants and by attempting to take from plaintiff forcible possession of a portion of said premises and also forcible possession of a portion of the materials thereon and to employ others to finish such of the work only as was and is set forth in said notice of September 3d, 1907, but no attempt was made by said agents and servants of defendant to take possession of the whole of said premises, or of all of the materials thereon or to employ others to finish the entire work of the construction of said building as set forth in said contract of June 29th, 1905; defendant's said agents and servants were then and there resisted in said attempt to take forcible possession of any portion of said premises, or forcible possession of any of said materials, or to perform any labor in said building by the agents and servants of the plaintiff, whereupon the agents and servants of the defendant did then and there desist from any further attempt either to take possession of said premises or any of said materials to perform any labor in, upon, or about said building.'

"21. That on the 17th day of September, 1907, the plaintiff ceased all of the work on said building under said contract of June 29th, 1905, modified as aforesaid, and left said work in an unfinished condition, but, in this behalf, the court finds that on said last named day plaintiff rescinded said contract upon the ground that defendant was indebted to plaintiff for materials and labor incorporated in said building during the month of August, 1907, amounting to $12,233.64, for which it, plaintiff, had not been paid, after demand having been duly made by plaintiff upon defendant for such payment.'

"Analyzing paragraph 16 of the contract, it means that the architect having certified to the owner the refusal or neglect of the contractor in any of the indicated particulars, the owner, after three days' notice to the contractor to supply the deficiency or make good the neglect, and upon the contractor's failure after three days' notice so to do, may provide any such labor or material and deduct the money from the [511] amount due or to become due to the contractor. The architect may further certify to the owner that the refusal or neglect of the contractor is sufficient ground to justify the owner in terminating the whole contract, in which case, upon the three days' notice from the owner to the contractor, so declaring the owner's intent, the owner may enter upon the premises, take possession of all materials thereon, and employ any other person or persons to finish the work.' In other words, this is a provision for a rescission of the contract at the instance of the owner for the default of the contractor. The provision of paragraph 16 of this contract touching the termination of the whole contract needs no further elucidation. The provision authorizing the owner to provide the necessary labor and material when the contractor fails so to do does not contemplate a termination of the whole contract, and does contemplate nothing more than the supplying of a sufficient number of properly skilled workmen or the supplying of a sufficiency of proper material to be used by the contractor under his contract, in the event that he himself shall have refused or neglected to supply them. As it contemplates that the material thus furnished by the owner shall be used by the contractor under his contract, so also it contemplates that the skilled workmen furnished by the owner shall also be employed by the contractor under his contract. Referring to the certificate of the architect, it will be noted that it conforms in all respects to the provisions of paragraph 16 of the contract, and that it is a certificate authorizing and empowering the owner not alone to supply labor and material, but also to terminate the contract because of the failure and neglect of the contractor properly to prosecute his work. Specifically, the architect's certificate enumerated six branches of the work as to which the contractor was delinquent. The notice by the owner called upon the contractor to supply a sufficient number of workmen and sufficient material to perform those six specified pieces of work, and declared that if the contractor failed, for the period of three days, to supply a sufficient number of workmen and sufficient materials to perform the work, and to prosecute the work with promptness and diligence 'the undersigned will terminate your employment for the said work, and will enter upon the said premises and take possession of all materials thereon and will employ others to finish [512] the said work.' But, springing from the nature of such certificates, their power for weal or woe, and the fact that they contemplate forfeitures and the right of rescission, the terms of the certificates themselves are strictly construed. In other words, to make such a certificate operative, there must be a substantial compliance by the architect with the terms of the contract touching its issuance. (O'Keefe v. St. Francis' Church, 59 Conn. 551, 22 Atl. 325; White v. Mitchell, 30 Ind. App. 342, 65 N. E. 1061; Charlton v. Scoville, 144 N. Y. 691, 39 N. E. 394.) The same reasons call for the same strict construction of the notice following the architect's certificate which the contract requires shall be given by the owner to the contractor. By this it is not meant that any precise form of words is required in the notice, but the notice must be such as fairly and fully to advise the contractor of what the owner demands and what the owner will do in the event of a noncompliance with the demand. The notice given in this case misconceived the meaning and import of paragraph 16 of the contract. That paragraph does not contemplate a termination of the employment of the contractor for only a part of the work. As to any part of the work touching which, according to the architect's certificate, the contractor is delinquent, the owner may furnish the requisite labor and material, which shall be used by and charged to the contractor. But the owner may not oust the contractor from that part of the contract and undertake to perform it himself independent of the contractor. This is what the notice here declared that the owner proposed to do. Such a construction, we say, is foreign to the meaning of paragraph 16, and would lead to utter confusion and inharmony. It can be readily seen that it would be practically impossible to proceed with work under such conditions. If the contractor has become so delinquent as to justify the owner in terminating his contract, then, under the architect's certificate to this effect, the owner may do so, after notice. The authorization so to do was in this instance given to the owner by the architect's certificate, but the owner did not notify the contractor that she proposed to exercise her right in this regard."

The consequences of this failure on the part of the owner to follow up the architect's certificate with a lawful notice to the contractor that its employment would be terminated, are [513] that the owner was not authorized to take charge of the work or premises, or any part thereof, as she attempted to do on September 12, 1907, that the plaintiff was justified in resisting such attempt, and that the alleged attempt of the owner, on September 14, 1907, to terminate the employment of the plaintiff under the contract, in accordance with paragraph 16 thereof, even if it had been proven that such attempt extended to the whole work instead of only parts thereof, would have been ineffectual and vain. In the light of this conclusion, we must consider whether or not the plaintiff was justified in rescinding the contract because of the owner's refusal to pay the money due to it for the work done during the month of August, 1907. The right of the plaintiff to recover fails unless it appears that it rightfully rescinded.

It is well settled that where the parties to a building contract thereby authorize the architect, as arbiter, to determine and certify the existence of a fact when such fact becomes material to a proceeding under such contract, the certificate of the architect, duly made, that the fact exists, is conclusive upon the parties with respect to the thing to be done to which such fact relates, or as to which, under the proceeding, it is to affect the rights of the parties, and that such certificate can be impeached as to such facts only for fraud, or for gross mistake amounting to fraud. (Dingley v. Greene, 54 Cal. 333; Moore v. Kerr, 65 Cal. 519, 4 Pac. 542; City St. Imp. Co. v. Marysville, 155 Cal. 419, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 317, 101 Pac. 308.) There can be no doubt that if, in pursuance of said certificate, the owner had given a proper notice terminating the employment, the certificate, if not so impeached, would be conclusive evidence of the delinquency of the contractor in the particulars therein stated, in any controversy growing out of such termination. It is not, however, strictly speaking, a common law award. (M. E. Church, etc. v. Seitz, 74 Cal. 295, 15 Pac. 839; Foster v. Carr, 135 Cal. 86, 67 Pac. 43.)

The object and purpose of paragraph 16, in this regard, was to provide a proceeding whereby the owner might terminate the employment in case the contractor failed in any respect to perform the contract. It does not purport to qualify or affect the right of the contractor to receive the moneys due him for work already done at the time of his failure, [514] unless the proceeding is carried to the extent of an actual discontinuance of the contractor's employment. To provide for that contingency the paragraph declares that "in case of such discontinuance of the employment of the contractor, he shall not be entitled to receive any further payment under this contract," until the work shall have been wholly finished by the owner. It will be seen that the right to receive the regular monthly payments under the 17th paragraph does not cease until, nor unless, there has been a valid termination of the employment in the manner provided and that such termination bars only the right to "any further payment." The certificate of delinquency is conclusive thereof for the purpose of authorizing a termination and for the purpose, after such termination, of authorizing the owner to refuse further payments under the contract. The certificate here given does not state that any of the work done was defective or not in conformity with the contract. All it declares is that part of the work had not been diligently prosecuted. Under the terms of the contract, the plaintiff was entitled, on the first day of each month, to a payment equal to three-fourths of the value of the work and materials put into the structure during the preceding month. The facts stated in the certificate had no bearing whatever upon the right of plaintiff to the September payment for the August work. No matter how slowly the work was carried on, the plaintiff, until its employment was lawfully discontinued under the contract, was entitled to the contract payments for the work properly done. It follows that the facts stated in this certificate, admitting for the present that it is conclusive, did not deprive plaintiff of the right to demand and receive payment for the August work, nor justify the owner in refusing to make said payment.

Paragraph seventeen of the contract, with regard to the monthly payments, provided "that before each payment, if required, the contractor shall give the architects good and sufficient evidence that the premises are free from all liens and claims chargeable to the said contractor; and further, that if at any time there shall be any lien or claim for which, if established, the owner of said premises might be made liable, and which would be chargeable to the said contractor, the owner shall have the right to retain out of any payment then due or thereafter to become due, an amount sufficient to completely [515] indemnify himself against such lien or claim." The requirement or demand for evidence, mentioned in the first part of this provision, was not made. At the time of the demand for payment for August work, there was a claim against the contractors in favor of the Western Expanded Metal and Fireproofing Company, on account of which Mrs. Butler might have withheld that payment, if she had so desired. The refusal to pay was not based on that fact, but on the fact that she then believed that she had lawfully terminated the plaintiff's employment. Neither the lack of evidence of freedom from liens, nor the existence of the said claim, was pleaded in the answer as an excuse for the refusal to pay. Under these circumstances the absence of a finding on the subject is immaterial. The amount of the claim is stated in the findings and judgment. But as the only relief given to that defendant is a direction that its claim be paid only out of the sum found due to the plaintiff, Mrs. Butler has no further substantial interest concerning it.

The findings do not, in terms, state that the architects did not certify in writing that the August work for which payment was demanded had been done to their satisfaction. The general finding is that plaintiff rescinded the contract upon the ground that the amount owing for August work had not been paid, "after demand having been duly made by plaintiff upon defendant for such payment." This finding appears to be sufficient to support the judgment, so far as this point is concerned. The evidence shows a state of facts under which the owner would not be authorized to insist that there was no archifects' certificate that the work was satisfactorily done. It appears that the custom was for plaintiff, each month, to present to the architects an estimate of the work done and material placed during the preceding month, that this was understood to constitute a request to the architects to examine the work and certify that it was done to their satisfaction. Until September, 1907, this had always been done. When the September estimate was presented the architects said that they were instructed by the owner not to give the certificate. The owner also declared that she would not make any more payments. There was never any claim that the work for August had not been properly done, nor any suggestion that the architects' certificate was desired. The refusal [516] to pay was wholly based upon reasons having no relation to the character of the work. As matter of fact, the work for August was well done. The architects should therefore have given their certificate to that effect. Under these circumstances, the payment for the August work became due, notwithstanding the fact that the architects did not approve and certify to the work, the preliminary certificate must be considered as having been waived, and the demand for payment must be deemed to have been duly made. (Copley v. Durand, 153 Cal. 281, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 791, 95 Pac. 38; Tally v. Ganahl, 151 Cal. 421, 90 Pac. 1049; Wyman v. Hooker, 2 Cal. App. 40, 83 Pac. 79; Antonelle v. Kennedy, etc. Lumber Co. 140 Cal. 309, 73 Pac. 966; 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 1245, 1249; 6 Cyc. 36.) The finding of a due demand is supported by this evidence. The refusal of the owner to pay for three-fourths of the August work was therefore unjustifiable and was a breach of the contract. As to the contractor, the consideration of the contract had thereby, to that extent failed. In such cases the refusal to pay is a sufficient cause for a rescission by the contractor and authorizes a suit upon the quantum meruit for the reasonable value of the work and materials by it incorporated into the building. (San Francisco Bridge Co. v. Dumbarton Land, etc. Co. 119 Cal. 272, 51 Pac. 335; Porter v. Arrowhead Reservoir Co. 100 Cal. 502, 35 Pac. 146; Golden Gate Lumber Co. v. Sahrbacher, 105 Cal. 116, 38 Pac. 635; Carlson v. Sheehan, 157 Cal. 696, 109 Pac. 29; Fairchild-Gilmore-Wilton Co. v. Southern Refining Co. 158 Cal. 273, 110 Pac. 951.)

We are here met with the suggestion that a rescission without the consent of the other party cannot be made except by one who is not himself in default. The rule is usually stated in this general language. (State v. McCauley, 15 Cal. 458; Fairchild-Gilmore-Wilton Co. v. Southern Refining Co. 158 Cal. 273, 110 Pac. 951.) Where the respective obligations upon which each party is in default are dependent and concurrent, the justice and necessity of the rule is obvious. So, also, in cases where the rescinding party's default is so related to the obligation in which the other party has failed that it in some manner affects the performance thereof, or the duty of the other party to perform, the rule is plainly applicable. But no case which has been cited applies this rule to a delinquency of the rescinding [517] party which has no relation to the obligation of the other party, in respect of which the right of rescission is claimed, and which does not excuse, prevent, or interfere with his performance of that obligation, or affect or impair his duty to perform it. Nor have we found any case in which it has been claimed that the rule is thus applicable. It is, in truth, an application of the maxims that he who seeks equity must do equity and must come into court with clean hands. It is well understood that this rule does not apply to all derelictions by the complaining party, but only to a delinquency "connected with the matter in litigation, so that it has in some measure affected the equitable relations subsisting between the two parties, and arising out of the transaction." (1 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, sec. 399; Lewis's Appeal, 67 Pa. St. 166; American Assoc. v. Innis, 109 Ky. 605, 60 S. W. 388; Rice v. Rockefeller, 134 N. Y. 186, 30 Am. St. Rep. 658, 17 L.R.A. 237, 30 N. E. 907; Bethea v. Bethea, 116 Ala. 272, 22 So. 561.) Here the default of the plaintiff, as claimed, was negative; it had not been diligent in performance. The contract provided a remedy for that neglect, a remedy which the owner did not pursue. The neglect specified in the certificate, still conceding its conclusive effect, did not, as we have said, in any way affect the liability of the owner to pay for the work actually done. The plaintiff's dereliction was not connected with the default in the payment or with the obligation to pay but was wholly collateral thereto. The rule referred to does not apply to this case.

There is another sufficient answer to the above suggestion. The court found that the allegations of the answer that the plaintiff had failed and neglected to supply sufficient workmen and materials and to prosecute the work with diligence were untrue. There is ample evidence to sustain these findings. The claim is that the certificate of the architects, above set forth, relating to the abortive attempt to terminate the contract, is conclusive as to the fact of such failure, not only upon any question properly arising in connection with the proceeding for the termination of the plaintiff's employment, or as to which it would be material, but also conclusive between the parties at all times and upon all occasions to which the fact certified to may relate, although upon a matter collateral to the proceeding in and for which the certificate was authorized, [518] and not in any way connected therewith or dependent thereon. We are of the opinion that it is not conclusive in a matter collateral to the proceeding in and for which alone it was authorized to be given. Its sole function was to serve as a basis for a notice terminating the contract. Upon any matter dependent on or arising out of that proceeding, it would be conclusive. But the proceeding failed for want of a proper notice and it thereupon lapsed and became wholly ineffectual. The certificate made to initiate that proceeding, being unauthorized for any other purpose, falls with it, at least so far as its conclusive effect as evidence upon collateral matters is concerned. (Newall v. Elliot, 1 H. & C. (Eng.) 797.) At most it could be no more than prima facie evidence in any collateral matter. The court below properly held that it was not conclusive and was justified by the evidence in finding contrary to its statements of fact.

It is claimed that the plaintiff was in default in failing to complete the building on or before September 1, 1906, as the original contract provided, and upon this ground the defendant, Butler, claims liquidated damages under the contract at two hundred dollars for each day's delay, amounting to one hundred and fifteen thousand dollars, or damages for loss of rents during the delay amounting to $113,433.27.

The court found, in effect, that after April, 1906, a new contract was made by the parties for the completion of the building, providing that it should be completed according to the original plan and specifications and under the terms of the original contract, except that no time of completion thereof was fixed, but the same was left indefinite. It also found other facts which, if true, would operate as a waiver of the claim for damages caused by the delay. If these findings are true it necessarily follows that no damages could be recovered by the owner for the delay in question. It is contended that these findings are contrary to the evidence. We think they are sufficiently supported. When the great fire of April, 1906, occurred, the building was partially completed. The fire destroyed everything in it that was combustible. It also for several months completely prevented the resumption of ordinary business in San Francisco. Under the contract, the owner was bound to restore the destroyed parts of the building and put it in such condition that the remainder of the work could be done. [519] She elected to do so and for that purpose she employed the plaintiff to do the work of restoration. She knew it could not be done until after September 1, 1906, the time fixed in the original contract for the completion of the entire building, but she did not specify any time within which the work of restoration should be completed. In fact, it was not completed until more than two months after the above date. She made no complaint of this delay whatever, but thereupon directed the plaintiff to proceed with the work and complete the building in accordance with the original plans. Thereafter she directed the work to proceed, made the monthly payments regularly as they became due and allowed the contractor to go on expending large sums of money in the building, without ever mentioning the fact, now claimed, that liquidated damages at two hundred dollars a day, or damages by loss of rents, from September 1, 1906, had been and were accruing, and without ever claiming or suggesting the right to deduct such damages from the monthly payments. The stipulation as to time and damages were both for the benefit of the owner and she could waive them if she desired. The suggestion that the supplemental agreement was oral and therefore was not effectual to alter the written contract, is disposed of by the fact that the new agreement for an extension of time was relied on by the plaintiff and was acted upon by it to such an extent as to be a practical performance thereof and sufficiently to estop the owner from denying either the making of the agreement for an indefinite extension or the waiver of the covenants aforesaid. This substantial performance of the oral agreement would make it lawful as an oral alteration of a written contract. Furthermore, the time of performance even when it is made of the essence, if it is once waived, sets the matter at large, and another date for performance can only be fixed by a definite notice, or by conduct equivalent thereto. (Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 297, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126, 110 Pac. 947.) The facts found clearly show a waiver of the right to demand damages for delay in completion after September 1, 1906. The evidence still more clearly establishes such waiver.

The question whether the demurrers to the answers of the plaintiff and the other defendant to the amended cross-complaint of Mrs. Butler, on the ground that they were uncertain [520] and ambiguous, were properly overruled, is of no importance. The issues arising upon the cross-complaint were all tendered by the affirmative allegations of her answer, the evidence relating thereto was fully presented, and the findings embrace them all. If the answers were uncertain or ambiguous, as claimed, it is clear that the owner was in no wise prejudiced or misled thereby.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Henshaw, J., Angellotti, J., Lorigan, J., Sloss, J., and Melvin, J. concurred.

Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J.—I dissent from the order denying a rehearing. The validity of the judgment in favor of the contractor depends upon his right to rescind the written contract, and he had no right to rescind if it was not a breach of the contract on the part of Mrs. Butler to refuse payment of his demand for the August work. She had a perfect right to refuse payment of that demand if, as is conceded, there was a claim of the Western Expanded Metal and Fireproofing Co.—as subcontractor—then existing for more than the contractor's claim. And the fact that she did not put her refusal on that ground is of no consequence unless her failure to do so in some way raises an estoppel.

I cannot see that it does.

Thus in Geary v. Bangs, 37 Ill. App. 301, affirmed 138 Ill. 77, 27 N. E. 462, the court said: "The first question of law presented for our determination upon record, and stands, is whether a party, who is engaged in the performance of a contract, may, on the other party's refusal to comply with some stipulation on his part to be performed, such as in this case, the payment of an instalment of money when due, abandon the further performance of the contract and sustain an action to recover for the work already performed. While it cannot be said that a failure to pay an instalment due on a contract is an absolute prevention of the performance, still we know that in many instances, particularly in building contracts, the nonpayment of an instalment when due will render it necessary for the contractor to abandon the work. But the true ground is that a refusal to pay in accordance with the terms of the agreement is a breach which indicates that the one who is guilty of it, does not intend to be bound by the contract, and therefore the other party may rescind it and recover for the work he has done."

In Tubbs v. Delillo, 19 Cal. App. 612, 127 Pac. 514, it appeared that the plaintiff and the defendant had entered into a contract for the construction of a building on a lot of land owned by the defendant. The consideration was to be paid in seven instalments as the work progressed. Under the terms of the contract each instalment was payable on the contractor's written statement showing that the necessary amount of work had been done to entitle him thereto. It was also agreed that if the owner delayed for more than five days in paying an instalment, such delay, at the contractor's option, might be deemed a prevention by the owner of the performance of the contract. The owner was in default on the fifth instalment and the contractor, having demanded his payment, relinquished further operations on the building. The court said: "The owner's refusal to make any further payment, in the purview of the contract, placed him in default and entitled the contractor to recover the balance due for the work performed. It would make no difference that the contractor continued to work a few days longer than he was required, as this would be rather a favor to the owner."

In Swartz v. Saunders, 46 Ill. 18, the action was instituted to enforce a mechanic's lien against the property of the defendant. The plaintiff had contracted to perform all the carpenter work on a certain building being erected by the defendant and was to receive therefor a certain agreed sum. The plaintiff was also entitled to demand and receive from the architect in charge, from time to time, estimates of the amount due for work done, which amounts were to be immediately paid by the defendant. The plaintiff applied on the 16th of October to the architect for an estimate of the amount due him at that time under the contract, and received from him a written estimate or certificate, that he was then entitled to a payment of fifteen hundred dollars on the contract. He presented this certificate on and at different times after its date, to the defendant and demanded payment, which was refused. On the night of the 21st of October, 1866, the building, not then having received the upper joists, and being uncovered, was blown down by a high wind and destroyed. The court said: "Before the walls had fallen, the defendant had failed to pay the estimate to which the appellee was entitled under the contract, and after their fall appellant insisted and claimed that although he had failed to pay appellee for the work he had done, he was bound to proceed and replace his portion of the work thus destroyed, and that too, without any compensation. This was an unjust demand, with which appellee was not bound to comply. He had once done the work and for which payment had been refused. That he had a right to abandon the work, under the circumstances, seems a proposition so plain as to require no argument. The claim made by appellant upon the appellee, to replace the work destroyed, and that too, gratuitously, was in effect, a denial of all obligation to pay for the work done; and was of itself a sufficient justification to appellee to abandon the contract."

However, in Murray Bros. Co. v. Aroostook Valley R. Co. 109 Me. 350, 84 Atl. 457, it was held that where work is being done on a percentage basis and the agreement includes a stipulation that the contractor is not to pay more than a certain sum for laborers, the fact that the owner justly complains that the contractor is paying higher wages than are necessary and refuses to continue to pay unreasonably high wages, is not such a breach of contract as will justify the contractors in abandoning the work. And in Davis v. Ford, 81 Md. 333, 32 Atl. 280, it was held that a contractor was not justified in abandoning his contract because of the failure of his employer to pay for extra work where it appeared that the extra work was performed without any agreement as to price, as provided in the contract, and the demand for payment was not made for more than a year after the particular work was completed.

In Nelson v. San Antonio Traction Co. (Tex.) 142 S. W. 146, it appeared that the contractor was obligated by the terms of his contract to lay certain pavement and to maintain the same for a period of ten years. After the pavement had been completed there was due the contractor the last instalment under the terms of the contract. This the defendant refused to pay although no valid reason for a refusal existed at the time. Subsequently action was instituted by a sub-contractor to enforce a mechanic's lien against the property of the defendant and the defendant instituted a cross-action to recover for breach of contract in failing to keep the pavement in repair. The court said: "We are of opinion that the default of the traction company in making the final payment did not operate to release [the contractor] from his undertaking to guarantee the maintenance of the pavement. It gave him a right of action immediately against the traction company for the balance, and the latter could be compelled at his suit, as has been done in this proceeding, to pay him with interest. There is no basis for a contention that [the contractor's] agreement to repair for ten years was dependent for its existence or continued existence upon payments being made at the times specified in the contract. [He] is asking for the complete payment of the consideration for his contract, which was to do the work and to maintain it for ten years. For the amount to be paid him, he agreed, not only to do the work, but to maintain it afterwards. He certainly is in no position to require the traction company to pay said consideration to the last cent, and deny his obligation to fully perform that which he was to do for such consideration." In Cranford Co. v. New York, 150 App. Div. 195, 134 N. Y. S. 839, the court held that what would amount to an unexcusable or unreasonable delay on the part of an individual in making a payment, might not in the case of a municipal corporation justify the contractor in rescinding his contract.

In Canada, it seems that the mere refusal of the owner to make payments in accordance with the terms of a building contract, does not justify the contractor in discontinuing work on the building. Thus in Kelly v. Tourist Hotel Co. 20 Ont. L. Rep. 267, it appeared that the plaintiff agreed to construct a hotel building to the complete satisfaction of the architect for a certain sum, payable in monthly instalments in accordance with the estimates issued by the architect, and to deliver to the defendant a bond in the sum of $10,000 for the faithful performance of his contract. The plaintiff commenced work and six progress certificates were issued by the architect, in accordance with the terms of the agreement. Five of these certificates were paid by the defendants, and a portion of the sixth; but, the plaintiffs having failed to deliver the bond in accordance with the agreement, the defendants refused to make any further payments on account of the progress certificates until the delivery of the bond. The plaintiffs thereupon stopped work on the building, and brought an action to recover the amount of the balance they claimed for all work done and materials supplied by them, on a quantum meruit. The court recognized the right of the plaintiff to sue for the amounts certified to be due, but held that they were not justified in abandoning their contract and said: "We agree with the view of the local Master that the respondents' refusal to make further payments was not justifiable, and that the appellants were not justified in discontinuing work on the building. . . . It follows that the appellants were not entitled, at all events at the commencement of the action, to be paid anything but the sums for which the architect had given them progress estimates, in accordance with the provisions of the agreement, the written certificate of the architect to the effect that the payment is 'due' being a condition precedent to the right of the appellants to payment." However, in Clayton v. McConnell, 14 Ont. 608, it appeared that the defendant and owner not only refused to pay the contractors the amount due under their building contract but caused them delay by not having certain joists ready at the proper time for their use and when the contractors asked for more money he finally told them to go on with their work, or, if they would not go on, to leave the building. The court said: "It is true the defendant did not in express terms forbid the plaintiffs proceeding with the work, but he did, by the expression used by him, leave it optional with the plaintiffs to proceed with or abandon the work. They accepted the option; and therefore I am of opinion the learned Referee was right when he found the plaintiffs were justified in considering the contract at an end."

Wrongful Refusal of Certificate by Architect.

A building contractor is justified in abandoning his work and instituting proceedings to recover for the value of his labor and materials where he is not in default and is entitled to a payment, and the architect wrongfully or unreasonably refuses to issue a certificate for payment. Batchelor v. Kirkride, 26 Fed. 899; Flaherty v. Miner, 123 N. Y. 382, 25 N. E. 418; Thomas v. Stewart, 132 N. Y. 580, 30 N. E. 577; Smith v. Corn, 3 Misc. 545, 23 N. Y. S. 326. And see the reported case. See also Bean v. Miller, 69 Mo. 384. Thus in Batchelor v. Kirkride, supra, the court said: "This suit was brought by the contractor upon the quantum meruit, on the allegation and assumption that the owner had unlawfully terminated the contract, and that he was entitled to recover payment for the work which he had actually done. The jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff for the sum of $13,168.54. Under the charge of the learned circuit justice this verdict must be held to have established (1) that the work has sufficiently progressed in the months of February and March to entitle the plaintiff to the certificates; (2) that the architects fraudulently refused to give them; and (3) that the defendant failed to make the payments when the contractor demanded them, and was entitled to them under the contract, and wrongfully took the building out of his hands. The jury was advised by the court, on the trial, that unless these questions of fact were found for the plaintiff he could not recover in this action. The counsel for the defendant, on the argument, insisted that a new trial should be granted, because there was no evidence of collusion between the owner and the architects; that no proof was offered that he induced them to withhold the certificates; and, even admitting that the architects acted fraudulently, the owner was not to be prejudiced by such action unless he was in some way a party to the fraud. The counsel for the plaintiff, on the other hand, contended that a fraudulent refusal of the architects to furnish a certificate, when the work was sufficiently progressed to call for one, whether in collusion with the owner or for any other cause not traceable to the influence and action of the contractor, justified the latter in not going on with the work until paid; and when the owner taking advantage of the fraudulent conduct of the architects, went into the possession of the unfurnished building, and completed it, the contractor had a legal right to recover for the value of the work done up to the time when the owner took the charge and control.

We have thus presented for consideration an interesting, and, judging from the conflicting views in various cases which I have examined, I may add, unsettled, question, contracts of this character for the erection of buildings or the construction of other kinds of work are not common. As a rule, the owner has the means to pay, but wishes to guard against loss by paying no faster than the progress of the work warranted, and the contractor is dependent upon the moneys received during the progress of the building for the means of carrying the undertaking on to completion. A third party is therefore selected to determine when the payments ought to be made. In the present case the third party were the architects of the builder, and the contractor agreed to be bound by their judgment, not their fraudulent but honest judgment, in regard to the payment of the several instalments provided for in the contract. Evidence was offered tending or, at least, designed to show that during the progress of the work these architects complained to the contractor that they were not receiving enough money from the owner to pay them for superintending the buildings in their construction; that they had the opportunity, under the terms of the contract, to determine whether the work should cost him forty thousand dollars or sixty thousand dollars; and that it was to his interest, therefore, to pursue a liberal policy towards them if he wished them to decide any matters depending on their judgment in his favor. He naturally concluded, when the architects refused their certificates in the months of February and March, that they were not expressing their honest convictions, but were pursuing a course which they imagined would bring them compensation for changing their judgment. There is no pretense that the builder was in collusion with them. They were not acting to benefit him, but themselves. On the other hand, the testimony indicates that he was ready and willing to pay when the architects signed the certificates that the work was sufficiently advanced to render it safe for him to do so. Whether the work had so far progressed as to entitle the contractor to have the certificates, and whether they were withheld for a fraudulent purpose, were questions of fact which the jury has determined in favor of the plaintiff, and I quite agree with the circuit justice in his charge that fraud by the arbiters, although not in collusion with the defendant, entitles the plaintiff to recover." In Thomas v. Stewart, 132 N. Y. 580, 30 N. E. 577, the New York Court of Appeals set out and affirmed the opinion of the lower court wherein it was said: "According to the evidence of the contractors, they made four demands of the architect for a certificate that they were entitled to the second payment. On the occasion of the first demand he refused because the door-jamba were not set. Thereupon the contractors, although claiming that the door-jamba were not a necessary part of completing the house to the laying of the floors and the setting of the partitions, proceeded to set the door-jamba, when they again demanded a certificate, but the architect said that he would not issue one until the piazza was up. The contractors insisted that this was not required because it was outside of the house, but notwithstanding, they put it up and laid the floors therein. When the certificate was next demanded the architect refused it because the piazza was not finished. They informed the owner of what they had done, and that the architect would not give a certificate, and asked him to pay them, but he refused, stating that he did not know anything about it, and that everything was left with the architect. A witness testified to a statement made by the architect, although the latter denied it, that in drawing the contract he had made the first and second payments too large, thus suggesting a personal reason for his persistent refusal. There was no request to find that the piazza was not finished. We think that the evidence warranted the finding, as made by the trial court, that the architect unreasonably withheld the certificate. While it may have been proper to require the piazza to be erected and the floor thereof laid, so that progress of erection should be uniform inside and outside of the building, it does not seem reasonable to require the piazza to be finished at a period when no part of the interior was finished. The second payment was earned when the floors were laid and the partitions set, ready for the masons. This did not include the completion of the back piazza, either by specific mention or because that work was necessary in order to do anything that was specifically mentioned. As the refusal of the architect was based upon an unreasonable requirement, it furnished no protection to the owner."

In Bean v. Miller, 69 Mo. 384, it was held that where a contractor has abandoned his contract because of the default of the owner in making payments, and the engineer has made no final or full estimate of all the work done as provided by the contract, the contractor will be permitted to recover for the whole amount of work done, whether estimated or not.

However, in Fox v. Clark, 44 App. Div. 626, 60 N. Y. S. 237, it appeared that the plaintiff entered into a contract to build two houses for the defendant according to certain plans and specifications. It was agreed that certain payments should be made at various times when the buildings had advanced to a certain stage of completion. It was further provided that "in each case of the said payments, a certificate shall be obtained from, and signed by, [the] architect, to the effect that the work is done in strict accordance with the plans and specifications, and that he considers the payments properly due." The plaintiff began work in December and subsequently the architect gave two certificates for a payment on account of each of the two buildings. On February 1st, the plaintiff requested another certificate from the architect for a second payment on one of the houses. The architect made an examination, and found that the payment was not due; that there were several things yet to be done before there was anything due under the terms of the contract, and he made a memorandum of the work necessary to be done before he could give a certificate. The work continued on the houses until the 7th day of February, when the defendant received a letter from the plaintiff stating that the second payments were due on both houses, and that, as they had not been paid, they had stopped work. The court said: "The test of whether that payment was due was whether the buildings were 'inclosed and ready for lathing,' and it was stipulated in the contract that the evidence of this fact should be the certificate of the architecture to the effect 'that the work is done in strict accordance with the drawings and specifications, and that he considers the payment properly due.' The complaint contains no averment that the architect unreasonably withheld his certificate, as it should have done. . . . The defendant did not call the attention of the court to the defect, but it may be said that there was no evidence in the case from which it could be fairly inferred that the architect was actuated by any improper motives in refusing to give the certificate at the time. He was required by the contract to state, in effect, that 'the work is done in strict accordance with the drawings and specifications, and that he considers the payment properly due.' Admitting that evidence might be received in support of the theory that the certificate was unreasonably withheld, to establish such unreasonableness, under the provisions of the contract, it was necessary to show, not only an absolute compliance with the drawings and specifications, but facts which would establish that the architect could not, with any fair degree of reason, have any doubt that the payment was 'properly due.' We fail to find such evidence in the record. On the contrary, it appears from the plaintiff's own admissions that the heating pipes, speaking tubes, etc., which the plans and specifications called for, and which it was necessary should be in place before the lathing could be completed, were not in the building at the date mentioned. This being merely a payment of an instalment, there could be so substantial performance which would render the payment due. The plaintiff suffered no legal wrong by having his payment deferred until he had complied with the conditions necessary to entitle him to payment. He could have completed the construction within the terms and conditions of the contract, and recovered the amount agreed upon, by showing a substantial performance of the whole contract, but he could not claim that a single instalment was due, except by complying with the letter of agreement under which the parties were acting. He did not have the certificate of the architect required by the contract. He has not established that he had the buildings in the condition demanded by the agreement as a condition of the second payment becoming due, or that the architect had reason to believe that the payment was fairly due. Under these circumstances, it cannot be held that the defendant had failed to keep his covenant; and, without default on his part, it cannot be said that there was any ground for a rescission of the contract." In National Contracting Co. v. Com. 183 Mass. 89, 66 N. E. 639, the action was instituted to recover damages for a breach of contract. The plaintiff's petition alleged, inter alia, that the defendant was required to furnish once in each week an approximate estimate of the amount of work done and its value and to furnish the contractor with an order for the payment of eighty-five per cent of the value estimated and that he had failed to furnish the estimate and order as provided in the agreement. The clause of the contract invoked by the plaintiff was as follows: "The engineer shall, once a week, make an approximate estimate in writing of the amount of work done and of the relative value thereof, according to the terms of this contract. And said engineer may make such allowance in said weekly estimates as he may deem reasonable on account of the work having been more or less difficult than the average of this contract. And it is expressly understood that said weekly estimates shall only be made when the work progresses in accordance with the provisions of this contract and specifications. Upon each such weekly estimate being made, the board will give an order on the treasurer of the Commonwealth for the payment to said contractor of eighty-five per cent of such estimated value." The defendants demurred to the petition on the ground that it did not aver that the work was progressing in accordance with the provisions of the contract. The court said: "We are of opinion that this is a good ground of demurrer. The petitioner was not entitled to an estimate unless the work was progressing in accordance with the contract, and this should have been alleged."

For cases discussing generally, the conclusiveness of the decision of an architect or engineer under a working contract, see the notes to Williams v. Mount Hood, R. etc. Co. Ann. Cas. 1913A 177, and Mercantile Trust Co. v. Hensey, 10 Ann. Cas. 572.

Effect of Default of Contractor.

If the contractor is in default and has not fulfilled his obligations under the contract according to its terms at the time he demands payment, he is not justified in leaving the work. Golden Gate Lumber Co. v. Sahrbacher, 105 Cal. 114, 38 Pac. 635; Casey v. Gunn, 29 Mo. App. 14; Fox v. Clark, 44 App. Div. 626, 60 N. Y. S. 237; McGrath v. Horgan, 72 App. Div. 152, 76 N. Y. S. 412; Cranford Co. v. New York, 150 App. Div. 195, 134 N. Y. S. 839; Finger v. Korn, 123 N. Y. S. 239. See also Schillinger Bros. Co. v. Boschryan Grain Co. (Ia.) 116 N. W. 132; Condon v. St. Augustine Church, 112 App. Div. 168, 98 N. Y. S. 253. Thus in McGrath v. Horgan, supra, the court said: "When a contractor picks up his tools and orders his men to quit work on the ground of a breach of contract on the part of the owner in failing to make an intermediate instalment payment, he should be prepared to show full performance of all conditions precedent to his right to such payment. The plaintiff refused to proceed with the execution of his contract, and elected to stand upon his strict legal rights. He must, therefore, in order to recover, bring himself fairly within the terms of the contract by showing performance of the obligations he incurred 'without any omission so substantial in its character as to call for an allowance of damages.'" And in Golden Gate Lumber Co. v. Sahrbacher, 105 Cal. 114, 38 Pac. 635, it was said: "Nonpayment of an instalment of the contract price when due is such a breach of the contract as to justify a contractor in leaving the work and recovering upon a quantum meruit. Was the contractor entitled to receive the second instalment of money? In other words, was the second instalment due? And the answer to that interrogatory is solely dependent upon a determination of the fact as to whether or not the contractor had progressed with the building according to the plans and specifications. . . . If he had done so he had the legal right to stop work when the second instalment was not forthcoming; but, if he had not performed the contract according to its terms at the time he demanded the second instalment, then it was not due, and he was not justified in leaving the work; and if he left the work without cause it was an abandonment of the contract, as contemplated by section 1200 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the plaintiffs' rights in this action would be measured by the provisions of that section. Upon an examination of the evidence we conclude that the contractor failed to comply with the terms of his contract in substantial particulars, and, having committed breaches of the contract, he was not justified in leaving the work as he did leave it."

In Casey v. Gunn, 29 Mo. App. 14, the court said: "The fact that the plaintiff refused to pay the third instalment when claims for labor and material for a large amount remained unpaid, was evidence of the exercise by him of a right distinctively reserved by the terms of the contract, and no evidence of an abandonment. Nor was the fact that, upon the contractor's refusal to proceed with the work, the plaintiff had it completed under his own supervision, evidence of such abandonment, since it was the only alternative the plaintiff had."

Right to Recover Prospective Profits.

In some cases, it has been held that the default of the owner in making payments, not only justifies a building contractor in abandoning the work but entitles him to recover as damages his profits on the uncompleted portion of the work. Grand Rapids, etc. R. Co. v. Van Dusen, 29 Mich. 431; Scheible v. Klein, 89 Mich. 376, 50 N. W. 857; Jones v. New York, 47 App. Div. 39, 62 N. Y. S. 284; Schlesinger v. Ritchie, 115 N. Y. S. 116. See also Arnott v. Spokane, 6 Wash. 442, 33 Pac. 1063. Compare Christian County v. Overholt, 18 Ill. 223; Moore v. Taylor, 42 Hun 45, 5 N. Y. St. Rep. 202. Thus in Jones v. New York, supra, the court said: "There is undoubtedly a material distinction between the effect of a default in payment of an instalment when it becomes due under such a contract . . . arising from mere temporary inability, and a deliberate refusal, based upon the asserted invalidity of the contract and the denial of the contractor's right to proceed or to receive any payment thereunder. The former may be a breach which, while it would permit the contractor to abandon the work and recover for that already done, would not entitle him to prospective profits. . . . But the latter goes to the root of the contract, and is equivalent to an abandonment of it in its entirety. Under such circumstances the contractor is entitled to recover prospective profits. . . . It was said . . . that even 'mere delay in making the stipulated payments might be inexcusable or unreasonable or so indicative of an utter inability to perform the entire contract as to be equivalent to a refusal to perform, and a denial of the plaintiff's right to proceed under it.'" In Schlesinger v. Ritchie, 115 N. Y. S. 116, it was said: "The plaintiff brought this action for work, labor, services, and materials under a contract calling for the erection and construction of a balcony, four fitting rooms, a cashier's desk, and a stock, a packing, and a cutting table, in the Hudson Terminal

Building, at the agreed price of $1,050. He did not complete the work, even substantially. He claims to excuse his nonperformance by the defendants' refusal to pay according to the agreement, which, as he testifies, was that the defendants, copartners, undertook to pay about two hundred dollars in cash, and the balance in notes during the progress of the work; that he was to get the cash during the job, but on no specified day; that he received a three hundred dollar 90-day note, but that upon his demand for cash on a particular day the defendants said they 'wouldn't give him a damn cent until the job was finished.' The refusing answer, even to phraseology, was admitted by the defendants, who, contradicting the plaintiff's version of the agreement, said the job was to be paid for when done, and that they had given the note as a favor. Having credited the plaintiff's story, as the judgment shows, the learned trial justice could but find a breach by the defendants, which absolved the plaintiff from further performance and entitled him to abandon the work and to recover by way of damages such profits as would result to him from a complete performance, and thereupon award him the difference between the contract price and the estimated cost of the unperformed work." In McCullough v. Baker, 47 Mo. 401, it appeared that the plaintiff after having abandoned his building contract with the defendant because of the latter's alleged default instituted suit on a quantum meruit. The court said "The plaintiff waives that and sues upon the quantum meruit. If he is entitled to recover at all he is entitled to recover a reasonable compensation for the work actually done. That is the rule where the contractor is prevented from completing his job by the unwarranted acts and defaults of the other party. In such a case he is not restricted to a pro rata share of the contract price. He may either sue upon the contract and claim damages for a breach of it, or he may, as in this case, waive the contract and sue for reasonable value of his work." However, in Wharton v. Winch, 140 N. Y. 287, 35 N. E. 589, the court said: "The sole question presented for judicial decision is whether, upon the facts proven in this case, the plaintiff is entitled to recover prospective profits because of the failure of the defendant to pay the instalment of the contract price which fell due upon the delivery of the material at Lincoln on Nov. 9th. The execution of the contract, and what the parties did under it, and what they failed or refused to do, are all matters about which there is no conflict or dispute in the testimony given upon the trial, and at the close of the evidence both parties requested the direction of a verdict, and the motion of the defendant was granted, to which the plaintiff excepted. The plaintiff then requested the court to submit to the jury the question whether or not the evidence in this case did not evince an intention on the part of defendant not to comply with the terms of the contract, and a total failure on his part, which was declined and an exception taken. In view of the structure of this contract it would seem to be clear that the mere failure of the defendant to make punctual payment of an instalment due according to its provisions was not such a breach of the entire contract as to permit the plaintiff to refuse to proceed further under it, and recover damages for the profits which he would have earned had the contract been fully performed on his part." . . . It is undoubtedly true that the defendant's failure to pay the instalment was such a breach of the contract as absolved the plaintiff from all obligation to further perform on his part while the default continued. Nor was he bound to grant the defendant any indulgence and wait for any period of time in order to enable him to make good his broken promise. In that sense punctual payment was a condition precedent. The obligation of the plaintiff to proceed under the contract depended upon it. If it was not fulfilled, one of two courses was open to the plaintiff. He might at once rescind the contract and refuse to go on, and immediately recover for the materials furnished and services rendered under it; or he might proceed with the performance of the contract on his part, and at the same time, if he chose bring suit to recover the past due instalment. In the present case the trial court has found that the plaintiff elected to rescind the contract, and as he had already received more than sufficient to compensate him for the work done under it, that he can recover nothing in this action."

STATE

v.

BAXTER.

Ohio Supreme Court—February 3, 1914.

89 Ohio St. 269; 104 N. E. 331.

Embezzlement — Restoration as Defense.

The accused was state superintendent of banks. He took $37,000, of the funds that came into his custody by virtue of his office, to New York City, and used the money there to redeem his collateral securities which he had pledged for his private debt. Some weeks later, before he was called to account for the money and before he was indicted for its unlawful conversion to his own use, he negotiated the securities which he had thus obtained, for money with which he restored to the funds the $37,000, with which he paid his debt in New York. Held, this was embezzlement, in violation of section 12876, General Code.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The fact that he returned money of equal amount to the trust fund, before his secret appropriation of it became known, was no defense.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

It is the design and policy of that section and kindred statutes to prevent public officers and agents from using public funds in their possession or under their control, in any manner or for any purpose not expressly authorized by law.

[See note at end of this case.]

Exceptions from Court of Common Pleas, Franklin county.

Criminal action. Baxter acquitted of charge of embezzlement and prosecuting attorney alleges exceptions. The facts are stated in the opinion. EXCEPTIONS SUSTAINED.

Edward C. Turner and Timothy S. Hogan for state.

Kent W. Hughes for defendant.

[270] WILKIN, J.—May 20, 1912, the accused took $37,000 of funds, which came into his possession as superintendent of banks of Ohio, from state banks, where they were deposited by virtue of Section 742-6, General Code, and used them in the city of New York to pay his private indebtedness. He repaid the amount of the funds into the banks June 8, 1912. Later he was indicted under Section 12876, General Code, for embezzling and converting these trust funds to his own use on the date first named. At the trial, upon a statement of the facts to the jury by the prosecuting attorney, the accused moved the court to direct a verdict of acquittal. The court sustained the motion, and discharged the accused, for the reason that "he had accounted in time by the repayment of other money of equal value."

The pertinent clause of the statute reads thus:

"Whoever, being elected or appointed to an office of public trust or profit, embezzles or converts to his own use . . . anything of value that shall come into his possession by virtue of such office or employment, is guilty of embezzlement," etc.

He based his right to acquittal on the proposition that the conversion must be with the intention of depriving the owner of the money, and the crime is complete only after a failure to account and pay it over.

He argues: (1) That the temporary appropriation of the money to his own use, with the intention of restoring it, is not a conversion within the meaning of the statute; and (2) that he does not become an embezzler till he becomes a defaulter.

The logic of both propositions is somewhat confused. [271] The first is that a trustee who appropriates a trust fund, without the owner's knowledge, to pay his own debt, and afterwards repays the secret loan, does not embezzle the fund. This loses sight of one important test which is not conceded in the statement of the case, viz., that at the time he diverted the fund he intended to restore it. The fact that the accused deposited other money of equal amount in the proper place after the misappropriation is only circumstantial evidence bearing on the question of his intention when he purloined the fund. To say the least, such evidence of good motive, without anything else, is hardly convincing; it is not conclusive. The return of the money may have been impelled by the dread of exposure and the fear of punishment, rather than an original intention to restore it, which was in his mind at the time he withdrew it. Of course repentance and restitution do not expunge the guilt.

The second proposition also comes short of the mark. It leaves the decisive question unanswered, whether or not the secret purpose or use for which the custodian of public funds abstracts them, without authority, may determine his guilt or innocence. We think the true test is, Is there a wilful misappropriation of the trust fund, or a breach of faith by the employee to whose custody the fund is entrusted for the benefit or use of the employer or owner? In this case the trustee secretly used the money of the state, for his own benefit and profit, on the hazard of being able to replace it when or before the state would require it. He speculated on the risk of becoming a defaulter; [272] he therefore contemplated the chance that he might not be able to repay. Whether he did this for his own emolument or his mere convenience, he was speculating with public funds, which is certainly a public evil intended to be forbidden and repressed by the statute.

It will be noticed that the predicate words of the statute are "to embezzle or to convert to his own use." The meaning of these words is to be found in the body of the general law; they are legal terms which are to be understood according to their legal signification. A precise laconic definition of either of them, which will comprehend their full import and cover all cases, cannot be found, if indeed one can be made. Conversion has been defined as follows: "An appropriation of the thing to the party's own use and beneficial enjoyment, or exercising dominion over it, in exclusion or defiance of the owner's right." (2 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 642.) "Assuming upon one's self the property and right of disposing of another's goods." (Lord Holt, 6 Mod. 212.) "An act of dominion over personal property, inconsistent with the right of the owner." (Bigelow on Torts, 1875, 428.) "Any distinct act of dominion wrongfully exerted over one's property in denial of his right, or inconsistent with it." (2 Cooley on Torts, 3d ed. 859.) And see 1 Bouv. Dic. (1897) 433; 38 Cyc. 2005.

A definition of embezzlement is still more difficult to find or to frame. It is a form of the evolution of the law of larceny, and therefore a modification of that crime. The act may be said to consist of a fraudulent misappropriation of another's [273] goods by one to whom their custody has been entrusted. It is purely a statutory offense, and the distinctive features of the crime must be gleaned from the various statutes which define it for each jurisdiction.

The law of the particular phase of the subject which we have in hand, so far as it has been determined and formulated by juristic science is tersely stated by a writer whose treatise has become a classic and an authority. We quote from the late Joel Prentiss Bishop's New Criminal Law, Vol. 2:

"The gist of common-law larceny is the felonious 'taking' of what is another's, with the simultaneous intent in the taker of misappropriating it. But in the statutory embezzlement there is no felonious taking, for the thing comes to the servant by delivery either from the master or a third person. . . . So that the question now is, by what act, after it is received, does the servant commit the embezzlement? . . .

"Our inquiry concerns the act, not the evidence. The rule of law appears only indistinctly in the books. Still we may infer from the authorities, and from the reasons inherent in the question, that if the servant intentionally does with the property under his control what one must intend to do with property taken to commit larceny of it, he embezzles it, while nothing else is sufficient. Or, assuming the needful criminal intent to exist, he must and need only do what in our civil jurisprudence is termed conversion, defined to be any dealing with the thing which impliedly or by its terms excludes the owner's dominion. To illustrate,—[274] if the servant, instead of delivering the property to his master or another, as required by his duty, pledges it for his own debt, or runs away with it, or neglects or refuses to account for it, or otherwise wrongfully diverts its course toward its destination to make it his own, he embezzles it. Yet much of even this is, when accurately viewed, rather evidence than the offense itself. For, to constitute the offense it is not necessary there should be a demand for the money alleged to be embezzled, or a denial of its receipt, or any false account, . . . or refusal to account." Sections 372, 373.

He treats of the intent as an ingredient of the crime, under the title "Larceny." The following excerpts will serve our purpose: "In strictness of language there are in larceny two intents; namely, to commit the asportation by trespass, and to make the felonious misappropriation of the thing stolen. Yet commonly and practically we mean by this term the latter. It is in this sense that the word is in the present subtitle employed. . . . It means the purpose to deprive the owner of his ownership in the thing taken; and whether or not for some advantage to the trespasser, or as otherwise expressed for lucre, is one of the purposes of this sub-title to consider. . . . 'What is meant by felonious intention,' said Reade, J., 'is a question for the court; and after the court defines that, then it is for the jury to say whether the defendant had such intent.' But the law on this question of intent is difficult, and the authorities are in a measure conflicting. Yet relating to it there are some leading doctrines reasonably certain." Section 840.

[275] "Some have held that if one takes another's goods to pledge them, intending to redeem and return them afterwards, he does not commit larceny. Plainly a defendant to avail himself of this limitation of the intent must show it; for outwardly and prima facie these facts indicate theft. And Gurney, J., once said to a jury: 'I confess I think that if this doctrine of an intention to redeem property is to prevail, courts of justice will be of very little use. A more glorious doctrine for thieves it would be difficult to discover, but a more injurious doctrine for honest men cannot well be imagined.' Now, a man who pledges an article transmits an ownership which, though not perfect, will become so if he fails to perform to the pledgee the condition; this is very different from his merely holding it in his own temporary custody and using it. Probably, therefore, this taking is in principle larceny. So, at least, such a transaction would now generally appear to be regarded. And, both in principle and authority, the intent in larceny need not be to deprive the owner of the whole thing taken; it is enough that the purpose is to get from him the entire ownership of any part thereof. Thus, it is larceny to carry away any article of property to conceal it until the owner will offer a reward for its return, and for the purpose of obtaining the reward." Section 841.

"We find it not infrequently said in the books that the taking must be lucuri causa. . . . Blackstone mixes, thus: 'The taking and carrying away must be felonious; that is, done animo [276] furandi; or, as the civil law expresses it, lucuri causa. . . . But this is by no means the only criterion of criminality; for in cases that may amount to larceny the variety of circumstances is so great, and the complications thereof so mingled, that it is impossible to recount all those which may evidence a felonious intent, or animum furandi; wherefore they must be left to the due and attentive consideration of the court and jury.' (4 Bl. Com. 232.) Now, these words of the commentator . . . really convey about as exact an idea as can be stated." Section 842.

"Some hold that the thief must intend to convert the thing to his own use. But the true view, where the rule of lucuri causa is conceded, is simply that he should mean some advantage to himself, in distinction from mischief to another." Section 843. "We have intimations that if one taking an article tenders its value in money prima facie he is not guilty of larceny. Not necessarily will the offer of pay exempt him, but East says it is 'pregnant evidence' that the purpose was not felonious. (2 East P. C. 662, 3 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 157.) On various theories of a defense the court might in some circumstances be asked to submit such a fact to the jury." Section 845.

This lucid epitome of the law, so far as it has been developed by the decided cases, gives us a clew to the solution of the problem presented by the record in this case. Our author shows us, first, that the return of the property misappropriated by the trustee is only an ex post facto circumstance, which should go to the jury for what it may be worth as reflecting the motive of the trustee at the time of the appropriation; second, if the [277] criminal intent accompanied that act, the crime was complete, and demand and refusal to account and pay over were not necessary. Therefore, if the court of common pleas sustained the motion and directed a verdict of acquittal on the theory that the prosecutor failed in either or both of these particulars to state an offense, its ruling was wrong. It should at least have submitted the case to the jury with proper instructions as the evidentiary value and legal import of these two features.

The third proposition suggested by the author's summary is, that the temporary diversion of the fund to the trustee's use without the owner's consent is embezzlement. Therefore his repayment of the money would not purge his breach of trust of its felonious character, though he intended at the time of its misuse to deprive the owner of it only temporarily. Rarely does a defaulter intend to become a defaulter when he begins his speculations. How often has the sequel shown that the faithless custodian felt absolutely sure that he would be able to replace the fund before it would be called for? Who knows how many a defaulter relied with absolute certainty upon his ability to show that, when he shifted the funds from his custody or his trust account to a temporary use or his personal account, there was absolutely no danger of the funds being lost? Therefore how easily it may be shown that the ninety and nine who go astray had no intention of depriving the owner of his money. Nevertheless the theory advanced by the accused in this case, and adopted by the judge who acquitted him, is that mere [278] chance determines the criminality or innocence of the act; whether he is a felon or a guiltless man depends merely upon his ability to replace the money when he is called to account. By this theory his case is ruled by blind fate, not by blind justice. In other words, it is not the blameworthiness of the act or of the mind, but the result of the hazard, or the skill of the actor, in playing the game, which decides its legal quality. Such a doctrine offers temptation to a thousand-thousand custodians of trust funds, whose temptations are great enough at best; it encourages the reckless and unfortunate to commit crime, whereas the very purpose of the statute is to deter the tempted fiduciary from a breach of his trust and to protect society from the evils of a practice which has become wellnigh epidemic. If the law be given such a loose interpretation and be so feebly enforced, public faith and credit will be impaired and the stability of the financial institutions of the state will be in jeopardy.

In the case of the Board of Education v. Thompson, 33 Ohio St. 321, the board permitted the treasurer to use the fund in his business, pending litigation between the board and a special school district as to the custody of a fund in the township treasury, on his agreeing to pay interest. The object was to earn sufficient by such use to meet the interest which the board would be charged if the litigation should be decided against it. When the treasurer's term expired the loan was renewed and note with sureties was taken for the amount with interest. This court held that the transaction amounted to embezzlement under the statute [279] as it then existed (2 S. & C. 1610). The court said: "The purpose of this and other statutes, as was said of similar acts then in force, in State v. Buttles, 3 Ohio St. 321, is to operate on the agents, officers, and others having charge of public moneys, and deter by fines and penalties, the commission of such acts. The power is denied them to make such contracts."

In the Buttles case, Ranney, J., made the following comments: "It is unnecessary for us to examine them [the statutes] in detail. We have carefully read them all, and are entirely satisfied, that the policy of the state has always been, what we have no hesitation in saying it should have been, to prohibit its officers and agents from loaning or dealing in its funds either on public or private account."

"The first section subjects to the penalties prescribed by law for feloniously stealing property, any officer appointed or elected under the constitution or laws of the state, or any agent or servant of the state, who should convert to his own use, or use by way of investment in property or merchandise, or make away with or secrete, any money or valuable security received for safe keeping, disbursement, transfer, or other purpose, which might be in his possession, or over which he might have supervision, care, or control by virtue of his office or agency. . . . It seems to us, that the language and purpose of the section are both disregarded, when it is taken for anything less than an absolute prohibition to every officer, agent, or servant of the state, having public moneys in his hands, or under his control, to loan [280] them out, either on private or public account, without express authority of law. . . . We have no difficulty in saying that the whole object, spirit and design, is preserved when they [the statutes] are made operative between the state and its agents, in deterring the latter from the interdicted use of the public moneys. . . . Unwilling to trust the agents of the state, the legislature has seen fit to deny them the power to loan the public funds, and the better to secure obedience has prescribed penalties for the transgression of its instructions."

Again: It was said a county treasurer who should deposit the public moneys in a bank, with or without interest, though directed so to do by the county commissioners, would violate Section 6841, Revised Statutes (now Section 12873, General Code), and be guilty of embezzlement; and if the county commissioners should advise and direct such deposit to be made they would be equally guilty. Williams, J., State v. Ellet, 47 Ohio St. 90, 100, 23 N. E. 931, 21 Am. St. Rep. 772. See also Davis v. Gelhaus, 44 Ohio St. 69, 4 N. E. 593.

In a later case, speaking of Section 6846, Revised Statutes (now Section 12878, General Code), the court said the object of this statute is to punish as an offense the diversion, appropriation or application of the funds of a municipal corporation or a board of education to a use, other than that for which the funds were raised; and a conversion of the money to his own use by an officer or agent of such corporation is a violation of Section 6841, Revised Statutes (now Section 12873, General Code), and makes him guilty of embezzlement [281] of public moneys. State v. Johnson, 53 Ohio St. 307, 41 N. E. 256.

The court below said that what constitutes wrongful conversion depends entirely upon the duties required by the trust; if the obligation is such that the trustee is required to account within a definite time, and he uses the money but later secures other money and pays to his principal according to his duty, he is not guilty of a breach of duty nor of a crime, although he may have committed a moral wrong; we cannot apply to such a situation the rule of law prevailing in larceny, where there is a wrongful taking by trespass and the crime is complete, though the money is afterwards returned.

The exception here intended to be made is of those trusts whose terms, express or implied, permit the trustee to commingle the funds of the trust with his own. The idea is that in such cases there is no default and therefore no breach of the trust till the trustee fails to account and pay over. Cases have been cited in argument where trust and private funds were permissively or innocently commingled, and the trust fund, by inadvertence, consumed by overdrawing in ignorance of the fact that the private fund was exhausted. This case has no semblance to that class. And the italicized clause, supra, betrays a subconscious recognition of the fact that this case does not fall within the exception, else why does the trustee commit a moral wrong when he uses the trust money, secures other money and pays it to his principal? The reason is that he had no right to use the public's money and did so wrongfully, and the payment [282] of other money after the conversion does not relieve him of culpability.

The court's distinction between this case and larceny is useless also. Whether it be trespass by wrongful conversion or by wrongful taking, the unlawful use of the money is an invasion of the owner's right of property—an infraction of law, just the same, which the statute penalizes. But the learned lower court finds the conversion to be a moral wrong only; the taking, a crime complete. Both wrongdoers have appropriated the owner's money—which the law forbids—and both return it. Why is not the latter absolved as well as the former? The former having lawfully got the money into his custody for safe keeping, puts it out of his custody for his own use. The latter unlawfully takes possession of the money for his own use. There is, however, a difference; it is this: The former violates not merely the owner's right of property, but also the owner's trust and confidence; his crime is doubly heinous and damnable. But shall the repentance and return of the plunder by the embezzler acquit him while it does not acquit the thief?

Both of these distinctions are illegitimate. The first implies that the law ignores the moral obliquity of the act, if no money is lost. If the learned common pleas judge had in mind moral turpitude, the implication may be true, but it is irrelevant. If he had in mind conventional morality, the implication is false. True, the law is not for moral discipline; and we need not flounder in the metaphysics of the ethical basis of Law. This law condemns the act and punishes the offender, [283] because the act is hurtful to society, endangers the state, and therefore must be repressed. Whether the offender's motive be culpable or innocent, it does not excuse him, even though he did not intend to violate the law.

The second distinction is unsound, because it implies that one may use or invest what belongs to another, for a short time, if he gets the custody lawfully, though explicitly on trust that he will not use it or put it out of his custody, even though he convert it into something else of the same kind of equal value and surrender the equivalent upon demand. This proposition juggles with Truth, Time and Fate. It would sanction every species of gambling with public money by every officer in the commonwealth and by every custodian of trust funds in banks and all other institutions, secular and religious.

We do not assume the authority of enforcing the precepts of mere morality, Christian or Aristotelean, nor is it our function to declare the laws of social ethics. But it is our duty to interpret the laws of the state in harmony with those maxims of practical morality, private and public, which are recognized by the enlightened common sense and good conscience of the people of the state. Those maxims are the mainsprings of the civil laws, for upon them the moral order, peace and prosperity of society depend; and unless they be implied as imbedded in the laws, civil authority will lack the sanction and support of public opinion and government will become impossible.

To say that an officer of state, who is entrusted with the custody of public funds, may secretly use [284] them to redeem securities pledged by him for his debt in New York, and then excuse his delinquency by showing that his luck has turned and the securities have been turned into money and the deficit has been made up before he is prosecuted, shocks the moral sense of mankind. Yet that is what the court below decided he may do. We cannot thus interpret the law. The law was made no less to deter those who are tempted to speculate with their trust than to punish those who violate it. To effect the former purpose and stop the too prevalent contagion, as well as to maintain public credit and confidence in our laws and institutions, is a most humane and important object to be kept in view by the courts who are called upon to execute this law.

That the unlawful appropriation of the property, though not with the intention of depriving the owner of it entirely or finally, constitutes the crime, is foreshadowed by the case of Berry v. State, 31 Ohio St. 219, 27 Am. Rep. 506, thus: "The wrongful taking and carrying away of the property of another, without his consent, with intent to conceal it until the owner offers a reward for its return, and for the purpose of obtaining the reward, is larceny." And that demand and refusal to restore are not requisite to make the offense, nor is restitution or the offer thereof a defense, is the doctrine of Baltimore, etc. R. Co. v. O'Donnell, 49 Ohio St. 489, 32 N. E. 476, 34 Am. St. Rep. 579, 21 L.R.A. 117, thus: "In a petition, in an action for conversion, which avers that the defendant converted the plaintiff's property to his own use, it is not necessary to allege a demand and a refusal to deliver; such a demand and refusal may afford satisfactory [285] evidence of a conversion, but are not the only evidence. It is no defense to this action for the value of the goods, that they were tendered after conversion; and the motive by which a party was controlled in the conversion of property is of no avail as a defense, though it may be shown when exemplary damages are claimed.

True, the latter is a civil action, but the delict is, by the very language of the statute (Section 12876), the same in this case as in that; the only difference is that in the cited case the private law is invoked to redress an injury to an individual, whereas in the case at bar the public law is invoked to denounce and punish a wrong to society and the state.

The question then remains: Had the accused, by the terms or the nature of the trust, the privilege of using the trust fund? If he had not, clearly neither his intention to replace it nor his replacing it, nor both together, will save him from the stigma of the crime, though by the innocent error of the learned lower court he has escaped punishment, because the Bill of Rights saves him from the jeopardy of another trial.

Now, neither the statement of facts made to the jury by the prosecutor nor the statute (Sections 742-6 to -12, General Code) which defines the terms and purpose of the trust, shows that the accused had a right to use the money which came into his custody as superintendent of banks of the state. The suggestion is preposterous.

And the suggestion that the return of the money reflects back to the time of its conversion and raises an inference that the accused did not intend [236] an unlawful appropriation of it, is, under the circumstances of this case, no less preposterous. A man holding the responsible trust and high station of state superintendent of banks must be presumed to know the first simple, cardinal duty of his office as liquidator of financial institutions of the state. To permit the suggestion that Baxter did not know it was a breach of trust to purloin the funds in his custody and exchange them for securities in New York, on the hazard of being able to hypothecate the securities for money to replace the funds, would be to make a mockery of justice. The court below said it was a moral wrong. That is enough. If it was wrong it was a breach of trust, hence an unlawful conversion. Baxter knew, and the law will not permit him to say he did not know, that it was felony. He stands guilty on this record though he cannot be branded with his crime.

We hold that the fact that the accused returned the money, even if he intended to return it when he secretly appropriated it to his own use, did not bar the prosecution nor exonerate him from punishment. There are decided cases which support this judgment. We cite some of them: Robinson v. Com. 104 Va. 888, 52 S. E. 690; U. S. v. Gilbert, 4 O. F. D. 251, 17 Int. Rev. Rec. 54, 25 Fed. Cas. No. 15,205; Mangham v. State, 11 Ga. App. 427, 75 S. E. 512; State v. Summers, 141 N. C. 841, 53 S. E. 856; State v. Shuman, 101 Me. 158, 63 Atl. 665; Dean v. State, 147 Ind. 215, 46 N. E. 528; Fleener v. State, 58 Ark. 98, 23 S. W. 1; Com. v. Tenney, 97 Mass. 50; Com. v. Butterick, 100 Mass. 1, 97 Am. Dec. 65; State v. Leicham, 41 Wis. 565; People v. Butta, 128 Mich. 209, 87 N. W. 224; Com. v. Mason, 105 Mass. 163, 7 Am. Rep. 507.

[237] The learned judge below adverts to a nisi prius case, to which exceptions were denied by this court, also to some remarks (more or less obiter) made by members of this court in passing on cases under similar statutes, which seem to declare that there can be a conversion only where there has been a default by failure or refusal to pay over. He says this court "should be responsible for allowing that impression to go out which may deceive any lower court." However that may be, we do not find that this court has decided the law, for a case such as this, to be different from the decision we now make.

He further states that he followed "the rule of strict construction which applies to criminal statutes"—a humane rule justly designed to protect innocence, but too often resorted to as a subterfuge by criminal defenders to befog the judicial conscience. He reached this conclusion: "If there is not a remedy for what may be regarded as a moral wrong in such a case as this, it is for the legislature to create one and not for the court." The doubt thus engendered by that overworked rule was, by the court's taking what seemed the safer and humane side and following misleading expressions of some judges of this and other courts, resolved in favor of the accused and the jury was ordered to acquit him. This was error.

Exceptions sustained.

NOTE.

Restoration of Property or Settlement or Offer to Settle with Owner as Defense to Prosecution for Embezzlement or Larceny.

I. Scope of Note, 66.

II. Embezzlement:

- b. Taking with Intent to Pay, 70.
- c. Taking Mischievously, 71.
- d. Taking from Drunken Companion, 71.
- e. Pledging with Intent to Redeem and Restore, 71.
- f. Taking to Use for Owner's Benefit, 72.
- g. Taking to Return for Reward, 72.
- h. Taking to Obtain Compensation Fraudulently, 73.

2. Offer to Restore or Settle, 73.

3. Actual Restoration or Settlement:

- a. In General, 73.
- b. Statutory Mitigation of Punishment, 73.

I. Scope of Note.

It is the purpose of the present note to review the decisions involving the question of intent to restore or restoration of the property or an offer to settle with the owner as a defense to a prosecution for embezzlement or larceny. In treating that subject, the note excludes the effect of a return by the finder of lost property; the taking of property under a claim of right; the taking of property to protect the taker's claim against the owner; the taking of property by mistake; and the necessity of a demand by the owner to constitute embezzlement.

II. Embezzlement.

1. INTENT TO RESTORE OR SETTLE.

While to constitute the crime of embezzlement it is necessary that there shall be a criminal intent, yet when money or property is wrongfully and unlawfully appropriated so as to constitute the crime of embezzlement, the fact that there exists in the mind of the defendant an intent to restore the money or property or settle with the owner does not constitute a defense to the crime.

Thus in Com. v. Tenney, 97 Mass. 50, the court said: "Perhaps in a majority of cases the party who violates his trust in such a manner does not expect or intend that ultimate loss shall fall upon the person whose property he takes and misuses. But no hope or expectation of replacing the funds abstracted can be admitted as an excuse before the law. The forger who means to take up the forged paper, the thief who contemplates making eventual restitution, and the man who embezzles money or bonds with the design of restoring them, all fall under like condemnation in courts of justice and wherever the rules of sound morality are respected." And in Fowler v. Wallace, 131 Ind. 347, 31 N. E. 53, it was said: "The authorities are well agreed upon the proposition that the intention to restore, repay or replace money or property wrongfully and unlawfully appropriated does not take from the act its criminal character."

An officer of a corporation who embezzles the funds of the corporation is criminally liable though he may intend to return them. People v. Butts, 128 Mich. 208, 87 N. W. 224.

Where a defendant converts seeders to his own use, the fact that he believes he will be able to pay the owners for them when required to account for them, and intends to do so, does not remove from the act of conversion its fraudulent and criminal character. State v. Leicham, 41 Wis. 565.

2. OFFER TO RESTORE OR SETTLE.

It is no defense to a prosecution for embezzlement that the defendant has offered or agreed to return or settle for the embezzled property. People v. DeLay, 80 Cal. 52, 22 Pac. 90, 8 Am. Crim. Rep. 185; Meadowcroft v. People, 163 Ill. 56, 45 N. E. 991, 54 Am. St. Rep. 447, 35 L.R.A. 176; Dean v. State, 147 Ind. 215, 46 N. E. 528; State v. Eastman, 62 Kan. 353, 63 Pac. 597; State v. Alford, 135 La. 381, 65 So. 548, L.R.A. 1915A 430; State v. Pratt, 98 Mo. 482, 11 S. W. 977; State v. McCawley (Mo.) 180 S. W. 869; People v. Britton, 134 App. Div. 275, 118 N. Y. S. 989; State v. Dunn, 138 N. C. 672, 50 S. E. 772. See also U. S. v. Forsythe, 6 McLean 584, 25 Fed. Cas. No. 15,133. Thus in People v. Britton, 134 App. Div. 275, 118 N. Y. S. 989, the court said: "Some time after the indictments were found, a composition agreement of some sort, the nature of which is not disclosed by the record, was entered into between the defendants and the said corporation. That agreement was offered in evidence, and it is now claimed that the court erred in excluding it; that it was admissible as bearing upon the question of intent. But an offer to make restitution after a theft has been discovered can have no legitimate bearing on that question. It doubtless is true that the defendants expected to make good their misappropriations before they were discovered. The case is a typical one of this kind of crime, but it was no less stealing because the defendants hoped to make good their theft, and their offer to compose the difficulty had no bearing upon their criminal intent when the money was taken." And in Meadowcroft v. People, 163 Ill. 56, 45 N. E. 991, 54 Am. St. Rep. 447, 35 L.R.A. 176, wherein it appeared that a bank official, charged with embezzlement, had offered to restore the amount lost by a depositor, the court said: "It needs no citation of authorities to show that, as a matter of law, the restitution of money that has been either stolen or embezzled, or a tender or offer to return the same or its equivalent to the party from whom it was stolen or embezzled, does not bar a prosecution by indictment and conviction for such larceny or embezzlement. The effect of the tender and payment into court may be a discharge from the indebtedness for the deposit fraudulently received, so far as the depositor and his civil remedies are concerned; but the crime having been fully consummated before indictment found, it is not within the power of the banker and the depositor, or either of them, to compromise or take away the right of the state to insist upon a conviction for the crime committed. It is not to be presumed that in creating the offense and providing for its punishment it was the intention of the legislature to make the criminal courts of the state collecting agencies for collecting the debts due to depositors from insolvent banks and bankers."

The fact that a written agreement of indemnity is taken, in no wise affects the original embezzlement. People v. DeLay, 80 Cal. 52, 22 Pac. 90, 8 Am. Crim. Rep. 185.

3. ACTUAL RESTORATION OR SETTLEMENT.

The fact that things or money which have been embezzled are afterwards restored to their owner, or that a settlement is made, or that security is taken to protect the owner, does not purge the act of embezzlement of its criminal character.

"If the crime was complete; if the prisoner had knowingly misused or misappropriated the funds of the state, his subsequent restitution of the fruits of his crime could not relate back so as to efface the wrong." Robinson v. Com. 104 Va. 888, 52 S. E. 690. And in Wall v. State, 2 Ala. App. 157, 56 So. 57, the court said: "There was no error in that part of the court's oral charge, under the evidence in this case, that the subsequent payment of the money did 'not wipe out the offense of embezzlement.'"

Thus the fact that the sureties of a public officer have reimbursed the state for his defalcation, is no defense. Robson v. State, 83 Ga. 166, 9 S. E. 610. Neither does the subsequent acquiescence of the prosecutor destroy the criminal element. Waters v. State, 15 Ga. App. 342, 83 S. E. 200. Likewise the fact that the party injured has received interest on the amount embezzled is no bar. Young v. People, 193 Ill. 236, 61 N. E. 1104.

III. Larceny.

1. INTENT TO RESTORE OR SETTLE.

a. In General.

Since to constitute the crime of larceny the intent which accompanies the act of taking must be to deprive the owner of his property permanently, and an intent to steal must exist at the time of the taking, the general rule is that a taking for a temporary purpose, with the intent to return the property to the owner, does not constitute the crime of larceny.

Utah.—People v. Flynn, 7 Utah 378, 26 Pac. 1114.

Wisconsin.—Stoddard v. State, 132 Wis. 520, 13 Ann. Cas. 1211, 112 N. W. 453.

Thus in Reg. v. Trebilcock, Dears. & B. (Eng.) 453, 4 Jur. N. S. 123, 7 Cox C. C. 408, 27 L. J. M. C. 103, 6 W. R. 281, Lord Campbell, C. J., said: "To constitute larceny there must be an intention to appropriate a chattel, and usurp an entire dominion over it. If it is taken with the intention of making a temporary use of it only, and then to let the owner have it again, that is not larceny, but merely a trespass." And in Schultz v. State, 30 Tex. App. 94, 16 S. W.

756, it was said: "Where the evidence requires it, the court should instruct the jury that if the defendant took the property with the intent at the time of appropriating it temporarily, but not permanently, they should acquit him." In Mitchell v. Territory, 7 Okla. 527, 54 Pac. 782, the court said: "The intent must be felonious, and must be to deprive the owner, not temporarily, but permanently, of the property. . . . A taking of personal property with the intent to deprive the owner temporarily of his property, and return the same to him, is not larceny, but is trespass."

A man is not guilty of horse stealing who publicly, in broad daylight, from the streets of a populous town, takes his neighbor's horse, leaving notice that he has done so, and rides him a few miles, with the intention, fairly manifested, of returning the horse to its owner. McDaniel v. State, 33 Tex. 419. And where a person is charged with the larceny of a skiff, it is competent for him to show that he took the skiff for the purpose of escaping arrest on another charge, and that he took along a friend to return the skiff to its owner, and it was so returned. State v. Dillon, 48 La. Ann. 1365, 20 So. 913. Likewise, it is not larceny to take an automobile for a "joy-ride," Valley Mercantile Co. v. St. Paul F. etc. Ins. Co. 49 Mont. 430, Ann. Cas. 1916A 1126, 435, 143 Pac. 559, L.R.A.1915B 327; or to appropriate the team of another for a pleasure ride, People v. Kenney, 135 App. Div. 380, 119 N. Y. S. 854. And where an automobile is taken for a temporary purpose, with no intent to deprive the owner permanently of his ownership, the fact that the trespasser carries persons for hire while the automobile is in his possession does not change the trespass to larceny. Smith v. State (Tex.) 146 S. W. 547.

Where a defendant takes a watch from another with the intention of holding it until the owner pays for a quart of whisky he has broken, it does not constitute stealing from the person. Brooks v. State (Tex.) 151 S. W. 549.

A defendant is not guilty of larceny where he hires a horse and after trading it to a third person takes it again from the latter with the intent of restoring it to the owner. Gooch v. State, 60 Ark. 5, 28 S. W. 510.

A custom of contractors to help themselves to each other's material is admissible in evidence to show a lack of criminal intent on a charge of larceny. Charles Kuhl Artificial Stone Co. v. Mack, 12 Ohio Cir. Dec. 177, 17 Ohio Cir. Ct. 663. And where the evidence showed that a person on two different occasions in open daylight, and in the presence of a number of persons, went into a building and took each time a small piece of lumber from a pile for which he had special use, and each time replaced it with lumber of his own, the value of the lumber being less than nineteen cents, it was held that his acts did not constitute the statutory crime of taking chattels from a building. Fletcher v. Com. 118 Ky. 351, 80 S. W. 1089.

However, the taking of a railway ticket with the intent to use it for the taker's own purpose, is none the less larceny though it is to be ultimately returned to the company at the end of the journey. Reg. v. Beecham, 5 Cox C. C. (Eng.) 181. See also Reg. v. Boulton, 1 Den. C. C. (Eng.) 508. And see the note to Patrick v. State, 14 Ann. Cas. 177. A fraudulent taking of personal property of another without his consent, and with no intent, at the time of the taking, to return it, is evidence of an intent to deprive the owner of his property. State v. Davis, 38 N. J. L. 176, 20 Am. Rep. 367, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 398. In that case it appeared that some boys took a team and after driving a distance abandoned it. The court said: "It is not a mere temporary taking which may consist with an intent to return, but a taking what may result by a natural and immediate consequence in the entire loss and deprivation of the property to the owner. An abandonment to mere chance is such reckless exposure to loss that the guilty party should be held criminally responsible for an intent to lose. If a person take another's watch from his table, with no intent to return it, but for the purpose of timing his walk to the station to catch a train, and when he reaches there leaves it on the seat, for the owner to get it back or lose it, as may happen; if a man take another's axe with no intent to return it, but to take it to the woods to cut trees, and after he has finished his work cast it in the bushes, at the owner's risk of losing it, such reckless conduct would be accounted criminal. It is true that the probability of finding the horse and wagon may be greater than that of recovering the watch or axe, because they are larger and more difficult to conceal, but the intent is not to be measured by such nice probabilities; rather by the broader probability that the owner may lose his property, because the taker has no purpose of ever returning it to him."

b. Taking with Intent to Pay.

Where a person took several bundles of oats, and the evidence showed that he intended to pay for them, it was held that there was no larceny. Pylee v. State, 62 Tex. Crim. 49, 136 S. W. 464. And where a customer of a merchant took a gallon of beer with intent to pay for it the next day and in fact did offer to pay therefor, it was held that he was not guilty of larceny. Mason v. State, 32 Ark. 238.

c. Taking Mischievously.

The taking of property mischievously, with the intent to return it to the owner, is not larceny. State v. Shepherd, 63 Kan. 545, 66 Pac. 236; Devine v. People, 20 Hun (N. Y.) 98; Black v. State, 46 Tex. Crim. 107, 79 S. W. 311; Colwell v. State (Tex.) 34 S. W. 615. See also U. S. v. Wilson, 44 Fed. 593. Thus the taking of a chicken in sport to make it squawk and then to let it go is not larceny. Colwell v. State (Tex.) 34 S. W. 615. And where a person, while drinking in a saloon, took money from the cash drawer as a joke while the bartender was not looking, making no attempt to secrete it, and it was at once returned, it was held that there was no larceny. Devine v. People, 20 Hun (N. Y.) 98. See also Black v. State, 46 Tex. Crim. 107, 79 S. W. 311.

d. Taking from Drunken Companion.

The taking of property from a drunken companion with the intent of keeping it until he is sober, and then returning it to him, is not larceny. Keely v. State, 14 Ind. 36; Wilson v. People, 39 N. Y. 459; State v. Gilmer, 97 N. C. 429, 1 S. E. 491; McMahan v. State, 50 Tex. Crim. 244, 96 S. W. 17; Brownfield v. State (Tex.) 25 S. W. 1120. See also Tanner v. State (Tex.) 44 S. W. 489.

e. Pledging with Intent to Redeem and Restore.

It has been held that the taking and pledging of the property of another with the intention of redeeming it and restoring it to the owner does not constitute larceny. Reg. v. Phetheon, 9 C. & P. 552, 38 E. C. L. 223; R. v. Wright, O. B. 1828, M. S. 38 E. C. L. 224, note. See also Reg. v. Wynn, 16 Cox C. C. (Eng.) 231, 52 J. P. 55, 56 L. T. N. S. 749. But the Kentucky court has qualified the rule by requiring the defendant to have a fair and reasonable expectation of being able to redeem and restore to the owner. Blackburn v. Com. 89 S. W. 160, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 96. And in Reg. v. Medland, 5 Cox C. C. (Eng.) 292, the rule was laid down that a person is guilty of larceny under such circumstances unless there is proof of both an intent to redeem and power to do so. The court said: "There is nothing in the evidence that will justify the jury in acquitting the prisoner, on the ground that she took this property with the intention of redeeming it. It would be very dangerous to hold that the suggestion of such an intent would be sufficient to constitute a valid defense. A person may pawn property without the slightest prospect of ever being able to redeem it, and yet there may be some vague intention of doing so, if afterwards the opportunity should occur, however improbable it may be that it will do so. But it can never be said that there is an intention to redeem under circumstances that render it very improbable, or at least uncertain that such ability will ever exist. A man may take my property, may exercise absolute dominion over it, may trade upon it and make a profit upon it for three months, and yet may say, when charged with stealing it, that he meant to return it to me at some time or another. I shall direct the jury, that for such a defense to be at all available there must be not only the intent to redeem, evidenced by similar previous conduct, but there must be proof also of the power to do so, of which the evidence here seems rather of a negative character." Where the borrower of a ring pawned it, and claimed that his intention was at first to redeem it, but believing he had been buncoed he changed his mind, it was held that if the defendant borrowed the money on the ring with the intent and purpose to redeem the ring, this would seem to exclude the idea of a fraudulent intent to deprive the owner permanently of the property, if not of a fraudulent intent altogether. Taylor v. State, 50 Tex. Crim. 377, 97 S. W. 473. But where there is a taking and pledging and no excuse is given for the act, the taker is guilty of larceny. Fields v. State, 6 Cold. (Tenn.) 524. And where an intention to redeem cannot be adduced from the facts and circumstances then the taker is guilty of larceny, even though he swears he intended to redeem. Truslow v. State, 95 Tenn. 189, 31 S. W. 987. In that case wherein it appeared that a bank cashier wrongfully took and pledged securities deposited in a bank, the following instruction was approved: "The state must also establish that the defendant intended, when he took these bonds, if he did take them, to deprive the true owner of them permanently. If he took them intending at the time to return them, he would not be guilty, and you should acquit him, etc. It is for you to determine, from the whole testimony in this case, what his intention was when he took them. To determine this, you will look to and consider all his conduct as shown by the testimony, when he took them, what he did with them, the amount of the debt to secure which they were deposited, what reasonable expectation he had of being able to pay that debt and get the bonds back, and what finally became of them. In making up your conclusions as to the motive and intent with which defendant took said bonds, you may also consider the length of time he had them at the First National Bank of Nashville, whether or not he concealed that fact from Mrs. Johnson, and whether or not he concealed from her the fact that he had taken them from the drawer, and the manner in which he had taken them; what effort he made, if any, to pay the debt; what power he gave the bank to dispose of the bonds; what representations he made to the bank about them; whether or not he claimed them as his own when writing to the bank, etc. You cannot delve into the mind of the man to find out and know what his intentions were, but you can judge of and determine what a man intends by his conduct, or by what he does. The law presumes a man intends what he does, and the usual and natural consequences of his acts. Did he dispose of the bonds? Were they lost to Mrs. Mary Johnson? Did she ever get them back? If you find he intended to deprive Mrs. Johnson of them as hereinbefore explained, etc., and they were of some value, then you should convict the defendant."

If property is pawned with the consent of the owner, and then redeemed and carried away, it is larceny if an intent to deprive the owner of his property exists at the time of the redemption. Reg. v. Sparrow, 2 Cox C. C. (Eng.) 287.

f. Taking to Use for Owner's Benefit.

It has been held that an intent to use the stolen property for the benefit of the owner is no defense to a prosecution for larceny. Rex v. Morfit, R. & R. C. C. (Eng.) 307; Reg. v. Handley, C. & M. 547, 41 E. C. L. 298; Reg. v. Privett, 2 Cox C. C. 40, 2 C. & K. 114, 61 E. C. L. 114, 1 Den. C. C. 193. Thus where a servant made a false key to his master's granary and took beans therefrom for the purpose of feeding them to his master's horses, it was held that the purpose for which the prisoner intended to apply the beans did not vary the case. It was, however, said by some of the judges that the additional quantity of beans would diminish the work of the men who had to look after the horses, so that the master not only lost his beans, or had them applied to the injury of the horses, but the servant's labor was lessened, so that a "lucri causa" to give himself ease was an ingredient in the case. Rex v. Morfit, supra. And to the same effect are Reg. v. Handley, supra, and Reg. v. Privett, supra, wherein it appeared that grain was taken with the intention of feeding it to the master's horses.

g. Taking to Return for Reward.

Where property is taken with the intention of holding it until a reward is offered, and then returning it for the reward, the taking constitutes larceny. Reg. v. Spurgeon, 2 Cox C. C. (Eng.) 102; Reg. v. O'Donnell, 7 Cox C. C. (Eng.) 337; Slaughter v. State, 113 Ga. 284, 38 S. E. 854, 84 Am. St. Rep. 242; Com. v. Mason, 105 Mass. 163, 7 Am. Rep. 507; Berry v. State, 31 Ohio St. 219, 27 Am. Rep. 506; Dunn v. State, 34 Tex. Crim. 257, 30 S. W. 227, 53 Am. St. Rep. 714; Martin v. State, 44 Tex. Crim. 540, 72 S. W. 386. See also Reg. v. Peters, 1 C. & K. 245, 47 E. C. L. 245; Reg. v. Yorke, 2 C. & K. 841, 61 E. C. L. 841, 3 Cox C. C. 181, 1 Den. C. C. 335, 12 Jur. 1078, 18 L. J. M. C. 38, T. & M. 20; Currier v. State, 157 Ind. 114, 60 N. E. 1023; Davis v. State, 45 Tex. Crim. 132, 74 S. W. 544.

In Slaughter v. State, 113 Ga. 284, 38 S. E. 854, 84 Am. St. Rep. 242, the court said: "It is not necessary, to constitute larceny, that the property should be itself permanently appropriated. It is sufficient if the property be taken and carried away with the intent to appropriate any pecuniary right or interest therein, as where it is taken with the expectation of claiming a reward for its return." And see Dunn v. State, 34 Tex. Crim. 257, 30 S. W. 227, 53 Am. St. Rep. 714, wherein the court said: "It appears that the purpose here was not for a temporary use, but to hold the property itself until he should be paid for its restoration to the owner, and to that extent he must have intended to have deprived the owner of its value, and to appropriate it, pro tanto, to his own use and benefit; that is, he proposed to appropriate to his own use some interest or value in the horse itself."

Thus where an attorney's clerk left his bag in an outer room, and the defendant took it with the intention of exacting a reward for its return, it was held that the offense was larceny. Reg. v. Spurgeon, 2 Cox C. C. (Eng.) 102. And the taking of horses with the intent of concealing them until the owner offered a reward for their return and then returning them has been held to constitute larceny. Berry v. State, 31 Ohio St. 219, 27 Am. Rep. 506. Likewise it is larceny to take a trespassing horse and conceal it until the owner shall offer a reward or sell it cheaply as an estray. Com. v. Mason, 105 Mass. 163, 7 Am. Rep. 507.

But in a case where the theory of the defense was that the defendant had taken up a strayed horse and returned it to its owner for the purpose of receiving the reward offered by the owner, it was held that he was entitled to an instruction that "if the defendant took the horse with the intent to return him to . . . the owner, in order that he might receive the reward offered for the horse, then, in that event, he was guilty of no crime." Micheaux v. State, 30 Tex. App. 660, 18 S. W. 550.

Where a plumber wrongfully obtains possession of certain iron pipes, and refuses to return them to the owner without the payment of a fictitious and fraudulent claim, the taking is felonious and constitutes larceny. Currier v. State, 157 Ind. 114, 60 N. E. 1023.

The taking of a check from the finder and withholding it from the owner with the expectation of obtaining a reward is not larceny. Reg. v. Gardner, 9 Cox C. C. (Eng.) 253, 8 Jur. N. S. 1217, 11 W. R. 96, 32 L. J. M. C. 351, 7 L. T. N. S. 471, L. & C. 243; State v. Arkle, 116 N. C. 1017, 21 S. E. 408.

h. Taking to Obtain Compensation Fraudulently.

The taking of property is larceny where it is taken with the intention of returning it to the owner in order to obtain compensation or credit fraudulently. Reg. v. Hall, 13 Jur. 87, 18 L. J. M. C. 62, 2 C. & K. 947 note, 61 E. C. L. 947 note, T. & M. 47, 3 N. Sess. Cas. 407, 3 Cox C. C. 245, 1 Den. C. C. 381; Reg. v. Manning, 17 Jur. (Eng.) 28, 1 W. R. 40, 6 Cox C. C. 86, Dears. 21, 22 L. J. M. C. 21 (following Reg. v. Hall, supra); Fort v. State, 82 Ala. 50, 2 So. 477. Compare Reg. v. Poole, 7 Cox C. C. (Eng.) 373, 3 Jur. N. S. 1268, 6 W. R. 65, Dears. & B. 345, 27 L. J. M. C. 53; Rex v. Webb, 1 Moody (Eng.) 431; Reg. v. Holloway, 13 Jur. 86, 1 Den. C. C. 370, 3 N. Sess. Cas. 410, T. & M. 40, 2 C. & K. 942, 61 E. C. L. 942, 18 L. J. M. C. 60, 3 Cox C. C. 241. Thus a servant who takes fat from his master and then resells it to him as the property of another is guilty of larceny. Reg. v. Hall, supra. Likewise where a cotton picker took seed cotton from his master's warehouse and placed it with the cotton which he had picked but which had not been weighed with the intent to obtain compensation for picking cotton which he had not picked, he was held to be guilty of larceny. Fort v. State, 82 Ala. 50, 2 So. 477.

2. OFFER TO RESTORE OR SETTLE.

Where property has been stolen the fact that the defendant offers to restore it or make compensation does not bar a prosecution for larceny. See Meadowcroft v. People, 163 Ill. 56, 45 N. E. 991, 54 Am. St. Rep. 447, 35 L.R.A. 176; People v. Gottschalk, 66 Hun 64, 20 N. Y. S. 777, affirmed in 137 N. Y. 569, 33 N. E. 339.

3. ACTUAL RESTORATION OR SETTLEMENT.

a. In General.

Where larceny has been committed, the fact that the defendant returns the stolen property or pays the owner for it does not bar a prosecution for the offense. Jenkins v.

State, 58 Fla. 62, 50 So. 582; Currie v. State, 3 Ga. App. 309, 59 S. E. 926; Georgia v. Kepford, 45 Ia. 48; Cohoe v. State, 79 Neb. 811, 113 N. W. 532, rehearing denied in 79 Neb. 819, 114 N. W. 286; State v. Scott, 64 N. C. 586; Cheadle v. Buell, 6 Ohio 67. See also Reg. v. Poynton, 9 Cox C. C. (Eng.) 249, 8 Jur. N. S. 1218, 11 W. R. 73, L. & C. 247, 32 L. J. M. C. 29; Schafer v. State (Ala.) 8 So. 670; Meadowcroft v. People, 163 Ill. 56, 45 N. E. 991, 54 Am. St. Rep. 447, 35 L.R.A. 176; State v. Bolander, 71 Ia. 706, 29 N. W. 602; Eckels v. State, 20 Ohio St. 509; Truslow v. State, 95 Tenn. 189, 31 S. W. 987; Shultz v. State, 5 Tex. App. 390; Trafton v. State, 5 Tex. App. 480.

"Paying for stolen property will not purge the original taking of its felony or constitute any defense to a prosecution therefor, and hence evidence of that fact is properly excluded." Jenkins v. State, 58 Fla. 62, 50 So. 582.

Where a person took money from a letter with intent to steal it, it was held that the offense was complete, although the same money might have been afterwards replaced. Cheadle v. Buell, 6 Ohio 67.

b. Statutory Mitigation of Punishment.

Under a Michigan statute (2 Comp. L. § 5765) allowing a satisfaction to mitigate the offense of receiving stolen goods if the stealing consists of simple larceny, the statute cannot be invoked where the stealing constitutes an aggravated offense, such as burglary. Pitcher v. People, 16 Mich. 142.

By an Oklahoma statute, (Comp. Laws 1909, § 2618), it is provided that "the fact that the accused intended to restore the property embezzled is no ground of defense, or of mitigation of punishment, if it has not been restored before an information has been laid before a magistrate, charging the commission of the offense." State v. Duerksen, 8 Okla. Crim. 601, 129 Pac. 881, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1013.

Under a Texas statute (Art. 738, Penal Code) it is provided that "if property, taken under such circumstances as to constitute theft, be voluntarily returned within a reasonable time, and before any prosecution is commenced therefor, the punishment shall be by fine," etc. (For a former statute in similar terms, see Pasch. Dig. § 2397.) The construction of this statute has given rise to numerous decisions and as was said by the court in Elkins v. State, 35 Tex. Crim. 206, 32 S. W. 1046, the decisions are in confusion on the subject. However, the following rules may be adduced from the authorities. The return must be voluntary, that is, willingly made—not made under the influence of compulsion, threats or fear of punishment.

Owen v. State, 44 Tex. 248; Bird v. State, 16 Tex. App. 528. Compare Bennett v. State, 17 Tex. App. 143. But if the return is made under the influence of repentance for the crime, and with a desire to make reparation to the injured owner, it will be deemed to be voluntary, although it may also be influenced by fear of punishment. Allen v. State, 12 Tex. App. 190; Bird v. State, 16 Tex. App. 528. Compare Stephenson v. State, 4 Tex. App. 591. Where a reward is offered for the return of the property and it is returned without demanding the reward, the return is voluntary. Stepp v. State, 31 Tex. Crim. 349, 20 S. W. 753. A return after detection is not voluntary. Harris v. State, 29 Tex. App. 101, 14 S. W. 390, 25 Am. St. Rep. 717; Boze v. State, 31 Tex. Crim. 347, 20 S. W. 752; Hyatt v. State, 32 Tex. Crim. 580, 25 S. W. 291; Elkins v. State, 35 Tex. Crim. 206, 32 S. W. 1046; Petty v. State, 59 Tex. Crim. 586, 129 S. W. 615. Compare Bennett v. State, 17 Tex. App. 143. The return must be made within a reasonable time. Ingle v. State, 1 Tex. App. 307; Bird v. State, 16 Tex. App. 528; Stepp v. State, 31 Tex. Crim. 349, 20 S. W. 753. The evening of the day of the theft is a reasonable time. Ingle v. State, 1 Tex. App. 307. And whether four months is a reasonable time under the circumstances is a question for the jury. Stepp v. State, 31 Tex. Crim. 349, 20 S. W. 753. The return must be made before a prosecution for the theft has been commenced. Bird v. State, 16 Tex. App. 528; Moxie v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. 529, 114 S. W. 375; Stubbs v. State, 71 Tex. Crim. 390, 160 S. W. 87. The return must be an actual and not merely a constructive return of the property into the possession of the owner. Brill v. State, 1 Tex. App. 572; Moore v. State, 8 Tex. App. 496; Bird v. State, 16 Tex. App. 528; Thorne v. State, 52 Tex. Crim. 309, 107 S. W. 831. Thus where stolen stock is turned loose and returns to its owner of its own volition, the return is not sufficient. Moore v. State, 8 Tex. App. 496; Thorne v. State, 52 Tex. Crim. 309, 107 S. W. 831. The property returned must be the identical property, unchanged, and all of it. Horseman v. State, 43 Tex. 353; Grant v. State, 2 Tex. App. 163; Trafton v. State, 5 Tex. App. 480; Bird v. State, 16 Tex. App. 528; Blount v. State, 34 Tex. Crim. 640, 31 S. W. 652; Powell v. State (Tex.) 24 S. W. 515; Johnson v. State, (Tex.) 55 S. W. 576. Thus where hogs are stolen and pork is returned, the milder punishment will not be imposed. Horseman v. State, 43 Tex. 353; Grant v. State, 2 Tex. App. 163. The same is true where the property is sold and the proceeds are turned over to the owner, Blount v. State, 34 Tex. Crim. 640, 31 S. W. 652; Johnson v. State (Tex.) 55 S. W. 576; or where the thief pays for the stolen property, Trafton v. State, 5 Tex. App. 480. And where fifty dollars was stolen and the defendant returned $28.75, some of which was of money of a different denomination and kind from that stolen, it was held that the return was insufficient. Powell v. State (Tex.) 24 S. W. 515. Where the issue of voluntary return is presented by the evidence the court must instruct on the law applicable to such a return. Guest v. State, 24 Tex. App. 530, 7 S. W. 242; Anderson v. State, 25 Tex. App. 593, 9 S. W. 43; Bennett v. State, 28 Tex. App. 342, 13 S. W. 142. But where there is no evidence of such a return no instruction on the subject is necessary. Wheeler v. State, 15 Tex. App. 607; Lane v. State, 41 Tex. Crim. 558, 55 S. W. 831. And it is error so to instruct where the jury may be misled thereby. Schultz v. State, 30 Tex. App. 94, 16 S. W. 756.

OSBORNE

v.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY.

87 VT. 104; 88 Atl. 512.

Limitation of Actions — Effect of Bar — Statutory Right of Action.

Where a right of action is given by statute, which further provides that suit shall be commenced within a specified time, or the right of action shall be extinguished, the right to recover depends on the action being commenced within the time limited, and, if it is not, not only the remedy but the right is extinguished.

What Law Governs.

Civ. Code Quebec, § 1053, provides that every person capable of discerning right from wrong is responsible for the damage caused by his fault to another, whether by positive act, imprudence, neglect, or want of skill, and article 17, § 11, declares that the word "person" includes bodies politic and corporate. The laws of Quebec also provide that an action for injuries under such statute shall be brought within one year. Held, that the limitation applied to the right as well as to the remedy, and hence, where plaintiff sued in Vermont under the statute for an injury occurring in Quebec, the action was governed by the lex loci, and, if not brought within the time specified, was unsustainable.

[See 2 Ann. Cas. 151.]

Same.

The prosecution of transitory actions in a state or country other than that in which the cause of action arose is based on the principle of enforcing a foreign right by comity, so that, if under the lex loci no right of action exists, none can be enforced in the jurisdiction of suit.

Limitations Applicable — Statutory Cause of Action.

It is not essential that a limitation affecting a statutory right of action not existing at common law should be incorporated in the act creating the right; but it is sufficient if the limitation in another statute is so directed to the new liability so specifically as to warrant the conclusion that it qualifies the right.

Pleading Statute — Waiver of Defect in Plea.

Where, in an action for injuries under a provision of the Canadian Code, defendant pleads generally that the action is barred by the laws of the province of Quebec requiring that the action be brought within a year, on which plaintiff joins issue, he cannot thereafter object that the plea was insufficient because it did not set out verbatim the statute relied on, though, if a demurrer had been filed to the plea, it would probably have been sustained.

Damages — What Law Governs.

Where plaintiff sues in Vermont for injuries sustained while working on defendant's railroad in Quebec, plaintiff's damages, if any, are to be assessed in accordance with the law of that province, and hence it is proper to refuse to charge that pain and suffering is not an element of damage, and submit the Canadian law on that branch of the case to the jury.

[See generally, 19 Ann. Cas. 1059; Ann. Cas. 1913D 537; 91 Am. St. Rep. 726.]

Evidence — Admissibility of Hospital Chart.

Entries of plaintiff's symptoms, etc., on a hospital chart by various nurses are not admissible in the absence of evidence that the nurses are unobtainable.

[See note at end of this case.]

Exceptions from Essex County Court: FISH, Judge.

Action for damages. John P. Osborne, plaintiff, and Grand Trunk Railway Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant alleges exceptions. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Drew, Shurtleff & Morris and Harry B. Amey for defendant.

O. R. Powell, Robert W. Simonds and J. Rolf Searies for plaintiff.

[106] WATSON, J.—This action is brought upon section 1053 and article 17, section 11, of the Civil Code of the Province of Quebec, to recover for injuries received by the plaintiff when in the employ of the defendant, as conductor on one of the defendant's freight trains, in said Province, by reason of the negligence of the defendant. Section 1053 reads: "Every person capable of discerning right from wrong is responsible for the damage caused by his fault to another whether by positive act, imprudence, neglect or want of skill." By article 17, section 11, "the word 'person' includes bodies politic and corporate." The defendant pleaded the general issue, and specially, that the happenings and events as alleged by the several counts in the plaintiff's declaration took place more than a year prior to the bringing of the plaintiff's writ, and that by the laws of the Province of Quebec in the Dominion of Canada, wherein said supposed cause of action arose, the plaintiff's cause of action was thereby extinguished. To this plea no replication was filed; but, no demurrer being interposed, a reply was required, and by Rule 12 of the county court a general denial is to be treated as filed.

At the time of the accident, July 3, 1910, and ever since, the plaintiff was, and has been, a resident of Island Pond, in this State. This suit was not brought until July 8, 1912.

In the course of the trial the defendant offered to show that by certain other articles of the Civil Code, as construed by the courts of the Province of Quebec, the right of action for bodily injuries, given by the sections of the Civil Code on which this suit is brought, becomes extinguished, unless the suit be commenced within one year after the injuries are received, and consequently the plaintiff has no right of action. This offer was excluded and an exception saved.

The law is well settled that where a right of action is given by statute, and the statute further provides that suit shall be commenced within a specified time or the right of action shall [107] be extinguished, the right of recovery depends upon the action being commenced within the time limited, and if not so commenced, not merely the remedy, but the right and the remedy are extinguished. In Hunt v. Fay, 7 Vt. 170, this principle was discussed at length and applied. There the defendant's intestate died in the State of New Hampshire, and the principal administration of his estate was there. By the statute of that State, when an estate was represented insolvent a commission issued, and all claims which might be, but were not exhibited, to the commissioners, were forever barred. The plaintiff, a resident of New Hampshire until after the commissioners made their return, omitted to present any claim against the estate to the commissioners. Afterwards, removing to this State, the plaintiff presented his claim before the commissioners appointed in an ancillary administration here, for allowance against the estate. The administrator pleaded in bar the statute of New Hampshire. The plaintiff contended that the statute affected only the remedy, and for that reason his claim might be enforced in any jurisdiction where a suit could be instituted. It was held, that the case fell within the principle that a discharge of a debt in the country where made, or where it is to be executed, is a discharge everywhere—that the effect was to discharge the debt, or extinguish the right of the creditor, not a mere suspension or extinction of the remedy; and that it was a bar to the claim when presented before the commissioners in this State, under the ancillary administration. The same distinction is recognized in Cartier v. Page, 8 Vt. 146; Sparhawk v. Buell, 9 Vt. 41, 100; Williams v. Vermont Mut. F. Ins. Co. 20 Vt. 222; Peck v. Hibbard, 26 Vt. 698, 62 Am. Dec. 605; Needham v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 38 Vt. 294.

In Cartier v. Page, the action was assumption on a promissory note executed in Canada to a resident there, by a resident of this State. The defendant pleaded in bar that by an act of the Provincial Parliament of the Province of Lower Canada, all notes on which no suit or action should be brought within a specified time after the note becomes due and payable, were taken and considered to be paid and discharged, setting forth the Act. The plaintiff replied, that the defendant, at the time of giving the note and ever thereafter, was and hath been an inhabitant of this State, and without the jurisdiction of the courts of the Province of Lower Canada. To this a demurrer [108] was interposed. The court said the question was, whether the Act of the Provincial Parliament pleaded in bar, was to be considered as governing the nature, validity, and legal effect of the contract declared upon, as a part of the lex loci, or as only a law regulating the remedy to be had, for enforcing the contract; that if the Act belonged to the former class, the contract, if discharged in Canada, was discharged everywhere; but if it belonged to the latter class, it had no effect here. In Needham v. Grand Trunk R. Co. an action brought by the personal representative of the deceased for the benefit of the widow and next of kin, the deceased, while a citizen of this State and in defendant's employment as a locomotive engineer, was injured and the cause of action accrued in the State of New Hampshire. At common law, the cause of action which accrued to the intestate in that state was extinguished by his death, and no right there existed in the personal representatives to recover for such injury. Consequently the action could be maintained, if at all, only upon the ground that the statute of this State has extraterritorial force. It was contended in behalf of the plaintiff, that statutes of survivorship of the right of action pertain simply to the remedy, and therefore that the question of such survivorship was to be determined by the lex fori. It was held that our statute furnishes a remedy where the cause of action accrued without this State, and is not discharged or extinguished, but still exists by the laws of the state where it accrued; but that a cause of action, which by the rules of the common law is extinguished by the death of the party, is by such death fully discharged, unless it survives by force of some statute law of the state where the cause of action accrued; and that when the cause of action of the intestate does not survive by the laws of the state or territory where it accrued, our statute does not apply. The fact that the intestate was a citizen of this State at the time of his injury, was held to be entirely immaterial in the decision of this question. In Slater v. Mexican Nat. R. Co. 194 U. S. 120, 48 U. S. (L. ed.) 900, 24 S. Ct. 581, the action was brought in the United States Circuit Court for the northern district of Texas by citizens and residents of Texas, against a Colorado corporation operating a railroad from Texas to the City of Mexico, to enforce the liability for a death by a wrongful act in Mexico, created by Mexican statutes. The court, speaking through Mr. Justice Holmes, said: "When such a liability is enforced in a [109] jurisdiction foreign to the place of the wrongful act, obviously that does not mean that the act in any degree is subject to the lex fori, with regard to either its quality or its consequences. On the other hand, it equally little means that the law of the place of the act is operative outside its own territory. The theory of the foreign suit is that, although the act complained of was subject to no law having force in the forum, it gave rise to an obligation, an obligatio, which, like other obligations, follows the person, and may be enforced wherever the person may be found. . . . But as the only source of this obligation is the law of the place of the act, it follows that that law determines, not merely the existence of the obligation . . . but equally determines its extent. It seems to us unjust to allow a plaintiff to come here absolutely depending on the foreign law for the foundation of his case, and yet to deny the defendant the benefit of whatever limitations on his liability that the law would impose. . . . As the cause of action relied upon is one which is supposed to have arisen in Mexico, under Mexican laws, the place of the death and the domicile of the parties have no bearing upon the case." This case was followed by Davis v. Mills, 194 U. S. 451, 48 U. S. (L. ed.) 1067, 24 S. Ct. 692; the same Justice delivering the opinion. In Dennis v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 70 S. C. 254, 49 S. E. 869, 106 Am. St. Rep. 749, the deceased, a resident of South Carolina, while in the defendant's employ as an engineer, was killed when in the performance of his duties in North Carolina, more than one year before the action was commenced by his administratrix. It was held that the statute of the latter state requiring an action to be brought for wrongful death within one year, was not a statute of limitation, but that it extinguished the right conferred by the statute; and that it was incumbent on those seeking the benefit of the statute to show that their action conforms to all the requirements thereof, including that of commencing the suit within the time limited.

Moreover, the prosecution of transitory actions in a state or country other than that in which the cause of action arose, is based upon the principle of enforcing foreign right by comity. McLeod v. Connecticut, etc. R. Co. 58 Vt. 727, 6 Atl. 648; Peck v. Hibbard, cited above. From this it logically follows that, if under the lex loci no right of action was created, or if none there exists, then none exists anywhere, and none can be [110] prosecuted in another jurisdiction. O'Relley v. New Orleans, etc. R. Co. 16 R. I. 388, 17 Atl. 171, 906, 5 L.R.A. 364, 16 R. I. 395, 19 Atl. 244, 6 L.R.A. 719; Pendar v. H. & B. American Mach. Co. 35 R. I. 321, 87 Atl. 1, L.R.A. 1916A 428; Two Rivers Mfg. Co. v. Beyer, 74 Wis. 210, 42 N. W. 232, 17 Am. St. Rep. 131.

It is further urged that a limitation like the one which the defendant offered to show, to be effective against a right of action not existing at common law, must be incorporated into the statute creating the right. Respecting this, we think, as is stated by the Federal Supreme Court in Davis v. Mills, already cited, that "The fact that the limitation is contained in the same section or the same statute is material only as bearing on construction. It is merely a ground for saying that the limitation goes to the right created, and accompanies the obligation everywhere. The same conclusion would be reached if the limitation was in a different statute, provided it was directed to the newly created liability so specifically as to warrant saying that it qualified the right." See also Negaubauer v. Great Northern R. Co. 92 Minn. 184, 99 N. W. 620, 104 Am. St. Rep. 674, 2 Ann. Cas. 150.

The plaintiff argues that the special plea is defective, in that it fails to state verbatim those parts of the Canadian Code upon which the defendant relies, for which reason the trial court could not do otherwise than exclude the evidence offered as to the Canadian law. Very likely the plea, if met by demurrer, would have been held insufficient. But instead of being so met, it stands as traversed and issue joined thereon. Inferentially and argumentatively the plea states what the law of the Province of Quebec is (1 Saund. Pl. & Ev. 672), and it being traversed, the fact of the law of that Province is put in issue. Woodham v. Edwardes, 5 Ad. & El. 771, 31 E. C. L. 436. Evidence supporting this issue could not be excluded on the ground of insufficiency of the plea. Barney v. Bliss, 2 Aikens (Vt.) 60; French v. Thompson, 6 Vt. 54; Chase v. Holton, 11 Vt. 347; Carpenter v. Welch, 40 Vt. 251; Batchelder v. Kinney, 4 Vt. 150. Under the rule of pleading requiring positions of fact to be alleged in an absolute form, and not leave them to be collected by inference and argument only (Steph. Pl. 384), if a necessary averment is alleged argumentatively, advantage thereof can be taken only by special demurrer. Woodward v. French, 31 Vt. 337; Sheridan v. Sheridan, 58 Vt. 504, 5 Atl. 494.

[111] Evidence of pain and suffering was received. The court refused to instruct the jury that pain and suffering was not an element of damages, and submitted the question of the law of the province of Quebec on this branch of the case to the jury. It is sufficient to say that if the plaintiff is entitled to recover, the damages are to be assessed in accordance with the law of that Province, and consequently this exception is without force. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Babcock, 154 U. S. 190, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 958, 14 S. Ct. 976; Slater v. Mexican National R. Co. noticed above.

Immediately after his injury the plaintiff was taken to the Sherbrooke Protestant Hospital at Sherbrooke, in the Province of Quebec, where he remained more than a month, being treated by Dr. George L. Hume, assisted by another physician. Under a system which obtains in that institution the senior nurse in charge of the plaintiff was required to keep and did keep a hospital record of the case. One of the plaintiff's day nurses a part of the time, under Dr. Hume, was present at the trial and testified in keeping such a record as to the plaintiff, in which most of the symptoms noticed, and all medicine administered, by her, were entered. It appeared that other nurses, especially night nurses, made entries on this record, and no evidence was introduced as to the accuracy of the entries made by any of them. The exceptions show nothing concerning the names or the whereabouts of such "other nurses," nor why they were not present as witnesses at the trial. According to the evidence, the purpose of the system is to show the attending physician any symptoms that may arise in a patient's condition in the absence of the doctor, and to keep a correct record of temperature, pulse, respirations, medicine administered, diet, and other details more or less important. The record was offered as independent evidence, and its exclusion is assigned as error. Assuming, but not deciding, that such a record falls within the rule governing the admission of regular entries upon the principle of necessity, that rule requires that the person who made the entries "must be unavailable as a witness." 2 Wig. Ev. sec. 1521. "The ground," says Chief Justice Shaw in North Bank v. Abbot, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 465, 25 Am. Dec. 334, "is the impossibility of obtaining the testimony; and the cause of such impossibility seems immaterial." Here one of the nurses who made a part of the entries [112] was present at the trial, and the absence of the others was unaccounted for. In excluding the record offered, error does not appear.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded.

NOTE.

Hospital Chart as Evidence.

Chart Held Admissible.

A hospital chart is admissible as evidence in some jurisdictions. Barfield v. South Highland Infirmary (Ala.) 68 So. 30; Ribas v. Revere Rubber Co. 37 R. I. 189, 91 Atl. 58. Thus in the case first cited it appeared that hospital charts were offered in evidence in an action brought against a surgeon and an infirmary where he operated, alleging wrongful and negligent treatment. The court said: "The charts or records kept by the nurses were kept for the information of the attending physician or surgeon. Everything in them was proper for his information. They were duly proved. Defendant had a right to consider them in determining his treatment, and the jury were properly allowed to have these charts before them as part of the evidence in the case, though doubtless they signified little to any but the skilled professional mind." And in Ribas v. Revere Rubber Co. supra, the court said: "It appears from the evidence that it is a rule of the Rhode Island Hospital that a record shall be kept showing, among other things, the condition of the patient when received, his treatment while there, his condition from time to time denoting his progress towards recovery or otherwise, as the case may be, and of such other matters as may have a bearing upon or furnish needed information. Such a record relating to the plaintiff was kept by Dr. Peet, who was an interne or assistant surgeon at the hospital. This record embraces some matters which came under the personal knowledge of Dr. Peet, while other matters of record were communicated to him through doctors and nurses connected with the case. Dr. Peet, who made the record, was at the time of the trial without the jurisdiction of the court, and was not available as a witness.

The record of Dr. Peet covered the case from June 14th to August 15th, 1912. It appears to have been his business, as the recording official, to place upon record such facts relating to the patient as were communicated to him by his associates and subordinates, as well as those which came under his personal observation. It also appeared that the record in question was written up by Dr. Peet every third day. These facts, explanatory of the record having all appeared in testimony, and it having also appeared that Dr. Peet was without the state and that the record was in his handwriting, it was offered in evidence by the defendant."

In Massachusetts there has been some conflict as to the admissibility of hospital charts on records, but by statute a duty is now imposed on certain hospitals to keep records and it is provided that they shall be admissible in evidence. See Delaney v. Framingham Gas, etc. Co. 202 Mass. 359, 88 N. E. 773. In the early case of Townsend v. Pepperell, 99 Mass. 40, the court held that the records of a hospital were properly admitted in evidence to show that there was nothing in the recorded condition or treatment of a certain patient to indicate that she was insane. But in Cashin v. New York, etc. R. Co. 185 Mass. 543, 70 N. E. 930, the court referring to Townsend v. Pepperell, supra, said that in that case the record was evidently admitted. "Upon the doctrine that, it being more than thirty years old, there was no need to show the death of the person who made it." Holding that in the case at bar the records were properly excluded, the court said: "In the case of the books which were offered as records of the respective hospitals, it was not contended that as to either institution the records were kept under any requirement of law. They were therefore not public records, and were not admissible unless supported by the testimony of the one who made them, if that person were still alive and capable of being produced to testify. . . . The judge may well have found upon the evidence as to each hospital, both that the records were imperfect and that there was no reason to suppose that the writers could not be produced." And in Delaney v. Framingham Gas, etc. Co. 202 Mass. 359, 88 N. E. 773, the court, holding that certain hospital records were not those described in the statute and were therefore inadmissible, said: "The records were produced by the witness Gabagan. It appeared that the records were made by her, and that she was the proper custodian of them. But it further appeared that she never had any personal knowledge of the facts stated therein; that she received slips of paper from Dr. Painter, the physician, and copied them into the record; and that was all she knew about them. The record was offered as evidence to show that the statements therein made were true. As handed to the witness by the physician they were simply statements of the physician as to what the patient had said to him, or as to the diagnosis made by the physician. The records were comparatively recent. It was not shown that the physician was not living and within the jurisdiction of the court. No necessity was shown, therefore, for the introduction of this hearsay testimony. For aught that appeared there was better evidence. Under these circumstances the reason upon which the general rule was based, namely, that the record should be a record of facts of which the writer had personal knowledge, should be applied. The case is not within the above-mentioned exception to the general rule."

In other jurisdictions a hospital chart or record is not admissible in evidence. Baird v. Reilly, 92 Fed. 884, 35 C. C. A. 78; McMahon v. Bangs, 5 Penn. (Del.) 178, 62 Atl. 1098; Griebel v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 95 App. Div. 214, 88 N. Y. S. 767, affirmed 184 N. Y. 528, 76 N. E. 1096; Levy v. J. L. Mott Iron Works, 143 App. Div. 7, 127 N. Y. S. 506; Matter of Hock, 74 Misc. 15, 129 N. Y. S. 196. And see the reported case. See also Canadian Pac. R. Co. v. Quinn, 22 Quebec K. B. 428, 11 Dominion L. Rep. 600. Compare Liske v. Liske, 135 N. Y. S. 176. Thus in Griebel v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. supra, it appeared that a chart was introduced in evidence during the examination of a hospital nurse. She described the paper as a "temperature chart, known in the hospital as bedside notes," and said that such notes were taken in each case where a patient was brought to the hospital. The court said: "We are not aware of any rule of evidence which makes such a paper, offered under such circumstances, admissible." And in Levy v. J. L. Mott Iron Works, 143 App. Div. 7, 127 N. Y. S. 506, the court said: "The hospital records of this case, part of which were made by Dr. Comte and part of which were made by the nurse, and the entries in either of which were proved to be correct or to have been known by the person making the entry to be correct when entered, were received and read in evidence over objection duly taken by counsel for defendant on the ground, among others, that they were incompetent, hearsay, and not the best evidence, and he duly excepted. The learned counsel for the plaintiff attempts to sustain this ruling on the ground that Dr. Comte had no recollection of the facts, and that his recollection was not refreshed by the records, and, therefore, they became the best evidence in so far as the recorded facts within his personal knowledge at the time, and he cites . . . authority for the general rule; but that contention cannot prevail here, for many of the important entries were made by the nurse and are not shown to be true, and there has been no opportunity afforded to cross-examine the nurse with respect thereto, and even in so far as they were made by Dr. Comte, he was not asked whether he knew them to be correct when entered or whether an inspection thereof refreshed his recollection and enabled him to testify from recollection. Counsel for plaintiff finally draws attention to the fact that Dr. Comte had, before the records were received in evidence, testified to the facts shown in the hospital records to quite an extent without objection, and that, therefore, the defendant was not prejudiced by their receipt in evidence. It did not appear until the cross-examination that the doctor was not testifying from recollection. The defendant should not be prejudiced because its counsel was not captious in objecting to the testimony of the doctor, which it finally appeared was based entirely on the records. Moreover, the principal difficulty with the case is that the testimony of the doctor, including his testimony of an expert nature, depends entirely on the hospital records as to which there is no presumption of correctness, and we have no evidence that they are correct, and, therefore, the plaintiff has failed to sustain the burden of proving that the injuries were the proximate cause of death." So in Canadian Pac. R. Co. v. Quinn, 22 Quebec K. B. 428, 11 Dominion L. Rep. 600, a chart of the plaintiff's case, verified by the superintendent of nurses and another nurse, containing entries, however, by a nurse not available as a witness, was held to be inadmissible.

Though a chart is not admissible in evidence it may be used by a witness for the purpose of refreshing his memory. Baird v. Reilly, 92 Fed. 884, 35 C. C. A. 78, wherein the court said: "It was proper to exclude from the consideration of the jury that part of the hospital record which consisted of the remarks of the nurse who attended the plaintiff. If she had been called as a witness, this part of the record might have been competent for use by her to refresh her memory. It was not competent as independent evidence of the truth of the statements." In McMahon v. Bangs, 5 Penn. (Del.) 178, 62 Atl. 1098, it appeared that the head nurse of a hospital was questioned by the plaintiff concerning a certain record of his case. This had been regularly kept by a nurse who had since been dismissed and was not present in court. On its being offered in evidence, counsel for the defendant objected thereto, on the ground that "the only person who could testify to said record so as to make it proper evidence would be the person who made it." Boyce, J. said: "It seems to the court that the object of offering this paper in evidence is to show pain and suffering. For that purpose the nurses themselves might be called, and under proper circumstances this paper could be used to refresh their memories; beyond that we think it is not admissible." See to the same effect Matter of Hock, 74 Misc. 15, 129 N. Y. S. 196.

In the case of In re Flint, 100 Cal. 391, 34 Pac. 863, a will contest, the record made by a private nurse of events transpiring at the testator's sick bed was offered in evidence. The court said: "Its admission should not have been allowed. There was no question involved as to the right of the witness to refresh her recollection from the record, but it was offered as an independent piece of evidence in the case. It is difficult to see the purpose of the offer, for the witness was upon the stand ready to testify as to all competent and material matters occurring at the times she was engaged in the sick-room."

STATE.

Georgia Supreme Court—November 11, 1914.

142 Ga. 636; 83 S. E. 540.

Banks — Insolvency — Presumption of Fraud — Validity of Statute.

Properly construed, Penal Code (1910) § 204, which provides for raising a presumption of fraud against the president and directors of an insolvent bank chartered in this state, is not violative of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, on the ground that it abridges the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, or deprives the president and directors of an insolvent bank of the equal protection of the laws, or deprives them of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, on the ground that similar provisions have not been made in regard to the president and directors of other corporations than banks.

That section is not violative of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States for any of the reasons set out in the first question by the Court of Appeals.

Same.

The fifth amendment of the Constitution of the United States is not a limitation upon the power of the states, but operates upon the national government only. Accordingly section 204 of the Penal Code, is not invalid as being violative of that amendment.

Same.

Penal Code (1910) § 204 is not violative of article 1, section 1, paragraph 3, of the state constitution, which declares that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, except by due process of law."

When Bank Is "Insolvent."

Within the meaning of Penal Code (1910) § 204, the insolvency of a bank is that condition in which its entire property and assets are insufficient to pay all of its debts.

(a) If the entire property and assets of a bank are sufficient to discharge its liabilities, it is not insolvent, within the meaning of Penal Code (1910) § 204, although it may not be able to pay its debts immediately as they become due, or to pay its depositors on demand.

(b) Civil Code (1910) § 2306, which provides for the winding up of a bank by the state bank examiner under certain circumstances therein declared, does not furnish a definition of insolvency to be applied in construing Penal Code (1910) § 204.

Certified questions from Court of Appeals.

Criminal action. J. W. Griffin charged with violation of statute. Questions certified by Court of Appeals to Supreme Court. QUESTIONS ANSWERED.

[637] The Court of Appeals certified to the Supreme Court the following questions (Case No. 5379):

"1. Is section 204 of the Penal Code of Georgia of 1910 violative of the provisions of the fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States, that 'No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws;' for the reason that the provision of this section of the code that every insolvency of a chartered bank shall be deemed fraudulent, and the president and directors shall be severally punished by imprisonment and labor in the penitentiary, abridges the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, or deprives the president and directors of such a bank of equal protection of the laws with like officers of other corporations, as to whom there is no law providing that insolvency of the corporation shall be deemed fraudulent, and that the president and directors, or other officers, shall be severally punishable by imprisonment and labor in the penitentiary on proof of insolvency of the corporation; or for the reason that this provision of the code destroys or abridges the presumption of innocence which the law raises as evidence in behalf of every one charged with crime; or for the reason that it deprives the president and directors of an insolvent chartered bank of the right of presenting [638] their defense to the charge of fraudulent intent, especially since, under the law of this State, the defendant is deprived of the right of testifying in his own behalf; or for the reason that this section of the code declares insolvency of a chartered bank to be fraudulent and provides that the president and directors of the bank shall be punished, even though they had nothing to do with the management of the bank and though the insolvency was not brought about by their conduct or with their knowledge; or for any other reason suggested by the defendant's demurrer?

"2. Is section 204 of the Penal Code, for any of the reasons stated in the foregoing question, violative of the provision of the fifth amendment of the constitution of the United States, that 'No person shall . . . be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law'?"

"3. Is section 204 of the Penal Code, for any of the reasons stated above violative of the provision of article 1, section 1, paragraph 3, of the constitution of the State of Georgia, that 'No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, except by due process of law'?"

"4. Is a bank insolvent, within the meaning of section 204 of the Penal Code, if the entire property and assets of the bank are sufficient to discharge its liabilities by process of liquidation, even though it may not be able to pay its debts immediately as they become due, or to pay its depositors on demand? In what respect, if any, is the meaning of the term 'insolvency,' as applied to a chartered bank, differentiated from the meaning of that term as applied to the financial condition of an individual? Are sections 2306 of the Civil Code and 204 of the Penal Code to be construed together, and is the test of insolvency indicated in the former section to be applied in construing the latter?"

The Penal Code (1910) § 204, to which reference is made in the preceding questions, reads as follows: "Every insolvency of a chartered bank, or refusal or failure to redeem its bills on demand, either with specie or current bank-bills passing at par value, shall be deemed fraudulent, and the president and directors shall be severally punished by imprisonment and labor in the penitentiary for not less than one year nor longer than ten years: Provided, that the defendant may repel the presumption of fraud, by showing that the affairs of the bank have been fairly and legally administered, [639] and generally with the same care and diligence that agents, receiving a commission for their services, are required and bound by law to observe; and upon such showing the jury shall acquit the prisoner."

LUMPKIN, J.—1. With certain limitations, the legislature may enact that when specified facts have been proved, they shall, even in a criminal case, be prima facie evidence of the guilt of the accused, and shift the burden of proof. On this power there are limitations, the principal one of which is that the fact or facts which will raise the presumption and shift the burden of proof must have some fair relation to, or material connection with, the main fact as to which the presumption is raised. The inference or presumption from the facts proved must not be merely arbitrary, or wholly unreasonable, unnatural, or extraordinary, but must bear some reasonable relation to the facts proved. To illustrate, if the legislature should declare that every man found wearing a straw hat in September should be presumed to have committed any forgery which took place in that month, such an act would be invalid, because there is no rational connection between forgery and wearing a straw hat, and the presumption would be purely arbitrary. But if the legislature should declare that one found in possession of stolen goods shortly after a larceny should be prima facie presumed to be the thief, and that the burden of rebutting the presumption should rest on him, this would be valid, the presumption not being purely arbitrary but there being a reasonable connection between the possession of the stolen goods and the commission of the larceny. Moreover, the presumption so raised must not be final, but the accused must be allowed a fair opportunity to make his defense and show all of the facts bearing on the issue, and to have the whole case submitted to the jury for decision, after considering all of the evidence as well as the prima facie presumption, if the facts from which it arises have been proved to exist. Banks v. State, 124 Ga. 15, 52 S. E. 74, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1007, and note; Vance v. State, 128 Ga. 661, 57 S. E. 889; Wilson v. State, 138 Ga. 489, 493, 75 S. E. 619; 2 Jones, Ev. § 196; Mobile, etc. R. Co. v. Turnipseed, 219 U. S. 35, 31 S. Ct. 136, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 78, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 226, Ann. Cas. 1912A 463 and note; State v. Thomas, 6 Ann. [640] Cas. 744, 746 and note, 144 Ala. 77, 40 So. 271, 2 L.R.A.

(N.S.) 1011, 113 Am. St. Rep. 17; 3 Enc. Ev. 291; 14 Id. 110.

The exercise of this power by the legislature in relation to chartered banks, so as to raise a prima facie presumption of fraud against the president and directors, upon proof of the insolvency of the bank, is not violative of the fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States on the ground that it deals with chartered banks and not with other corporations. Legitimate classification in such cases does not deprive persons within the class of the equal protection of the laws. If banks cannot be legitimately classified without including all other corporations in the legislation applicable to them, then all the banking laws of the country, National and State, would have to be declared invalid.

If the business of banking furnishes a legitimate basis for classification in many respects, is the presumption raised by Penal Code (1910) § 204 an arbitrary presumption, without legitimate basis? That section does not provide punishment for mere insolvency, but contemplates fraudulent insolvency of banks. The president and directors have duties to discharge in regard to the management of the bank and its affairs. The causes which bring about the insolvency of a bank are much more within the knowledge of its managing officials than of persons not connected with it. To impose on the State, in a prosecution for a fraudulent insolvency, the onus of proving all of the transactions of the bank and the acts of its officials, would place upon it a heavy burden. It is much easier for the managing officials of the bank to show that the insolvency was not fraudulent, but arose from other causes. The facts are peculiarly accessible to them, if they properly discharge their duties. The suggestion that the president and directors frequently take little or no part in managing a bank can have but little weight. It is the duty of directors to direct, though they may commit certain ministerial duties to authorized officers. We have recently had occasion, in regard to trading corporations generally, to declare that while such directors may commit the active management of the business to authorized officers, this will not relieve them from the duty of reasonable supervision, and it was said: "Unfortunately some directors appear to think that they have fully discharged their duties by acting as figureheads and dummies." McEwen v. Kelly, 140 Ga. 720, 79 S. E. 777. It is not meant that carelessness will [641] necessarily import guilt; but duties rest upon the president and directors of a chartered bank, in regard to the management of its affairs, which furnish a legitimate basis for a legislative act raising a presumption that they have been guilty of fraudulent mismanagement when the bank becomes insolvent.

Giving the statute a reasonable construction, the presumption was not intended to be conclusive. The argument that the expression "shall be deemed fraudulent" meant that it should be finally adjudged fraudulent is unsound. The latter part of the section provides for repelling "the presumption of fraud;" and the fair construction of the entire section is that the presumption raised is only prima facie, and subject to be rebutted. The raising of such a presumption upon proof of the fact that the bank was one chartered in this State, that the defendant was its president or a director, and that it had become insolvent, is not so arbitrary or irrational that it can be declared that the legislature had no legitimate foundation upon which to rest the presumption or to provide for a change in the burden of proof. Properly construed, the section does not authorize the punishment of the president and directors "even though they had nothing to do with the management of the bank and though the insolvency was not brought about by their conduct, or with their knowledge." The affirmative declaration that the defendant may repel the presumption of fraud, by showing that the affairs of the bank have been fairly and legally administered, and generally with the same care and diligence that agents, receiving a commission for their services, are required and bound by law to observe, and that upon such showing "the jury shall acquit the prisoner," does not exclude the president or a director of a chartered bank which has become insolvent from disproving, by any legitimate evidence, the presumption of fraudulent mismanagement which may have been raised against him. The fact that in this State the defendant cannot testify, but may make his statement not under oath, which the jury may believe in preference to the sworn evidence, does not render the act invalid, as held in the cases of Vance v. State, and Wilson v. State, supra.

We think that a fair and reasonable construction of the section of the Penal Code under consideration is, that, upon proof of certain specified facts, a presumption of fraudulent mismanagement would be raised against the president and directors of an insolvent [642] chartered bank; that if such management as is mentioned in the proviso should be shown, the jury would be required to acquit the prisoner or prisoners; but that this would not prevent the accused from rebutting the presumption by proof of other facts, such as that the insolvency was caused by an unexpected panic in the country, or by the speculation of some officer or agent, for which the accused was in no way responsible, or by other evidence rebutting the presumption of fraudulent conduct on his part. See, in this connection, Youmans v. State, 7 Ga. App. 101, 66 S. E. 383; Robertson v. People, 20 Colo. 279, 38 Pac. 326; Meadowcroft v. People, 163 Ill. 56, 67, 45 N. E. 303, 991, 35 L.R.A. 176, 54 Am. St. Rep. 447; State v. Beach, 147 Ind. 74, 78, 43 N. E. 949, 46 N. E. 145, 36 L.R.A. 179; State v. Sattley, 131 Mo. 464, 33 S. W. 41.

It follows from what has been said, that the prima facie presumption raised against the president and directors of a chartered bank, upon proof of its insolvency, that they have been guilty of fraudulent mismanagement, is not arbitrary, unreasonable, unnatural, or extraordinary, and that the code section under consideration does not attempt to deprive those officers of the right to be heard on the existence of the fact in issue, or their connection therewith, or to rebut the presumption against them by any legitimate evidence. So construed, the act is not unconstitutional for any of the reasons mentioned in the first question propounded by the Court of Appeals; and that question is answered in the negative.

2. It is well settled that the fifth amendment of the constitution of the United States is not a limitation upon the powers of the States, but operates on the national government only. Wilburn v. State, 141 Ga. 510 (2b), and citations (81 S. E. 444). Accordingly, Penal Code (1910) § 204 is not unconstitutional as being violative of that amendment.

3. What has already been said in the first division of this opinion in regard to the fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States applies also to the provision of the State constitution that "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, except by due process of law;" and section 204 of the Penal Code is not violative of that clause of the constitution.

4. The authorities are not in accord in defining insolvency. The underlying idea involved is an inability to pay debts. The general and popular meaning of the word is that condition in which a person [643] has not sufficient assets to pay his debts. Cohen v. Parish, 100 Ga. 335, 28 S. E. 122. In connection with bankruptcy and insolvency acts another definition has arisen as applicable to traders, which is the inability of a person to pay his debts as they become due in the ordinary course of business. And, as a bank was engaged in a business of a certain character, this definition came to be applied to the insolvency of banks. Clarke v. Ingram, 107 Ga. 565, 582, 33 S. E. 802; Black's Law Dic. Anderson's Law Dic. Bouvier's Law Dic. word "Insolvency;" 4. Words and Phrases, 3647, 3648, 3654. Nevertheless, as general deposits were held to be loans to the bank, payable on demand, and it was a matter of common knowledge that the business of banking involved lending out a large part of these deposits, and not merely holding them ready to pay every depositor if he should make demand therefor, various modifying expressions have been employed, to show that while a bank is ordinarily expected to pay depositors on demand in the usual course of business, sudden panics or emergencies may arise which would cause a temporary suspension of payments without conclusively showing insolvency. Thus one writer says that a number of courts now uphold what he declares to be the more reasonable rule that "a bank is solvent when it possesses sufficient solvent and marketable assets to meet all of its obligations within a reasonable time." Magee on Banks and Banking, 604. This definition has the defect of using the word "solvent" as a part of the definition of the same word. For other efforts to formulate a satisfactory definition of insolvency as applied to banks, see Tiffany, Banks and Banking, 346; Michie, Banks and Banking, § 73, p. 496; Zane, Banks and Banking, 603, 604; 5 Cyc. 559, 560.

We are not now concerned, however, with announcing a precise definition of insolvency as applied to banks, relatively to bankruptcy or insolvency laws; but are endeavoring to show that two meanings have been given to the word insolvency, and to determine which of them was intended in the act now being considered. The two meanings of the word insolvency were thus stated by Mr. Justice Field, in Toof v. Martin, 13 Wall. 46, 47, 20 U. S. (L. ed.) 432: "The term insolvency is not always used in the same sense. It is sometimes used to denote the insufficiency of the entire property and assets of an individual to pay his debts. This is its general and popular meaning. But it is also used in a more restricted sense, to [644] express the inability of a party to pay his debts as they become due in the ordinary course of business. It is in this latter sense that the term is used when traders and merchants are said to be insolvent, and as applied to them it is the sense intended by the act of Congress." The act of Congress mentioned was the bankrupt act of 1867. The bankrupt act of 1898 expressly defines the word as there used, and makes the definition conform closely to what has been declared to be the general and popular meaning. In determining whether the word is to be construed as having one meaning or the other, as employed in the Penal Code, § 204, there are several considerations which may aid us. In construing statutes the general rule is that the ordinary signification is to be applied to words, except words of art or those connected with a particular trade or subject-matter, unless there is something in the context to show that the legislature intended to use the word in a different sense. Civil Code (1910) § 4. Again, bankruptcy and insolvency laws are civil laws dealing with civil proceedings in certain cases, and looking to the protection of the creditors, and the taking charge and properly handling and distributing of estates of persons within their scope, the bankrupt law also providing for the discharge of the debtor. Such laws are to be construed in the light of their purpose and object. On the other hand, the law now before us is a penal law which may subject the president and directors of a bank to imprisonment in the penitentiary, upon conviction; and it raises a presumption of guilt from the insolvency of the bank. The rule of strict construction is usually applicable in criminal law. This act was a part of the Penal Code of 1833, and has been in force ever since. The legislature declared that "every insolvency of a chartered bank, or refusal or failure to redeem its bills on demand, either with specie or current bank-bills passing at par value, shall be deemed fraudulent," etc. This created two contingencies, either one of which would serve to raise a presumption of fraud; one was insolvency, the other failure or refusal of a bank of issue to redeem its bills. Insolvency under the act was not the same as failure or refusal to redeem. It was used in the ordinary and general sense of the word.

Several States have statutes which make it penal for the officers of a bank knowingly to receive deposits when the bank is insolvent or in failing circumstances. In 37 Cent. L. J. 147, a [645] writer discussed the meaning of the word "insolvent" as used in such a statute, and criticized a decision which had been rendered by the Supreme Court of Iowa. Among other things it was said: "While the foregoing are undoubtedly the popular and general meanings of solvency and insolvency, the courts, in administering the bankruptcy and insolvency laws and laws regulating assignments for the benefit of creditors, have given the words limited and restricted meanings. Under those acts insolvency means inability to pay one's debts in the ordinary course of business. Also under insolvent acts where it was necessary to protect the creditors and compel an equal distribution of the insolvent's estate. The main purpose of the bankrupt act was to compel a debtor to distribute his property equitably among all his creditors. . . . By the terms of the act [the bankrupt act of 1867] the creditor could not procure a preference if he knew of the failure of his debtor to meet obligations when due. The rule was applied particularly to traders, merchants, and bankers. And this limited meaning of 'insolvency' was first applied under the bankrupt act, and for the above reason and no other. By what line of reasoning, then, can the restricted meaning be applied to the word when used in the penal statutes under discussion? Clearly no purpose is intended to be served by these statutes kindred to the purpose of of the bankrupt acts. The objects of the two are entirely dissimilar. The penal statutes are supposed to prevent fraudulent banking. They are not intended to force all banks to keep all deposits in the vault ready for the depositor upon call. Statutes regulating banking expressly permit the loaning of deposits by requiring the bank to keep on hand a reserve of only 15 to 20 per cent. of their deposits. Does the legislature permit banks to loan 80 to 90 per cent. of deposits, and at the same time fix a heavy penalty for not having the same money on hand to pay out on demand?" This line of reasoning has been followed in some cases. Ellis v. State, 138 Wis. 513, 119 N. W. 1110, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 444, 131 Am. St. Rep. 1022; Fleming v. State, 62 Tex. Crim. 653, 199 S. W. 598. In Parrish v. Com. 136 Ky. 77, 123 S. W. 339, the same definition was adopted in a criminal case; but the majority of the court held, that, under a statute declaring that a reversal should only be granted for errors of law where the court was satisfied that the substantial rights of the defendant had been violated, the difference in the two [646] definitions was not so material as to require a reversal, in view of the evidence and argument. Hobson, J., dissented from this position. See also, in this connection, Youmans v. State, 7 Ga. App. 101, supra. In State v. Stevens, 16 S. D. 309, 92 N. W. 420, the definition of insolvency applicable to bankruptcy or insolvency proceedings was adopted. In California the same insolvency act was held to include both meanings of the word, according as the proceeding was voluntary or involuntary. Ruggles v. Cannedy, 127 Cal. 290, 53 Pac. 911, 916, 59 Pac. 827, 46 L.R.A. 371. We are not now discussing whether a failure or refusal to pay on demand might be proved as having evidential value on the subject of insolvency.

Civil Code (1910) section 2306 does not furnish a test of insolvency as that word is used in Penal Code section 204. The section first cited forms a part of the law relating to the bank bureau, enacted in 1907. It provides for a preliminary report of insolvency by the bank examiner, derived from certain data, a seizure of the bank's assets under order of the Governor, and a thorough examination into its affairs; and that whenever the examiner shall "become satisfied that such bank can not resume business or liquidate its indebtedness to the satisfaction of all creditors, including its shareholders, he shall report the fact of its insolvency to the Governor," who shall thereupon instruct the attorney-general to institute proper proceedings. It is evident that the language of this section cannot be literally imported into section 204 of the Penal Code. The two examinations, and the becoming satisfied that the bank "cannot resume business or liquidate its indebtedness to the satisfaction of all creditors, including its shareholders," do not furnish a test of insolvency under the criminal statute. The one is a remedial proceeding by the State for the winding up of a bank under certain circumstances and in a specified manner. The other is a penal law for the punishment of fraudulent mismanagement by a president or directors in connection with the insolvency of a chartered bank.

It follows from what has been said, that, within the meaning of Penal Code (1910) § 204, a bank is not insolvent if its entire property and assets are sufficient to discharge its liabilities by process of liquidation, even though it may not be able to pay its debts immediately as they become due, or to pay its depositors on demand; and that in this statute there is no difference in the meaning of the [647] word "insolvency" as applied to a chartered bank and the meaning of the word as applied to the financial condition of an individual. Of course, we understand the process of liquidation mentioned in the question of the Court of Appeals to mean prompt liquidation duly carried out, and not after indefinite holding with the hope of appreciation in values.

NOTE.

When Bank Is "Insolvent."

Introductory, 85.

In Criminal Action, 85.

In Civil Action, 87.

Introductory.

The word "insolvent," as used in various contexts with reference to a bank, has been held to be susceptible of two distinct meanings which may be designated as the restricted sense and the general or popular sense. In the majority of jurisdictions, the word is construed in the restricted sense, i. e., that a bank is insolvent when it is unable to meet its current obligations as they mature, though its assets may be greatly in excess of its liabilities. However, the popular or general meaning of the term, viz.: that the entire property and assets of the bank are insufficient to meet its liabilities by way of liquidation, though in this sense the term is usually applied to traders and those engaged in business and mercantile pursuits, has, in some jurisdictions, been held to apply to banks also.

In Criminal Action.

In a criminal prosecution of the officials of a bank for the violation of a statute prohibiting the receipt of deposits with knowledge that the bank is insolvent, the word "insolvent" has generally been construed in its restricted sense, viz., that the bank is insolvent when it is unable to meet its demands in the usual and ordinary course of business, even though it may have assets in excess of its liabilities. However, it is not essential within the meaning of the foregoing statement, that a bank should have on hand sufficient cash to pay all its depositors, or any considerable number of them, on the same day, or in case of a run on the bank or some extraordinary demand, but it is necessary only for it to have on hand cash or available assets sufficient to meet the demands that are usually made on it from day to day in the ordinary course of business. Skarda v. State, 118 Ark. 176, 175 S. W. 1190; Wilkin v. State (Ark.) 180 S. W. 512; State v. Cramer, 20 Idaho 639, 119 Pac. 30; State v. Cadwell, 79 Ia. 432, 44 N. W. 700; State v. Myers, 54 Kan. 206, 38 Pac. 296; State v. Burlingame, 146 Mo. 207, 48 S. W. 72; State v. Darragh, 152 Mo. 522, 54 S. W. 226; State v. Stevens, 16 S. D. 309, 92 N. W. 420. Thus, it has been said: "A bank is insolvent in contemplation of the statute under consideration when its assets and property are of such character and value that it is unable to meet its demands in the usual and ordinary course of business. It is not essential that the bank shall have on hand sufficient cash to pay all of its depositors or any considerable number of them on the same day, or in case of a run on the bank or some extraordinary demand. It is only necessary for it to have on hand cash or available assets sufficient to meet the demands that are usually made on it from day to day in the ordinary course of business. The amount owing by the bank to its stockholders as such or its capital stock should not be considered as a debt against the bank in determining its solvency." Wilkin v. State, supra. The capital stock and the surplus fund are not to be considered as liabilities of the bank in determining its solvency, but as resources. Skarda v. State, 118 Ark. 176, 175 S. W. 1190; Wilkin v. State (Ark.) 180 S. W. 512; State v. Cramer, 20 Idaho 639, 119 Pac. 30; State v. Myers, 54 Kan. 206, 38 Pac. 296. Thus in the case last cited the court said: "In a criminal prosecution . . . against an officer of a bank for knowingly receiving deposits when his bank is insolvent, the capital stock and surplus fund cannot be considered as liabilities or debts in determining the insolvency; otherwise, the greater the capital of the bank and the larger its surplus fund, the more insolvent it will be. The contrary is the actual fact. The capital and surplus of a bank are its resources which may be used to pay its depositors and other creditors, when there have been losses by loans or otherwise. If a bank, by using its capital or surplus, or both, can pay promptly its deposits and other debts, as they become due in the ordinary course of business, it is not insolvent. Upon the books and in the official statements of a bank, capital stock and the surplus fund are denominated as liabilities, but they are resources of the bank with which to transact business. The more capital a bank has, the better able it is to meet its deposits and other debts. The more surplus on hand, the greater its ability to pay promptly its deposits and other debts. If a bank is able to pay promptly every depositor and every other creditor in the ordinary course of business, the bank . . . is solvent, whether there is any surplus or capital to be distributed afterward to stockholders or not."

But in some jurisdictions, in criminal proceedings against the officers of a bank for causing insolvency by their intentional fraudulent acts or for receiving deposits knowing the bank to be insolvent, a bank has been held to be "insolvent" only when there is an insufficiency of all its property and assets to pay all its just debts. Youmans v. State, 7 Ga. App. 101, 66 S. E. 383; Parrish v. Com. 136 Ky. 77, 123 S. W. 339; State v. Clements, 82 Minn. 434, 85 N. W. 229; Gass v. State, 130 Tenn. 581, 172 S. W. 305; Fleming v. State, 62 Tex. Crim. 653, 139 S. W. 598; Brown v. State, 71 Tex. Crim. 353, 162 S. W. 339; Ellis v. State, 138 Wis. 513, 119 N. W. 1110, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 444, 131 Am. St. Rep. 1022. And see the reported case. See also Roby v. State, 41 Tex. Crim. 162, 51 S. W. 1114. Thus, in Parrish v. Com. supra, the court said: "It is insisted that under instruction No. 3 ('a bank is insolvent within the meaning of these instructions when its property and assets are of such character and value that it cannot meet its demands in the ordinary course of its business') the jury had the right to find a verdict of guilty if they believed that the bank could not pay all of its depositors on demand; that this fact, according to the definition of 'insolvency,' was sufficient evidence that the bank was insolvent. If this was the fair meaning of the instruction, it would not be a correct statement of the law applicable to the case, and if we believed the jury so understood it, we would order a new trial. Although the law undoubtedly contemplates that when a depositor places money in a bank as a general deposit, he shall have the right to withdraw it upon demand, and that the refusal or inability of the bank to permit him so to do would be evidence of its failing condition, it is yet manifest that the mere fact that the bank does not have in its vaults sufficient cash to satisfy all its depositors, or any considerable number of them, on the same day, or in case a run was made on the bank, would not be proof of its insolvency within the meaning of the statute. A bank might not be able to pay its depositors on demand, and yet be perfectly solvent. It is only when all of its property and assets are not sufficient to satisfy its debts that it is insolvent. . . . Whenever a bank fails to discharge its obligations in the ordinary course of its usual and customary business, or closes its doors, or goes into liquidation, it is evidence of its insolvency, and a prosecution may at once be inaugurated. But there can be no conviction unless the evidence conduces to show that when the deposit was received, all of its property and assets were not sufficient to meet its demands. It is a matter of common knowledge that banks well managed never have on hand an amount of money equal to their deposits. They are not expected or required to do this, or to anticipate that all their depositors will want their money at the same time. It is a legitimate feature of good banking to lend out so much of the deposits as may not be necessary to meet the demands of depositors in the ordinary course of business, and the statute permits this by providing in section 584 that: 'Each bank shall keep on hand at all times at least fifteen per cent. of its total deposits and in cities with a population of over fifty thousand at least twenty-five per cent. of its total deposits; one-third of which reserve shall be in money, and the balance may be in funds, payable on demand, deposited in other banks.' In view of this statute allowing banks to lend out so large a per cent. of their deposit, it would be absurd to say that the failure to be able to pay all checks presented on demand, would be proof of its insolvency. If this test were applied, every bank in the state would be insolvent, because no one of them could presently pay all of its depositors in full. No honest, prudent banker need feel apprehensive that he will be subjected to either indictment or prosecution because the cash on hand at any time is not sufficient to meet the claims of all depositors. And we may add that in no case that has come under our notice were criminal proceedings under statutes like ours instituted until the bank had closed its doors and gone into liquidation. When all of the property and assets of a bank—and these words include every species of property owned by it—are not of sufficient value to pay its debts, there can be no doubt that the bank is insolvent. This is what the instruction means when fairly interpreted, and that this was the view of the law entertained by this trial judge, as well as counsel for the commonwealth and the accused, is amply demonstrated by the line of testimony offered in behalf of the commonwealth, as well as the defense on the trial of the case." In Ellis v. State, 138 Wis. 513, 119 N. W. 1110, 131 Am. St. Rep. 1022, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 444, it was said: "A bank is insolvent when the fair cash value of its assets, realizable within a reasonable time, in case of liquidation by the proprietors, as ordinarily prudent persons would ordinarily close up their business, is equivalent to its liabilities, exclusive of stock liability." And in Gass v. State, 130 Tenn. 581, 172 S. W. 305, the court said: "We shall now inquire when is a bank insolvent within the sense and meaning of the statute in question. There are two theories of the subject. One is that a bank is insolvent when it is unable to pay demands made upon it in the ordinary course of business when such demands fall due, a situation in which bankruptcy proceedings could be immediately instituted against it. The other theory is that the bank is insolvent when its assets are less in value than the amount of its debts, exclusive of capital stock, surplus, and undivided profits, allowing a reasonable time for the conversion of the assets into money. It is no doubt true that, when a bank is unable to pay its debts as they fall due in the ordinary course of business, it is subject to be proceeded against by a bill in equity for the appointment of a receiver for the administration of its assets. We do not believe, however, that this state or condition of the business was such as was contemplated by the statute in question. It cannot be true that a banker is guilty of a crime in receiving a deposit if at the time the assets of the bank fully equal in value the sum of its debts, even though it may require some time to realize on those assets. The gist of the matter is that a deposit is received by a banker knowing or having good reason to believe that the money will be lost to the depositor, by reason of the inability of the bank to return it; but if the assets on a fair valuation are amply sufficient to pay all depositors, including the one in question, and all other debts of the bank, exclusive of the capital stock, surplus, and undivided profits, the bank is not insolvent, nor is there any good reason to believe that it is insolvent. This meaning of insolvency is the ordinary signification of the word; that is, an insufficiency of assets to pay debts." In the reported case, which is a prosecution of the president of a bank for fraudulent mismanagement in connection with the insolvency of the bank, it is held that a bank is insolvent if its entire property and assets are insufficient to discharge its liabilities by way of liquidation; and that, if a bank's assets are sufficient to pay its debts after liquidation, it is not insolvent though it is unable to pay its debts immediately as they become due, or to pay its depositors on demand. It is also held that the language of the section of the Civil Code providing for examinations into the affairs of a bank, and for the closing of the bank on the examiner's becoming satisfied that the bank "cannot resume business or liquidate its indebtedness to the satisfaction of all creditors, including its shareholders," does not furnish a test of insolvency for use in construing the meaning of "insolvency" in an action under the criminal statute.

In Civil Action.

In a number of jurisdictions, it has been held in various civil actions that the insolvency of a bank does not mean that condition in which a business concern is placed when it is found that on the settlement of its affairs, it will not be able to pay its debts in full, but that it means a present inability to meet its current obligations as they mature. Hayden v. New York Chemical Nat. Bank, 84 Fed. 874, 55 U. S. App. 420, 28 C. C. A. 548, affirmed 174 U. S. 610, 19 S. Ct. 787, 43 U. S. No. 2,489 (action to have transfer declared void, as act in contemplation of insolvency); Stone v. Dodge, 96 Mich. 514, 56 N. W. 75, 21 L.R.A. 280 (action by receiver of insolvent bank to recover sum due at date of suspension of bank); Dodge v. Mastin, 17 Fed. 660 (action to secure deposit made when bank was insolvent; interpreting Missouri statute); Eads v. Orcutt, 79 Mo. App. 511 (suit by depositor against officers of bank to recover deposit made when bank was known to be insolvent); Stadler v. Helena First Nat. Bank, 22 Mont. 190, 56 Pac. 111, 74 Am. Stahlman*, 96 Tenn. 98, 34 S. W. 222 (suit by depositor to hold officers of bank individually liable for loss of deposit claimed to have been made when bank was insolvent); Dewey v. St. Albans Trust Co. 56 Vt. 476, 48 Am. Rep. 803 (action to have bank declared insolvent and certain directors preferred). And see Harmanson v. Bain, 1 Hughes 188, 11 Fed. Cas. No. 6,072 (bill in equity to declare transfer of property void); In re Manufacturers' Nat. Bank, 5 Biss. 499, 19 Int. Rev. Rec. 20, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 9,051 (application for rule on national bank to show cause why it should not be adjudged bankrupt); Oakley v. Paterson Bank, 2 N. J. Eq. 173 (bill for injunction and appointment of receivers). Compare Earle v. Carson, 188 U. S. 42, 23 S. Ct. 254, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 373 (action to recover amount of liability of stockholder of national bank on its suspension); Bank Com'rs v. Brest Bank, Har. (Mich.) 106 (motion for appointment of receiver). In Com. v. Tradesmen's Trust Co. 237 Pa. St. 316, 85 Atl. 363, it was said: "It is not insolvency in its popular sense that the law regulating banks and trust companies and kindred corporations deals with, but insolvency in its legal sense, which exists whenever such an institution as this, from any cause, is unable to pay its debts in the ordinary or usual course of its business." In Eads v. Orcutt, 79 Mo. App. 511, the appellate court in approving the instructions given by the trial judge, said: "They, taken together, point out in unambiguous language, what constitutes insolvency, confining such condition to an inability to meet the ordinary demands against the bank in the usual and ordinary course of business. They declared that an ability to pay in the future, or an excess of assets over liabilities, without a present ability to pay debts as they become due in the usual course of business, was not solvency." In Livingstain v. Columbian Banking, etc. Co. 81 S. C. 244, 62 S. E. 249, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 445, it was held that "a bank is insolvent when from the uncertainty of being able to realize on its assets, in a reasonable time, a sufficient amount to meet its liabilities, it becomes necessary for the control of its affairs to pass out of its hands." In defining "insolvency" under the currency act, the court continued: "I know of no reason why a different meaning should be given to the word 'insolvency' as applied to banks in the currency act, from the meaning given the same word in the bankrupt act as applied to traders 'Insolvency, as used in the bankrupt act of 1867 [14 Stat. 534], when applied to traders, does not mean an absolute inability of the debtor to pay his debts at some future time, upon a settlement and winding up of his affairs, but a present inability to pay in the ordinary course of his business; or in other words, that a trader is insolvent when he cannot pay his debts in the ordinary course of his business, as men in trade usually do, and such must be the conclusion even though his inability be not so great as to compel him to stop business.' Wager v. Hall, 16 Wall. 599, [21 U. S. (L. e.) 504]. This definition of insolvency, in my judgment, is the meaning of the word in the currency act.

However, in other jurisdictions, it is held that a bank is insolvent when all of its property is insufficient to satisfy its debts: Exchange, etc. Co. v. Mudge, 6 Rob. (La.) 387 (action for rent); Kennedy v. New Orleans Sav. Inst. 36 La. Ann. 1 (action to have claims obtained by plaintiff with knowledge of defendant's insolvency and for purpose of securing preference, set off against indebtedness of former to latter). See also In re French Bank Case, 53 Cal. 495 (motion to vacate order appointing receiver); Clarke v. Ingram, 107 Ga. 565, 33 S. E. 802 (action to have conveyance made by insolvent bank declared void as being in fraud of creditors); State v. Mechanics, etc. Bank, 35 La. Ann. 562 (action for forfeiture of charter and liquidation of affairs of bank). In Exchange, etc. Co. v. Mudge, 6 Rob. (La.) 387, in holding that a bank which had voluntarily gone or had been forced into liquidation, was not as a matter of course, insolvent, the court said: "It is only when the whole amount of the capital stock of a bank, together with its assets, is insufficient to meet its liabilities, that a bank can be said to be insolvent." And in Kennedy v. New Orleans Sav. Inst. 36 La. Ann. 1, the court said: "By being in insolvent circumstances is meant that the whole property and credits are not equal in amount, at a fair appraisement, to the debts due by the party. . . . Solvency is the ability to pay one's debts. He who cannot pay all that he owes, is not solvent."

In New York, the later cases, while not distinguishing between the two meanings or applications of the word, hold that a bank is not insolvent when its assets are sufficient to satisfy all claims against it, even though it may not be able to meet the every-day demands made on it. Livingston v. New York Bank, 26 Barb. (N. Y.) 304, 5 Abb. Pr. 338; Higgins v. Worthington, 12 App. Div. 361, 42 N. Y. S. 737; People v. Oriental Bank, 124 App. Div. 741, 109 N. Y. S. 509. But in the earlier cases, the term "insolvent," as applied to banks, was used in its restricted sense. In re Empire City Bank, 10 How. Pr. 498; Ferry v. Central New York Bank, 15 How. Pr. 445; Market Nat. Bank v. Pacific Nat. Bank, 30 Hun 50 (construing U. S. statute).

STATE.

Maryland Court of Appeals—June 24, 1914.

128 Md. 373; 91 Atl. 417.

Appeal — Correction of Record.

On application to the lower court to have the record in that court corrected so as to properly state what occurred, the court below if satisfied from its own knowledge, or from the evidence adduced, that the clerk's docket entries were erroneous or incomplete, had the power and duty to have them corrected.

Same.

The action of the lower court, on an application for correction of the record and in reference to the changes requested, is final and not reviewable on appeal.

Scope of Review — Denial of New Trial.

The action of the lower court in overruling a motion for a new trial is not reviewable by the Court of Appeals.

Denial of Motion to Strike out Judgment.

The action of the lower court on a motion to strike out the judgment and sentence is reviewable by the Court of Appeals.

Criminal Law — Distinction between Felony and Misdemeanor.

Under Code Pub. Gen. Laws 1904, art. 27, § 17, providing the punishment for an assault with intent to rape, such offense is a misdemeanor, though punishable, in the discretion of the court, with death or imprisonment in the penitentiary for 20 years, and not a "felony," since the fact that a crime is punishable in the penitentiary or is infamous does not make it a felony, and is not even an "infamous crime," which depends on the character of the crime, and not upon the nature of the punishment; and hence it is not necessary that accused shall be arraigned.

Interrogation of Accused before Sentence.

It is not reversible error, even in a capital case, not to ask the prisoner if he has any reason why sentence should not be passed, unless it appears that he was or may have been injured by the omission, but the practice of inquiring any reason why sentence should not be passed is recommended in all cases in which either the death penalty or confinement in the penitentiary can be imposed.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Even if it is indispensable in capital cases to ask the prisoner if he has anything to say before sentence, error in omitting the inquiry affects only the sentence and not the verdict; and in view of Code Pub. Gen. Laws 1904, art. 5, § 81, providing that if the Court of Appeals reverses for error in the judgment or sentence itself, it shall remit the record to the court below that it may pronounce the proper judgment, and especially where a motion for new trial and to strike out a judgment and sentence have been overruled, the Court of Appeals is not required to reverse the judgment and remit that the court below may first ask the prisoner if he has anything to say and then to re-sentence him.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

When the prisoner is asked if he has anything to say before sentence is passed the proper practice is to note such inquiry in the record.

[See note at end of this case.]

Cruel and Unusual Punishment.

Under Declaration of Rights, art. 16, declaring that no law to inflict cruel and unusual penalties shall be made, and article 25, declaring that cruel or unusual punishments shall not be inflicted by the courts of law, a judgment and sentence of capital punishment for the crime of assault with intent to rape, imposed under the discretion given the court in respect to such crime by Code Pub. Gen. Laws 1904, art. 27, § 17, is not unconstitutional.

[See 8 R. C. L. tit. Criminal Law, p. 262.]

Same.

Const. U. S. amend. 8, declaring that cruel and unusual punishments shall not be inflicted, is not a restraint upon and does not apply to the legislature of a state, but only to the national legislature.

Trial — Exclusion of Public.

In determining whether any part of the public shall be excluded from the trial of a criminal case the trial court is allowed some discretion, and no exclusion should be permitted which might injuriously and improperly affect the prisoner, and under no circumstances should a trial be so conducted as to have the appearance of a star chamber proceeding; and hence the trial of a charge of assault with intent to rape, held by the court in the petit jury room instead of the courtroom, and with the consent of defendant's attorney, where it does not appear that any one whom defendant or his attorney desired to be present was excluded, is not a deprivation of defendant's rights.

[See 20 Ann. Cas. 632; 28 Am. St. Rep. 308.]

Private Examination of Witness.

Under Declaration of Rights, art. 21, providing that in all criminal prosecutions every one has the right to be confronted with the witnesses against him, the examination of the prosecutrix in a trial for assault with intent to rape by the court out of the presence of the defendant, except as he was called to the door for identification, is a deprivation of right and reversible error.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Dorchester county: STANFORD and JONES, Judges.

Criminal action. James Dutton convicted of assault with intent to rape and appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Thomas W. Simmons for appellant.

W. Calvin Trice and Edgar Allan Poe for appellee.

[375] Boyd, C. J.—The appellant was convicted of an assault with intent to rape, and was by virtue of section 17 of Article 27, Code of Public General Laws, as amended by Chapter 366 of Acts of 1908, sentenced to be hung. The record originally transmitted to this Court was defective, but on application of the appellant a writ of diminution was ordered. The appellant then applied to the lower Court to have the record in that Court corrected, so as to have what occurred properly stated. In Greff v. Fickey, 30 Md. 75, after a writ of diminution was issued by this Court, for the purpose of having [376] some alleged errors in the record corrected, a motion was made to have the docket entries in the lower Court amended and completed, but that Court overruled the motion because it was of opinion that the term having passed, and the Court of Appeals having ordered that the docket entries be returned as they actually stood upon the docket, it would be improper to grant the motion. This Court, through Bartol, C. J., said: "We think the learned judge was in error as to the purport and design of the writ, and his powers and duty in the premises. If satisfied either from his own knowledge of what had actually occurred in the progress of the cause, or from evidence adduced, that the docket entries as made by the clerk were erroneous or incomplete, it was within his power and his plain duty to have them corrected, so that a full, true and perfect transcript of the whole proceedings as they actually occurred in the progress of the cause might be set up, in obedience to the writ." That course was also approved in Hays v. Philadelphia, etc. R. Co. 99 Md. 413, 58 Atl. 439, and Koch v. Wimbrow, 111 Md. 21, 73 Atl. 896.

The lower Court accordingly very promptly and properly granted the motion of the appellant in this case, and has made certain corrections which we will insert in this opinion, so that it may be seen how the record now stands.—the action of that Court in reference to the changes requested being final and not subject to review on appeal. Greff v. Fickey, supra. By an order in writing signed by the two judges who sat below, the clerk was directed to and did make the changes, additions and corrections in the docket entries and record, so as to now read as follows:

"Plea and traverse. Whereupon the said James Dutton, traverser, cometh to the bar of the Court here in his proper person, and forthwith being demanded concerning the premises in said indictment above specified and charged upon him, how he will acquit himself thereof, he waived arraignment and he said, 'Not Guilty,' and 'Traverse before the Court,' and the said V. Calvin Trice, Esquire, State's Attorney [377] of Dorchester, aforesaid, who for the said State of Maryland in his behalf prosecuteth, doth the like.

"That the consent of the attorneys for the State and for the traverser having been first given, thereupon the trial in this case was adjourned to and held in the petit jury room, immediately adjoining the court room proper, including the taking of all testimony, and the same being taken in the presence of the Court, the Clerk with his docket and other Court officers, the said attorneys for the State and traverser, and all witnesses, but without the presence of said traverser during any part of the testimony of the chief prosecuting witness, Margaret Gillis, who testified while said traverser was in said adjoining court room, with the door of communication closed, and in custody of the Sheriff, except for the interval when said traverser was brought to said communicating door then opened, and identified by said witness, the said door being immediately thereafter closed until said witness left the stand and the traverser brought into said petit jury room to testify in his own behalf, where he then remained until the conclusion of said trial.

"The Court, having heard evidence, thereupon directed the Clerk of the Court to enter in the proceedings in said case, 'The Court finds the party guilty.'

"Sentence. Whereupon all and singular the premises being seen, and by the Court fully understood, it is thereupon considered by the Court that James Dutton, prisoner at the bar, be taken to the jail of Dorchester County from whence he came, and from thence to the place of execution," etc.

A motion for a new trial was made "short" the day the appellant was sentenced (November 14th, 1913), and on November 18th a formal motion in writing was filed. On December 23rd that motion was overruled, and on January 24th, 1914, which was during the same term of Court, a motion to strike out the judgment and sentence was made, which was overruled, and this appeal was taken to this Court. [378] That the action of the Court in overruling the motion for a new trial is not subject to review by us is too well settled to require or justify the citation of authorities, but its action on the motion to strike out the judgment and sentence is reviewable by us. The ruling on such a motion was reviewed by us in Hommer v. State, 85 Md. 562, 37 Atl. 26, and other cases which might be cited, but we are confined to what appears on the face of the record itself, and there is no bill of exceptions, agreed statement of facts, or substitute for either of them. We will consider the questions referred to in the motion, but in somewhat different order from that in which they are therein stated.

1. Objection is made that the appellant was not arraigned. An assault with intent to rob, murder or commit a rape is not a felony in this State. The punishment for those crimes is provided for in one section of the Code, and has been for many years—being now section 17 of Article 27. In Hollohan v. State, 32 Md. 399, it was said: "Robbery, murder and rape are felonies. To constitute either of these crimes, the felonious act and felonious intent must concur. An assault with intent to commit either of these crimes is not a felony, but to bring an assault within this Article and section and subject the party charged to the punishment provided, it must be charged and proved to have been committed with an intent to commit a crime, which is a felony. If the intent had been effectuated by the act, a felony would have been committed. Only because it was not effectuated, the crime sinks from the grade of a felony to that of misdemeanor." See also State v. Dent, 3 Gill & J. (Md.) 12..

The distinction made in some jurisdictions that crimes punishable by death or confinement in the penitentiary are felonies, and others misdemeanors has never existed in this State, but here only those are felonies which were such at common law, or have been so declared by statute. The fact that a crime is punishable in the penitentiary or is "infamous" does not make it a felony in this State. It was said in State v. Bixler, 62 Md. 360: "The General Court of this [379] State in 2 H. & McH. 378, Clarke v. Hall, defined 'infamous crime' to be one which rises at least to 'the grade of felony.' This is, however, too narrow, for perjury is a misdemeanor, but by all authority is 'infamous.'" On the same page it is also said: "There are many misdemeanors punishable by confinement in the penitentiary, which clearly are not 'infamous crimes' within the meaning of the common law or of the Constitution. If, for example, the prisoner has been convicted of any of the assaults with intent, mentioned and punished by the Code, and had been sentenced to the penitentiary and served his time out there, without being pardoned by the Governor, he would not be chargeable with having committed 'an infamous crime.'" In Garitee v. Bond, 102 Md. 379, 5 Am. Cas. 915, 62 Atl. 631, 111 Am. St. Rep. 385. Judge Schmucker, in delivering the opinion of the Court, referred to the case of Ex p. Wilson, 114 U. S. 422, 5 S. Ct. 935, 29 U. S. (L. ed.) 89, where the Supreme Court held that the provision in the United States Constitution which prohibits prosecution for "a capital or other infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury" must be considered not merely from the standpoint of the character of the crime, but also from the nature of the consequences to the accused, if he should be found guilty, and went on to say: "But even in Wilson's case it was held that at common law prior to the Declaration of Independence 'it was already established law that the infamy which disqualified a convict to be a witness depended upon the character of his crime and not upon the nature of his punishment.'" Again it was there said: "The authorities generally, though not with entire uniformity, hold that the infamous nature of a crime was determined at common law by the character of the act itself, and not by the penalty inflicted for its commission," and after referring at length to State v. Bixler, supra, it was distinctly held that the crime considered in Garitee v. Bond could not be regarded as infamous merely because it was punishable at the discretion of the Court in the penitentiary.

[380] So whatever may be the law elsewhere, it is clear that an assault with an intent to commit a rape is not a felony and is not even an "infamous crime" as that term is understood in this State. It is not now and never has been so far as we are aware customary or necessary to arraign one accused of a misdemeanor—even though if convicted he could or must be punished by confinement in the penitentiary. The Legislature in authorizing the Court, in its discretion, to impose the death penalty or confinement in the penitentiary for not less than two nor more than twenty years on one convicted of the crime of assault with intent to commit a rape, did not declare it to be a felony, and in our judgment did not make it such by providing for the death penalty in the discretion of the Court. In Gibson v. State, 54 Md. 447, the first count charged that the accused "feloniously, wilfully and maliciously did set fire to and burn a certain barn," etc. One ground for a motion in arrest of the judgment was "Because the jury have found him guilty of a felony and the offense committed is only a misdemeanor by the laws of Maryland." In the course of the opinion it was said: "The argument of the Attorney-General, that the offense charged in the first count is legally a felony, because the common law attached the character of felony to all offenses punishable by death, however well founded according to the English authorities, does not apply to offenses where the punishment of death is in the discretion of the Court, and this Court having decided, in Black v. State, 2 Md. 376, that such offenses are misdemeanors, we are not disposed to disturb that decision." In Salfner v. State, 84 Md. 299, 35 Atl. 885. Chief Judge McSherry said: "It is unnecessary that a party accused of a misdemeanor should be arraigned; but it is indispensable that a plea should be entered to the indictment or that the record should show he waived a plea."

So without deeming it necessary to further discuss this branch of the case, or to refer to authorities out of the State as to when the accused must be arraigned, we hold that it [381] was not necessary to arraign the appellant, and there was no error in not doing so, and hence the effect of a waiver of arraignment becomes immaterial.

2. The reason alleged that the defendant never, either in person or by his attorney, pleaded the plea of "Not Guilty" which appears in the docket entries—it having been entered without the order or authority of the defendant or his attorney, and without his having been called upon to plead,—is not sustained by the record. We have quoted above what the record states on that subject, and as it shows that he did plead "Not Guilty," and as there is nothing in conflict with that statement, it is unnecessary to further discuss the question.

3. Another reason assigned in support of the motion is that sentence of death was pronounced against the defendant without first asking him if he had anything to say. The authorities are not entirely uniform on the subject, although it may be admitted that the greater number of them hold that at least in capital cases the accused should be asked if he had anything to say why sentence should not be pronounced. The question has not heretofore been passed on by this Court, and we have no statute on the subject, as many States have. There can be no doubt that most of the reasons originally given for the adoption of that practice are not applicable in this State. In the first place the prisoner is not only allowed counsel, but the Courts always appoint counsel to defend those who are unable to employ them, in capital cases. Again, the rules of Courts generally fix the time within which a motion for a new trial or motion in arrest of judgment can be filed, and in the absence of such rules, the time allowed at common law is applicable. Even if sentence should be passed before the expiration of such time, without having given the prisoner an opportunity to then speak, such a motion would be afterwards entertained if made within the time allowed. In Heiskell v. Rollins, 81 Md. 397, 32 Atl. 249, a judgment was entered by the clerk in a civil case the day the verdict was rendered, and on the same day a motion for a [382] new trial was filed. We dismissed the appeal without prejudice, in order that the appellant could take steps to have the entry of judgment which was improperly entered stricken out and a final judgment then entered from which an appeal could be taken. The case was here on a second appeal, as reported in 82 Md. 14. Such a practice being adopted in a civil case, the Court would be all the more careful to see that a prisoner under the sentence of death did not suffer by reason of a premature judgment and sentence.

Then under our practice a motion can be made to strike out the judgment and sentence at any time during the term, as was done in this case. It would be practically impossible for the prisoner to suffer from this omission because he desired to present a pardon. If a pardon had been granted by the Governor before sentence, it is impossible to conceive of a case under our system and practice, in which the Court could fail to be informed of it, because of the omission to ask the prisoner whether he had anything to say. So we might look to the various reasons originally given for this practice, without finding a substantial one under existing conditions for setting aside a judgment and sentence in a criminal case because of the omission of this inquiry.

The decisions of the various Courts which hold that omission to be reversible error differ as to the effect of such an error, but even if we were inclined to hold that it was indispensable in capital cases to ask the prisoner if he had anything to say, we would not hesitate to hold that the error would only affect the sentence and would not affect the verdict. In State v. Hoyt, 47 Conn. 518, 36 Am. Rep. 89, one of a number of reasons given by that Court for declining to hold it to be necessary, was that it would only affect the sentence and the weight of authority is to that effect. But in this State we have a statute (Sec. 81 of Art. 5 of Code) which provides that if this Court shall reverse a judgment for error in the judgment or sentence itself, it shall be then the duty of this Court to "remit" the record to the Court below, in order that it may pronounce the proper judgment. In this case a [383] motion for a new trial was made and overruled, as was the motion now under consideration, and it would seem peculiar, to speak mildly, if the rules of practice required us to reverse the judgment and send it back to the same Court which passed the sentence in order that it might first ask the prisoner if he had anything to say and then re-sentence him.

Inasmuch as we will reverse the judgment for another reason, and order a new trial, it is perhaps unnecessary to discuss this point at such length, but as it was fully argued and thoroughly considered by us, we concluded to state our views on the subject. We are of the opinion that it is not reversible error, even in capital cases, not to ask the prisoner if he has any reason to give why sentence should not be passed, unless it is apparent that the prisoner was or may have been injured by the omission. But we do strongly recommend and advise that the practice be followed in all cases in which either the death penalty or confinement in penitentiary can be imposed. In capital cases the practice, so far as we are aware, has been followed throughout this State, and in most of the Circuits in all penitentiary cases. In Givens v. State, 76 Md. 485, 25 Atl. 689, Judge Briscoe said: "In Com. v. Roby, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 514, the Court said, that the constant practice of the Commonwealth should be observed and followed unless good reason can be assigned for the change. The forms adopted in a criminal trial are of importance, inasmuch as they have a strong tendency by their solemnity, to impress upon all who are engaged in it, the interesting and highly responsible nature and character of the duties which devolve on them respectively."

No more responsible duty can rest upon an officer of the law than the exercise of the discretion vested in the judges of this State in reference to this and some other crimes, by which they are called upon to determine whether a convict shall be sentenced to death or be imprisoned in the penitentiary. It is an exceedingly unpleasant duty in any case to impose the death penalty, and before exercising the discretion, every Judge should be glad to have all the information [334] he can properly consider. It may be possible that something can be said before sentence which might influence the Court in the exercise of its discretion, and, as we have already indicated, if it be apparent that such was or might have been the case, and the prisoner had not had an opportunity to be heard, we would feel called upon to remand the case in order that he might be re-sentenced, after the inquiry was made of him. Moreover, if the proceedings are conducted with the solemnity with which they should be when a sentence of death is about to be imposed, the prisoner may say something which will make his case a warning to others, even if his remarks are not of service to himself. So although we would not reverse a judgment unless we could see that the prisoner was or may have been injured by the omission, we repeat that in our judgment the practice, which we supposed was always followed in capital cases in this State, of making the inquiry, should be adopted in all cases in which the death penalty may be imposed, and ordinarily in all other cases in which the defendants may be confined in the penitentiary.

It may be well to add that when it is done the proper practice is to have the fact so noted in the record. In this case, we are not satisfied that any injury was done the appellant, by the omission to make the inquiry, and at any rate, as the judgment itself will be reversed, there is no occasion to remand the case for a new sentence. It will not be out of place to conclude the discussion of this branch of the case by referring to 19 Enc. of Pl. & Pr. 458, where it is said, "there seems to be a growing tendency, even where capital punishment is inflicted, to dispense with this ceremony, or at least to consider it not essential, on the ground that the reasons for its existence are not applicable at the present day."

4. It is also alleged that the judgment and sentence in this case impose a cruel and unusual punishment, and also that the sentence imposed is out of proportion to the crime charged in the indictment, and too severe a penalty for said crime. [385] The facts proven in the case are not presented by the record, but we cannot hold that the penalty authorized by the statute to be imposed for such a crime is in violation of the Constitutional provisions. Article 16 of the Declaration of Rights of our present Constitution declares that "No law to inflict cruel and unusual pains and penalties ought to be made in any case or at any time hereafter," and Article 25 is, "That excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel or unusual punishment inflicted by the Courts of law." It would hardly be contended that the punishment provided by our statute for the crime of rape—death or confinement in the penitentiary for not less than eighteen months, or more than twenty-one years—is in conflict with those provisions, and when the Legislature changed the penalty, for an attempt to commit the crime, to death or confinement in the penitentiary, in the discretion of the Court, it is probable that it took into consideration, the fact that it is often difficult to prove whether the crime of rape was actually consummated. Under some circumstances the outrage upon the particular woman and upon society can scarcely be said to be less because the prisoner did not succeed in accomplishing his purpose than if he had. If a revolting crime of this nature is so frequently repeated as in the judgment of the Legislature to call for such punishment, we cannot declare it to be contrary to such provisions of the constitution. It is said in Foot v. State, 59 Md. 269: "For the prevention of crime, which is the true end of all punishment, the law giver may properly consider the frequent and easy opportunities of committing the crime and the difficulty of guarding against it, and may grade his punishment accordingly." In passing it may be said that in that case the Court referred to the fact that "The eighth amendment to the Constitution of the United States is not a restraint upon, and does not apply to, the Legislature of a State, but only to the National Legislature, and, therefore, has no application to this case. Pervear v. Massachusetts, 5 Wall. 470, 18 U. S. (L. ed.) 608." In Mitchell v. State, 82 Md. 527, 34 Atl. 246, the traverser was convicted [386] of an attempt to carnally know and abuse a woman child under the age of 14 years, that being a common law offense and not covered by our statute. He was sentenced to imprisonment in the city jail for fifteen years, and it was contended that it was contrary to the Declaration of Rights, but this Court in considering the case said: "Our law inflicts pain, not in a spirit of vengeance, but to promote the essential purposes of public justice. Severity is not cruelty. The punishment ought to bear a due proportion to the offense. Crimes of great atrocity ought to be visited with such penalties as would check, if not prevent, their commission." Again on page 534 the Court said: "If the punishment is grossly and inordinately disproportionate to the offense, so that the sentence is evidently dictated not by a sense of public duty, but by passion, prejudice, ill-will, or any other unworthy motive, the judgment ought to be reversed, and the cause remanded for a more just sentence. But no such instance of judicial misconduct has ever occurred in our good old State, and we trust that the day may never come when it will be witnessed. When the discretion which the law confers is exercised with a sedate and conscientious judgment under the influence of a love of public justice, and a desire to promote it, the Judge is acting in the legitimate discharge of his duty and his sentence is not subject to reversal." So without further discussing this subject, no ground for reversal for the reason now being considered is shown by the record.

5. This brings us to the action of the lower Court for which we reversed the judgment by a per curiam order heretofore filed. The quotation above shows how the case was conducted, and that the witnesses for the prosecution were examined out of the presence of the prisoner. Article 21 of the Declaration of Rights provides, "That in all criminal prosecutions every man hath a right to be informed of the accusation against him; to have a copy of the indictment or charge in due time (if required) to prepare for his defense; to be allowed counsel; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have process for his witnesses; to examine the witnesses [387] for and against him on oath; and to a speedy trial by an impartial jury, without whose unanimous consent he ought not to be found guilty." In determining whether any part of the public should be excluded from the trial of a criminal case, some discretion must be allowed the trial Court. Under no circumstances should a trial be so conducted as to have the appearance of a Star Chamber proceeding, but cases sometimes occur which have a demoralizing influence on the spectators and to some extent on the community. It has always, so far as we are aware, been the practice in this State to exclude minors in such cases, and if women are not excluded they are often at least warned that the character of testimony will be such as to make it undesirable for them to be present. Of course no exclusion should be permitted which might injuriously and improperly affect the prisoner, but there may be cases where the prosecuting witness can be protected without doing the prisoner any harm. To require a refined, virtuous woman to relate the facts of a felonious assault upon her in the presence of a large audience inflicts a great punishment on her; and oftentimes does the accused more injury than if she were examined under other circumstances, for she may get in such a distressing condition as to improperly arouse the sympathies of the jury and possibly to cause counsel for the prisoner to refrain from a cross-examination which might have helped his client. The testimony of an outraged woman is calculated to create a bitterness against the accused amongst the audience, the effect of which is sometimes difficult to keep from the jury, as spectators may by their looks or manner even unconsciously betray their bitterness of feeling. The danger is that the horror of the crime may cause the hearers too readily to connect the accused with the commission of it. It is undoubtedly oftentimes better for the accused to have the trial conducted with less publicity than cases ordinarily are, and in a case such as this we are not prepared to say that the rights of the appellant were violated by having the trial in the petit jury room, instead of the Court room. The case was tried before the [388] Court, which, under our Constitution, the accused has the right to elect instead of a jury, and while the record does not show how many persons were in the room, it is not suggested that any one whom the prisoner or his counsel desired to be present was excluded. It does show that the trial was held there with the consent of the attorney for the traverser and no objection was made to it being held there instead of in the Court room. We can see no reason why the prisoner or his attorney for him could not agree to have the case tried where it was. We are aware that under some decisions, in other jurisdictions, that might not be allowed, but there is nothing in our Constitution or statutes to prohibit it, and we are satisfied that it may be in the interest of justice and for the good of the community to permit the trial Court to hear a case of this character outside of the hearing of the general public, provided there are enough persons present to secure protection to the accused against any possible advantage being taken of him or injury done to him, and that it is done with his consent or that of his attorney under such circumstances as show his consent. The general rule is thus stated in Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, side page 312: "It is also requisite that the trial be public. By this is not meant that every person who sees fit shall in all cases be permitted to attend criminal trials; because there are many cases where, from the character of the charge, and the nature of the evidence by which it is to be supported, the motives to attend the trial on the part of portions of the community would be of the worst character, and where a regard to public morals and public decency would require that at least the young be excluded from hearing and witnessing the evidences of human depravity which the trial must necessarily bring to light. The requirement of a public trial is for the benefit of the accused; that the public may see he is fairly dealt with and not unjustly condemned, and that the presence of interested spectators may keep his triers keenly alive to a sense of their responsibility, and to the importance of their functions; and the requirement is fairly met with, if, without [389] partiality or favoritism, a reasonable proportion of the public is suffered to attend, notwithstanding that those persons whose presence could be of no service to the accused, and who would only be drawn thither by a prurient curiosity, are excluded altogether."

But we are of the opinion that there was error in taking the testimony out of the presence of the appellant. Whether or not that could be expressly waived by the accused himself is unnecessary to determine, as the record does not show that it was. He had the constitutional right to be confronted by the witnesses, and although his attorney must have known that he was not present and may, so far as he could, have consented to let the traverser remain in the Court room while the witnesses were being examined, we are of opinion that that could not bind the appellant. It is quite possible that one on trial may be able to make valuable suggestions to his attorney during the examination of witnesses,—particularly the prosecuting witness in a case of this kind,—as it matters not how well an attorney may have prepared for the trial of a case, it is impossible for him to anticipate all that may be said, or to know all the details a witness on the opposite side will testify to. It might be that in the course of her examination in the presence of the accused the prosecuting witness would discover that she had made a mistake in the identity of the party committing the crime. Other reasons suggest themselves to show the importance of the accused being present, but it has so far as we are aware been the uniform practice throughout the State to require the presence of the accused in capital cases during the examination of witnesses, and this is the first instance which has been brought to the attention of any of us where that practice has been departed from. We have no doubt that the lower Court was induced by the best of motives to adopt the course it did, but we cannot hesitate to hold that it committed a grave error in permitting the testimony to be taken—especially that of the chief prosecuting witness,—out of the presence of the [390] accused. In Johns v. State, 55 Md. 360, Judge Alvey in considering an objection to the introduction of the Comptroller's Certificate, said: "It is only where the prosecution is to be maintained by the testimony of living witnesses that they are required to be produced in Court, confronted with the accused, and deliver their testimony under the sanction of an oath, and be subject to cross-examination. In other words, no witness shall give his testimony in secret or out of the presence of the accused; and no party shall be put upon his trial upon mere hearsay evidence; but the witness shall be produced, and be subject to all the tests that the law has devised for the full disclosure of the truth."

We do not overlook the fact that the crime of which the appellant is accused is a misdemeanor, but while that is true, he was liable to be sentenced to death, if convicted, as he in fact was, and he was entitled to the full protection of this constitutional provision. That he had the right to be confronted with the witnesses cannot be denied, and, if it be conceded, that he could waive that right, the record does not show that he did, and in our judgment his counsel could not waive it so as to bind him. It is too important a right for this Court to permit it to be waived by implication, by counsel, or by anything short of an express waiver by the prisoner, even if that is to be permitted, which need not be determined in this case.

For the error referred to the judgment was reversed by the per curiam order heretofore filed.

Misdemeanor, 99.

In Capital Case.

The holding of the reported case to the effect that it is not reversible error to fail to ask a person convicted of a capital offense whether he has anything to say before sentence, finds support in a number of decisions. State v. Hoyt, 47 Conn. 518, 36 Am. Rep. 89; Sarah v. State, 28 Ga. 576; Warner v. State, 56 N. J. L. 686, 29 Atl. 505, 44 Am. St. Rep. 415; State v. Johnson, 67 N. C. 55; Kinsler v. Territory, 1 Wyo. 112. The courts which take this position proceed on the theory that there is no longer any good reason for the observance of the common-law custom of making such an inquiry, which is known as the "allocutus" or "allocution." Thus in State v. Hoyt, supra, the court said: "Anciently in England a person on trial for a felony was not allowed counsel. The presiding judge in theory was his counsel, but did not represent the accused in the sense that counsel do with us. If therefore the judge omitted anything which was the right or privilege of the accused, it was considered the act of the court, which could in no wise prejudice the prisoner, and the rights of the latter could not be waived as may now be done. If we compare the rules and practice that obtained in England with our own it will readily be suggested that the reasons that made the inquiry of the prisoner so essential do not apply at all in this state. Here the accused has always had counsel to represent him, vigilant to guard every right and claim every privilege deemed essential to his deliverance. The counsel well know that the verdict does not include the prisoner—they know all the remedies for ulterior relief and when and how they must be instituted. They are present when the prisoner, on motion of the Attorney for the State, is set at the bar to receive his sentence. They know that the court is open to hear any request, motion or objection, and that if the accused desires to say anything the court will grant him the privilege if he or they should so indicate. Under our practice what possible harm can be occasioned to the prisoner by such an omission on the part of the court? He can have no pardon to plead, for that can only come from the legislature after sentence, no attainer to save, no benefit of clergy to pray for." So in Warner v. State, 56 N. J. L. 686, 29 Atl. 505, 44 Am. St. Rep. 415, it was said: "Under the conditions of affairs existing in this state, however, the reason for the form has entirely disappeared. The defendant is represented by counsel who needs no invitation to interpose any legal objection at any stage of the proceedings. Counsel know the occasion when it is proper to assert the right of the defendant, and so the query of the court, whether regarded as an instruction to the defendant as to his rights, or as an in-

On the other hand there are numerous cases which take the opposite view and hold that a person convicted of a capital offense should be asked whether he has anything to say why judgment should not be pronounced, and that a failure so to inquire is reversible error. Rex v. Geary, 2 Salk. (Eng.) 630; Rex v. Speke, 3 Salk. (Eng.) 358, 3 Mod. 265; Ball v. U. S. 140 U. S. 118, 11 S. Ct. 761, 35 U. S. (L. ed.) 377; Keech v. State, 15 Fla. 591; State v. Jennings, 24 Kan. 642 (statute); State v. Ikenor, 107 La. 480, 32 So. 74; James v. State, 45 Miss. 572; Dodge v. People, 4 Neb. 220 (statute); Territory v. Herrera, 11 N. M. 129, 66 Pac. 523, overruling Territory v. Webb, 2 N. Mex. 147; Graham v. People, 63 Barb. (N. Y.) 468; Messner v. People, 45 N. Y. 1; People v. Faber, 199 N. Y. 256, 20 Ann. Cas. 879, 92 N. E. 674 (statute); People v. Nesce, 201 N. Y. 111, 94 N. E. 655; Hamilton v. Com. 16 Pa. St. 129, 55 Am. Dec. 485; McCue v. Com. 78 Pa. St. 185, 21 Am. Rep. 7; Com. v. Preston, 188 Pa. St. 429, 41 Atl. 534; State v. Trezevant, 20 S. C. 363, 47 Am. Rep. 840; State v. Jefcoat, 20 S. C. 383.

But as the error, if it is such, occurs after the trial is ended and affects only the sentence, it has been held, in every case in which the matter has been discussed that the proper procedure where the inquiry has not been made is to reverse the judgment as to the sentence only and to send the case back to the trial court for the purpose of having the question propounded and the sentence re-imposed, provided no reason is given for not imposing a sentence. Keech v. State, 15 Fla. 591; State v. Jennings, 24 Kan. 642; James v. State, 45 Miss. 572; Dodge v. People, 4 Neb. 220; Territory v. Herrera, 66 Pac. 523, overruling Territory v. Webb, 2 N. M. 147; People v. Nesce, 201 N. Y. 111, 94 N. E. 655 (modifying Messner v. People, 45 N. Y. 1); McCue v. Com. 78 Pa. St. 185, 21 Am. Rep. 7; Com. v. Preston, 188 Pa. St. 429, 41 Atl. 534; State v. Trezeant, 20 S. C. 363, 47 Am. Rep. 840; State v. Jefcoat, 20 S. C. 383. See also Keffer v. State, 12 Wyo. 49, 73 Pac. 556. And see the reported case. In People v. Nesce, supra, the court said: "The right of a defendant to speak for himself, after conviction in capital cases, is one of substance and should be carefully guarded. It is the last opportunity that the law affords him of speaking for himself and showing cause, if he is able to do so, why judgment should not be pronounced against him. This right, given by the common law and now incorporated into our statute, compels the courts to accord him the privilege and no court has the right to deprive him of it. The trial, however, terminates with the verdict of the jury.

The statute then steps in and gives the defendant two days' time to determine whether further legal proceedings should be taken in arrest of judgment, unless it should be the last day of the term of court, or he consents to waive the statutory time. . . . The error which was committed in the passing of judgment occurred after the trial and the verdict of the jury. We, therefore, are of opinion that, under the increased powers of this court given by the legislature, it no longer becomes necessary to grant a new trial for errors of this character and that all of the rights of the defendant may be fully protected by a reversal of the judgment and a remitting of the case to the Supreme Court to proceed upon the verdict in accordance with the requirements of the law."

Where it appears by the record that the court "after hearing the defendant" proceeded to pronounce sentence of death it will be assumed that the accused was accorded an opportunity to state why sentence ought not to be pronounced. Edwards v. State, 47 Miss. 581.

It has been held that where an accused person made, and the court heard, motions for a new trial, and in arrest of judgment, and these were the only modes by which a reason could be shown why sentence should not be pronounced, it was held that an opportunity to be heard before sentence was given as a stereotyped question was not necessary. State v. Cheney, Man. Unrep. Cas. (La.) 394.

It has been held that the record in a capital case must show that the question was asked. James v. State, 45 Miss. 572; Measner v. People, 45 N. Y. 1; Dougherty v. Com. 69 Pa. St. 286; McCue v. Com. 78 Pa. St. 185, 21 Am. Rep. 7; Com. v. Preston, 188 Pa. St. 429, 41 Atl. 534. But in Aaron v. State, 39 Ala. 684, it was held that a presumption will arise that the question was asked where the record is silent on the subject.

In Schwab v. Berggren, 143 U. S. 442, 12 S. Ct. 525, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 218, it appeared that, on appeal, the judgment of a trial court, where in a sentence of death had been pronounced, was affirmed and that a new day had been fixed for the execution of the defendant, as the day originally fixed had passed. The prisoner was not asked when this new day was named, whether he had anything to say why the sentence should not be pronounced against him, and it was contended that this was error. It was held that the rule of the common law which required the inquiry to be made applied only to the court of original jurisdiction which pronounced the sentence, and not to an appellate court which, on review of the proceedings of the trial court, merely affirmed the final judgment and did not render a new judgment.

Ann. Cas. 1916C.—7.

In Case Other than Capital.

FELONY.

By the great weight of authority, it is held not to be necessary on conviction of a felony other than a capital offense, to inquire of the defendant whether he has anything to say why judgment shall not be pronounced against him.

Oregon.—State v. Sally, 41 Ore. 366, 70 Pac. 396.

Tennessee.—State v. Henry, 6 Baxt. (Tenn.) 539.

The courts which hold this view justify it on the ground that the propounding of such an inquiry is a mere form which can be omitted under modern court practice without depriving a prisoner of any substantial right. Thus in Jeffries v. Com. 12 Allen (Mass.) 145, the court said: "The seventh error assigned is, that there is a total omission on the record of the allocutus, or demand of the defendant 'what he has to say why judgment should not proceed against him.' The attempt to avoid a judgment by a writ of error for such omission is novel in this commonwealth, and is so strongly urged as to require of us a full consideration. As to the practice of propounding such a question, as well as the introduction of the names of the jurors in an indictment, and other forms of proceedings in conducting criminal trials, we must be governed by our own well settled rules, rather than by those of the English courts, or those of the states that have followed the English precedents. No such recital on the record has been deemed necessary here, nor has such fact usually been stated, except in capital trials. We do not understand that in felonies not capital any formal question corresponding to that stated is required to be put to the defendant upon his conviction by the jury and before sentence. Practically, full opportunity is to be given for assigning reasons why judgment should not proceed against him, and the opportunity is secured by the course of proceedings in each case. Sentence is not pronounced until the party has had ample opportunity to move for a new trial for any proper cause, and to file his exceptions to the rulings in matters of law, or a motion in arrest of judgment. . . . Independently of any practice of our own in this matter, the recitals on this record do show all that can be necessary. They establish the fact either of such demand, or a waiver of it, as the defendant did attempt to show cause why judgment should not proceed against him. He moved the court for a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was against the evidence and against law. He filed successively a motion in arrest of judgment for alleged insufficiency of the indictment, and a bill of exceptions, and upon all these was fully heard." And in People v. Palmer, 105 Mich. 568, 63 N. W. 656, it was said: "Ten days after the conviction, the respondent was brought into court, and sentenced. The record does not show that the respondent was asked what he had to say why judgment should not be pronounced upon him, and for this reason it is urged that the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial ordered. The respondent's counsel was present, and made no objection to the proceeding. There had been ample time to move for a new trial or an arrest of judgment. This was never regarded as essential except in capital cases. . . . Whatever good purpose this practice may have served in England when parties charged with crime were not allowed counsel, it is now a mere idle ceremony." The case of People v. McGeery, 6 Park Crim. (N. Y.) 653, which held that the propounding of the question was not necessary in any case not capital has been made nugatory by statute. See Code Crim. Pro. § 480.

It was held in Territory v. Watanabe Masagi, 16 Hawaii 196, that as no ruling was made by a trial court as to whether the defendants should be asked whether they had anything to say why sentence should not be pronounced, the subject could not be considered on appeal where the only exception taken was to the judgment and no grounds therefor were stated in the bill.

In Ex p. Salge, 1 Nev. 449, it appeared that a prisoner, before sentence, was asked "whether he had any legal cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced." It was held that the omission of the words "on him" was immaterial.

However, in some jurisdictions, it has been held that where the crime for which an accused is to be sentenced is a felony other than a capital offense, it is reversible error not to ask the defendant if he has anything to say before sentence shall be pronounced. Perry v. State, 43 Ala. 21; Crim v. State, 43 Ala. 53; Mullen v. State, 45 Ala. 43, 6 Am. Rep. 691; Crocker v. State, 47 Ala. 53; Bryant v. State (Ala.) 68 So. 704; Dougherty v. Com. 69 Pa. St. 286. See also Aaron v. State, 39 Ala. 684; Wright v. State, 103 Ala. 95, 15 So. 506. So far as the cases which hold it to be reversible error not to propound the inquiry to an accused discuss the subject, they decide that the error affects the sentence only and that where it appears that the defendant has not been interrogated the case shall be sent back to the trial court and sentence re-imposed after the inquiry has been made, provided the defendant's answer does not disclose a good reason why he should not be sentenced. Bryant v. State (Ala.) 68 So. 704. See also Spigner v. State, 58 Ala. 421.

In Nebraska a statute provides that "before sentence is pronounced the defendant must be informed by the court of the verdict of the jury and asked whether he has anything to say why judgment should not be pronounced against him." This provision has been held to be mandatory and a failure to comply therewith will result in a reversal of the judgment and a remanding of the case for the rendition of a valid judgment. McCormick v. State, 66 Neb. 337, 92 N. W. 606. See also Tracey v. State, 46 Neb. 361, 64 N. W. 1069. In the case first cited, the court said: "While we may question the wisdom of such a statute or doubt that its requirements serve any useful purpose in criminal procedure as conducted in the present age, yet the statute remains to be followed to its provisions, the mandatory character of which cannot be questioned. If the reason for the statute has passed away and become obsolete, and it no longer serves any beneficial purpose, it is for the legislature and not the court to abrogate it. The error in passing judgment on the defendant having occurred subsequent to the verdict of the jury on which the judgment was rendered, the same must be reversed and the cause remanded for the rendition of a valid judgment."

In Missouri one section of a statute provides that a defendant must be asked whether he has any legal cause to show why judgment shall not be pronounced against him, and the next succeeding section declares that the first section shall be deemed directory merely if a defendant has been heard on a motion for a new trial or in arrest of judgment in cases of felony, and in all cases where the crime charged is a misdemeanor, and that the failure to put the inquiry to a prisoner under such circumstances shall not invalidate the judgment or sentence of the court. It has been held in cases of felony that where the provisions of the statute have been complied with as to hearing a motion for a new trial or in arrest of judgment, there is no ground to remand a cause in order to have a prisoner sentenced against, where it appears that he was sentenced without being inquired of as provided for in the statute. State v. Nagel, 136 Mo. 45, 37 S. W. 821; State v. Kanupka, 247 Mo. 706, 153 S. W. 1056. If however, it appears that the question has not been asked, and a prisoner has not been heard on a motion for a new trial or in arrest of judgment, the cause will be remanded with directions to the trial court to bring the defendant into court and to pronounce judgment in accordance with the law. State v. Kile, 231 Mo. 59, 132 S. W. 230. In the early case of State v. Ball, 27 Mo. 324, wherein no allusion was made to a statute on the subject, it was held that the omission to ask a defendant whether he had anything to say before sentence, was unimportant in a case not capital in nature.

Where a statute provides that before sentence a defendant must be asked whether he has anything to say why judgment shall not be pronounced against him, it has been held that where the record in a prosecution for gaming is silent as to whether the inquiry has been made and there is no bill of exceptions showing an omission of the statutory duty, it will not be presumed that there was such an omission, when the matter is not essential to a complete record. Carper v. State, 27 Ohio St. 572. And where the record shows that after the verdict was brought in the prisoner made a motion in arrest of judgment and another for a new trial, which motions were overruled by the court, it will be presumed that the question was in substance propounded to him. Spigner v. State, 58 Ala. 421.

Where it is not required that a sentence shall show that before it was pronounced a statute requiring the asking of a defendant whether he had anything to say why sentence should not be pronounced against him, has been complied with; and it does not appear that the prisoner has been refused the privilege of the question and the right to answer it in a legal manner, it will be presumed that the trial court has obeyed the directions of the law in pronouncing the sentence. Johnson v. State, 14 Tex. App. 306.

It has been held that conduct amounting to a waiver of the statutory right of a defendant to have the question asked was shown where it appeared that the prisoner and her counsel agreed that, to save time, she should be sentenced immediately after a plea of guilty. Hill v. State, 9 Okla. Crim. 629, 132 Pac. 950.

In State v. Ross, 32 La. Ann. 854, it was held that a prisoner had no right to complain because the clerk of the court instead of the judge put the question.

In Reynolds v. State, 68 Ala. 502, it appeared that a defendant who had been convicted of manslaughter was sentenced without having been inquired of as to whether, he had anything to say why judgment should not be pronounced against him. This irregularity was pointed out to the court and the prisoner was recalled to the bar and sentenced again. It was held that he had no right to complain of such a proceeding, which although irregular, infringed none of his rights.

In California a statute provides that in felony cases the defendant "must be informed by the court, or by the clerk under his direction, of the nature of the charge against him, and of his plea, and the verdict, if any, thereon, and must be asked whether he has any legal cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced against him." It has been held that these provisions are mandatory and must be complied with substantially, and where it appears that such a procedure was not carried out, although the minutes of the trial erroneously state to the contrary, orders denying motion to vacate the judgment and to correct the minutes will be reversed and the cause remanded with directions to the trial court to arraign the defendant again for judgment. People v. Walker, 132 Cal. 137, 64 Pac. 133.

MISDEMEANOR.

The law is settled that in misdemeanor cases there is no need of asking a defendant before sentence whether he has any legal cause to show why judgment shall not be pronounced against him. Turner v. U. S. 66 Fed. 289, 30 U. S. App. 104, 13 C. C. A. 445; Hancock v. Rogers, 140 Ga. 688, 79 S. E. 558. State v. Lund, 51 Kan. 1, 32 Pac. 657.

Where a statute declares that a defendant must be asked, before sentence, whether, he has any legal cause to show why judgment shall not be passed against him, and it is further provided that in misdemeanor cases a failure to comply with such a law "shall not invalidate the judgment or sentence of the court" it has been held that on a conviction for the misdemeanor of selling intoxicating liquor unlawfully it is not necessary to make the statutory inquiry of the prisoner. State v. Clinkenbeard, 232 Mo. 539, 134 S. W. 537.

And where a statute provides that a defendant must be asked whether he has any legal cause to show why judgment shall not be pronounced against him, and also that in a conviction for misdemeanor judgment may be pronounced in his absence, it has been held that a failure to ask one who has been convicted of a misdemeanor whether he has any legal cause to show why judgment shall not be pronounced against him, is not reversible error. People v. Kaminsky, 208 N. Y. 389, 102 N. E. 515, affirming judgment 137 App. Div. 941, 122 N. Y. S. 687.

It has been held that in a trial for a misdemeanor the record need not show that a defendant has been asked if he has any legal cause to show why judgment shall not be pronounced against him. State v. Stieffe, 13 Ia. 603.

TANNER

v.

SINALOA LAND AND FRUIT COMPANY.

Utah Supreme Court—May 8, 1913.

43 Utah 14; 134 Pac. 536.

Partnership — Power of Partner to Bind Firm.

Where two of three partners, engaged in forming a corporation, to take over land on which they had an option, assure purchasers of interests therein that the partnership will attend to the detail work and bear the expense of forming a corporation to take over the land, such agreement is within the scope of the firm business and is binding upon the third partner.

[See 12 Am. St. Rep. 304.]

Corporations — Liability on Contracts of Promoters.

Where plaintiff, one of three partners engaged in selling interests in a tract of land on which they had an option and in organizing a corporation to take over such land, prepared the articles of incorporation without any promise that he would be paid therefor or without any assumption of liability therefor by the directors, which service was more in the interests of the partnership than of the corporation, he must be assumed to have rendered such services in pursuance of a representation by his partners that the incorporation would be without expense to purchasers, so that he cannot recover therefor against the corporation; since, while a corporation may adopt the contracts of its promoters, especially those necessary to effect its creation, promoters cannot, in the absence of any adoption of their acts, bind the corporation by their contracts made before it was incorporated.

[See note at end of this case.]

Corporate Employees — Right to Compensation for Extra Services.

Plaintiff, while drawing a salary of $100 per month as general manager of a corporation which he with others had organized to take over land on which they had an option, is not entitled to compensation for his services in preparing or copying a contract for use by the corporation, since these services are such as a business manager is ordinarily expected to perform for his company.

[See 7 R. C. L. tit. Corporations, p. 464; 136 Am. St. Rep. 922.]

Appeal from District Court, Salt Lake county: RITCHIE, Judge.

Action by H. S. Tanner, plaintiff, against Sinaloa Land and Fruit Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. REVERSED.

[15] H. S. Tanner, plaintiff herein, and two other parties, C. D. Harding and J. M. Barlow owned and held an option on [16] a tract of land containing 4,338 acres situate in the State of Sinaloa, Republic of Mexico. These parties, preparatory to forming a corporation to take over the land at a price that would insure them a profit of more than $13,000 on the deal, solicited and procured purchasers each of whom purchased a small equitable interest in the option referred to in the bill of exceptions as "acre interests." At the time these various parties subscribed for and purchased interests in the option, they, in connection with the promoters Tanner, Harding, and Barlow, signed a written agreement referred to in the bill of exceptions as the "subscription list" which, so far as material here, is as follows:

"It is understood and agreed that said 4,338 acres of land represents 4,338 undivided acre parts, and that each undivided acre part free from incumbrance shall cost the subscriber $5.50, 50 per cent. of said amount to be paid upon demand and the balance to be paid in 60 days from date of this agreement. The undersigned hereby agrees that upon the completion of the subscription to the above acre parts a corporation shall be organized to receive and hold title to the above said land, also to develop or sell said land for the benefit of these subscribers. It is further understood that upon the completion of above said subscription a meeting of the subscribers shall be called to elect the officers of the corporation and determine the purposes of the organization and the general nature of the business to be transacted."

In July, 1908, a corporation, defendant herein, was organized. Each subscriber to the foregoing agreement thereby became an titled to have issued to him shares of the capital stock of the corporation in lieu of the interests purchased by him in the land mentioned. H. S. Tanner, plaintiff, was sworn as a witness and testified in part as follows:

"There were in the neighborhood of 50 subscribers (for acre interests in the land). . . . The land was turned over at $5.50 an acre. The compensation received by Mr. (H. S.) Tanner, Harding, and Barlow was $3 per acre. We sold the land to the company (corporation) at a flat acreage rate. We were responsible for the turning over of [17] the land to the company, and the company was responsible to us for $5.50 per acre."

The amount of the individual subscriptions for interests in the option varied from 10 to 300 "acre interests." Plaintiff retained 300 acre interests for himself, and when the corporation was formed he was made a director and also president of the company. Plaintiff, a short time after the incorporation of the company, was made its general manager. It appears that plaintiff, who is an attorney at law, assisted in preparing and drafting the articles of incorporation under and in pursuance of which the company became incorporated. Regarding the circumstances under which the articles of incorporation were prepared and drafted, plaintiff testified in part as follows:

"I don't know who it was that suggested that I prepare the articles, but it was suggested at the first meeting that I prepare them. . . . Submitted them to Mr. Jones (defendant's counsel herein), who was interested, to see if they suited him; and there were one or two provisions that he suggested some changes in; and also to Mr. Shipp (a stockholder in the corporation), . . . and he suggested some changes. I think Mr. Kimball likely made some suggestions. . . . Then I talked over these different provisions with various members, that is, the contemplated members of the company—the stockholders—to get their views . . . to see if the articles I had prepared met their views. And I drafted the articles some two or three times, and worked out the provisions in detail of different articles before they were finally acceptable to all concerned."

A short time after the company was organized and office rooms secured for the transaction of its business, plaintiff made out a bill of $250 against the company for legal services performed in preparing the articles of incorporation and placed the account on file with other bills of the company in the company's desk, and according to his testimony to which we shall refer later on, it was not presented to the company for more than three months thereafter. When the bill was finally presented to the company for payment, one [18] of the board of directors was absolutely opposed to paying it. The other four directors, of whom plaintiff was one, neither allowed nor rejected the claim, and its consideration was postponed from time to time, and finally it was rejected by the board of directors and payment refused on the ground that it was not a proper charge against the company. The board of directors some time in August, 1908, during the time plaintiff was president, general manager and a director, adopted for use by the corporation in its business a certain contract which it copied from a form of contract that seems to have been in general use in the section of the country in which the company was carrying on its operations and doing business. This contract was designated in the bill of exceptions as "guaranteed harvest certificates." For services rendered in preparing this contract plaintiff charged the corporation $50. He did not present this claim to the company for payment until a short time before the commencement of this action. The company refused to pay the bill or any part thereof. Plaintiff, on cross-examination, testified concerning that transaction in part as follows:

"Q. Now, isn't it a fact that Shipp and Kimball (two of the directors, one of whom, Shipp, was an attorney at law) did more in the preparation of these harvest share certificates than you did? A. So far as the certificates are concerned, they did the supervision of them. I simply did the legal work. . . . Q. Didn't you in fact think out, shape up, and form this harvest share certificate? A. No, sir; I did not. They used a general form of that from some other company. I do not remember now which it was taken from. . . . I made no claim to the conception of the form of that draft or printing, whatever you call it, on that contract. It was the legal work. . . . Q. As a matter of fact, Mr. Tanner, didn't you substantially copy, or cause to be copied, the form almost verbatim of the Mexican Rubber Company for this certificate? A. I rather think so. Q. Well, I put in your hand this blank form of Mexican Rubber Company's harvest share certificate and ask you to examine it and see whether the face of the contracts are not the same with a difference of the names. A. [19] It is practically the same. . . . Q. You were in the employ of this company—the defendant corporation—for a few months shortly after its organization and drew a salary as its manager, did you not? A. In the fall succeeding its organization I was manager and drew a salary of $100 a month as manager of the company for three months. Q. Did you ever make the presentation of either of these claims (referring to the claim for preparing the articles of incorporation and copying the contract mentioned) to the directors while you were manager and drew that salary? A. I did not. . . . Q. But no one ever promised to pay it (claim for preparing articles of incorporation), did they? A. No, sir."

Harding and Barlow, who were associated with Tanner in promoting the land deal, were called as witnesses for defendant and testified that it was expressly agreed between them and Tanner that no charges should be made against the prospective stockholders or the company when incorporated for any services rendered by them or either of them in organizing the corporation. And much evidence was introduced tending to show that plaintiff had but little, if anything, to do with the copying and the adoption by the corporation of the guaranteed harvest share certificates. This evidence was, in general terms, denied by plaintiff. The evidence, however, without conflict, does show that, after plaintiff, Harding, Kimball, Shipp, Jones and other prospective stockholders had decided upon the draft or form of the articles of incorporation, N. V. Jones employed at his own expense a Miss Dansie to copy (typewrite) them.

Some time in June, 1909, N. V. Jones succeeded Tanner as president and general manager of the company. The company, on or about November 1, 1911, levied an assessment of four dollars per share on its outstanding capital stock. This (the company's fourth assessment) was made payable December 6, 1911. Plaintiff owned 101 shares of stock. His assessment was therefore $404. He made a demand on the company that his claims for legal services above referred to, amounted to $350, with interest thereon from August, 1908, be allowed, and that the same be paid by giving him credit. [20] for that amount on the assessment made on his stock. This the company refused to do, whereupon plaintiff commenced this action. Before the cause was tried plaintiff's stock was advertised, sold, and bought in by the company for the assessment. Plaintiff thereupon filed a supplemental complaint setting forth the facts leading up to and which culminated in the sale of his stock as above stated. The relief prayed for in his complaint is "that it be ascertained, decreed, and determined that the defendant, at the time this action was commenced, was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $444, and that the plaintiff is entitled to have so much thereof as is necessary credited against any demand the defendant may have against the plaintiff on account of the assessment levied on the capital stock, . . . and the said pretended sale of the said stock by the defendant . . . be set aside, and that plaintiff's title to said stock be declared and adjudged good and valid."

The court, so far as material here, found that plaintiff prepared "the articles of incorporation of defendant company, . . . and that said service was reasonably worth the sum of $250," and that he prepared the "guaranteed harvest certificate," and that "said service was reasonably worth the sum of $50." As a conclusion of law the court found "that plaintiff is entitled to judgment against the defendant for $380.13 to be credited and offset against the defendant's demand of $405.40 against the plaintiff." Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff in accordance with the prayer of his complaint and the foregoing conclusion of law. Defendant appeals.

N. V. Jones for appellant.

D. D. Houtz for respondent.

McCARTY, C. J. (after stating the facts).

—Counsel for appellant contends with much earnestness that the judgment is not only unsupported by, but is contrary to, the evidence, and that it is against law. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to respondent, they wholly fail to establish any legal liability on the part of the corporation for the services which he claims that he rendered it in preparing the articles of incorporation and the contracts mentioned in the foregoing statement of facts. We will first consider the [21] merits of the claim of respondent for $250 for services which he claims he rendered the corporation in preparing the articles of incorporation. The record shows that, after respondent Harding and Barlow obtained the option on the land mentioned in the above statement of facts, they, the three promoters, formed a partnership for the purpose of disposing of the option in small interests to prospective purchasers; each of the three partners retaining a small interest therein. Harding and Barlow did most of the soliciting for purchasers in their business ventures, and they represented to the parties whom they solicited and induced to purchase interests in the land covered by the option that the partnership, comprising Tanner, Harding, and Marlow, would attend to the incorporation of the company, and that each purchaser "would receive his stock without any additional expense." On this point, Harding testified: "The stockholders looked to the partnership to have the company incorporated. Q. How do you know they did? A. We represented it that way. Q. Who did? A. Mr. Barlow represented it." Mr. Barlow testified, in part, as follows: "I will further state that we so informed the members on that point; at least I did, and I am satisfied Mr. Harding did, because we worked together a great deal." And again he said: "I will state further that we so told these subscribers that they should secure their stock without any further expense."

It thus appears that at least two of the three members of the partnership agreed with a considerable number of the subscribers for interests in the land covered by the option that the partnership would attend to the detail work and bear the expense of forming a corporation to take over the land mentioned. This agreement being within the scope of the partnership business, Tanner, respondent, was bound thereby; he being a member of the partnership in whose interest the agreement was made. Respondent, in answer to the following question. "You three (Tanner, Harding, and Barlow), wasn't it a part of your plan and scheme to incorporate so as to turn the land over to the company and [22] thereby make your profit?" said, "That is what we did." While respondent testified that he prepared the articles of incorporation at the request of some of the subscribers, parties who had purchased interests in the land covered by the option, and with the expectation of being paid a reasonable fee for his services, he nevertheless admitted that no one promised him that he would be paid for the work. Nor is there any evidence tending to show that the board of directors, by resolution or otherwise, assumed the payment of the obligation, if it can, under the circumstances, be called an obligation. There is a conflict in the authorities regarding the circumstances under which a corporation is or may become liable for contracts entered into by its promoters before the corporation comes into existence. Some courts have held that services rendered in the drawing and filing of the articles of incorporation and the expenses necessarily incurred in its creation are proper charges against a corporation, provided the services were rendered and the expenses incurred with the understanding and expectation that they would be paid for by the company when incorporated. Low v. Connecticut, etc. R. Co. 45 N. H. 370; Farmers' Bank v. Smith, 105 Ky. 816, 49 S. W. 810, 88 Am. St. Rep. 341; Freeman Imp. Co. v. Osborn, 14 Colo. App. 488, 60 Pac. 730.

It has also been held that, in order to bind a corporation by contracts made in its behalf before it comes into existence, the making of such contracts must be authorized by at least a majority of the promoters. Bell's Gap R. Co. v. Christy, 79 Pa. St. 54, 21 Am. Rep. 39; Tift v. Quaker City Nat. Bank, 141 Pa. St. 550, 21 Atl. 660.

The great weight of authority, however, holds that parties who undertake to organize a corporation cannot bind the corporation by their contracts and agreements made before the company is incorporated. The authorities, however, practically all agree that a corporation may by corporate action adopt the contracts of its promoters, especially those that were necessary to effect its creation. In Cook on Corporations, section 707, the author says:

[23] "Great difficulty has arisen in determining whether a corporation is liable on contracts made in its behalf by its promoters before the incorporation took place. The decided weight of authority holds that the corporation is not bound thereby. Any other rule would be dangerous in the extreme, inasmuch as promoters are proverbially profuse in their promises, and, if the corporation were to be bound by them, it would be subject to many unknown, unjust, and heavy expenses. The only protection of the stockholders, and of subsequent corporate creditors, against such a result lies in the rule that the corporation is not bound by the contracts of its promoters. The rule is just and should not be weakened. . . . It is entirely legal, however, for the corporation to ratify, confirm, or adopt the contracts of its promoters. A promoter's contract may be adopted by the corporation in any way in which a contract may be made by the corporation."

In 10 Cyc. 262, 263, the rule is stated as follows:

"Those who undertake to organize a corporation are not in any sense its agents before it comes into existence. They cannot affect it by their declarations or representations, or bind it by their engagements made in its behalf; but after coming into existence the corporation may make their engagements its own by express agreement or by ratification; and this ratification or adoption may be by express corporate action or by any of the other modes by which corporations may ratify or adopt the unauthorized or officious acts of others made in their behalf, as where the corporation voluntarily accepts the benefits accruing to it from the engagement of its promoters, after full knowledge, and having full liberty to decline the same."

In 1 Cl. & Mar. Pri. Corps. section 101a, it is said:

"Since a corporation has no existence, and cannot have an agent, until it has been created or organized, to such an extent, at least, as to become a corporation de facto, it necessarily follows that until then it cannot engage in business or enter into a contract. Its promoters are not its agents, and cannot contract for it. A corporation, therefore, when it has been organized, and has thus acquired corporate existence, is not liable upon a contract made by its promoters, or by agents appointed by them, before its organization, even though the contract may have been made in its name and with the understanding that it would perform the same, unless it has expressly or impliedly ratified or adopted the same since its organization, or unless liability is imposed upon it by its charter or by some other statute. It can make no difference in the application of this principle that the promoters who made the contract are the [24] only stockholders or members of the corporation; for the corporation, as we have seen, is a legal entity and artificial person distinct from its stockholders or members as individuals."

In Tuttle v. George A. Tuttle Co. 101 Me. 287, 64 Atl. 496, 8 Ann. Cas. 260, this rule, which is a wholesome one and which rests upon sound legal principles, is tersely stated in the following language:

"A corporation is not liable in the absence of ratification or adoption or of a charter or statutory provision imposing liability, for the salary of a superintendent or other person for services performed for it before its organization under a contract made by its promoters, although the contract may have been made on its behalf and with the understanding that it should be bound, and although the promoters who made it have become its stockholders and officers."

This doctrine was recognized and followed by this court in the case of Wall v. Niagara Min. etc. Co. 20 Utah 474, 59 Pac. 399. See, also, Long v. Citizens' Bank, 8 Utah 104, 29 Pac. 878; Schreyer v. Turner Flouring Mills Co. 29 Ore. 1, 43 Pac. 719; Sullivan v. Detroit, etc. R. Co. 135 Mich. 661, 98 N. W. 756, 64 L.R.A. 673, 106 Am. St. Rep. 403; Rockford, etc. R. Co. v. Sage, 65 Ill. 328, 16 Am. Rep. 587.

We invite attention to a somewhat elaborate discussion of the subject found in a note to Tuttle v. Tuttle, supra, reported in 8 Ann. Cas. 262, where the leading English and many American cases are cited in which the doctrine as announced in Tuttle v. Tuttle is upheld. The annotators in their discussion of the question say:

"Prior to its existence a corporation can have no agents or representatives, and it would be impossible for a promoter to bind the corporation by contracts made prior to its incorporation. The courts of law have uniformly held that a corporation is not bound to perform a contract entered into by its promoters on its behalf and in contemplation of its organization. And the corporation afterwards formed will not be held liable in law on such contracts, unless there can be shown some intervening circumstances occurring subsequently to the incorporation that would impose the liability. . . . While a contract entered into between the promoters of a proposed corporation and third parties has no binding effect upon the corporation thereafter formed, yet it usually lies within the power of the corporation to adopt the contract and thereby to make, in effect, a new contract with such third parties."

[25] Applying the foregoing principle of law to the facts in this case viewed in the light most favorable to the respondent, it necessarily follows that he cannot recover from appellant for services rendered in preparing the articles of incorporation. Moreover, the record affirmatively shows that there was no agreement whatever to the effect that the corporation should pay respondent for those services. And it further clearly appears that the purpose of these three promoters, respondent, Harding, and Barlow, in organizing the corporation, was, primarily, to create a purchaser for the land covered by their option. From the sale of this land to the corporation the partnership expected to and did in fact realize a profit of more than $13,000. Therefore what these parties did towards organizing a corporation was more in the interest of the partnership than it was in the interest of the prospective stockholders. In other words, the creating of the corporation, so far as they were concerned, was merely carrying out the scheme of the partnership by which it intended to and in fact did dispose of the land mentioned. And the undisputed evidence shows that in furtherance of this scheme respondent's copartners, Harding and Barlow, as an inducement to others to subscribe and pay for interests in the land covered by the option, promised these prospective stockholders that when the corporation was organized they should receive their pro rata of shares of the capital stock without cost other than the price paid for the respective interests. Therefore whatever service were rendered by respondent in organizing the corporation must be deemed to have been rendered in pursuance of that agreement, and under no rule of law can the services be held to be a proper charge against the corporation.

We are also of the opinion that respondent's claim for services rendered in the copying or having copied the "guaranteed harvest certificates" is as groundless as his claim for services rendered in the drawing up of the articles of incorporation. As we have pointed out in the foregoing statement of facts, the services rendered by him in preparing the certificates were rendered during the time he was president and general manager of the company. And [26] the evidence shows that during the time he was drawing a salary of $100 per month as general manager of the company at least a portion of the services was rendered. Furthermore, his own evidence, which we have set forth in the statement of facts, shows that about all respondent did in the preparation of the certificates was to see to it that copies were made from a form furnished by him by two of the directors. On direct examination respondent testified on this point as follows:

"I prepared these contracts; that is, the legal part of them. Mr. Kimball and Shipp prepared the form of the paper."

It thus clearly appears from his own testimony that the services were of the character that a business manager would ordinarily be expected to perform for his company.

The judgment is reversed. The admitted facts in this case absolutely preclude respondent from recovering anything from the corporation for the services alleged in the complaint or any part thereof. The trial court is therefore directed to dismiss the action. Cost to appellant.

NOTE.

Liability of Corporation to Third Parties on Contracts of Its Promoters.

Introductory, 105.

At Law, 105.

In Equity, 106.

Adoption of Contract by Corporation, 106.

Liability Imposed by Charter, 109.

Introductory.

It is the purpose of this note to discuss the recent cases involving the liability of a corporation to third persons on the contracts of its promoters. The earlier cases are collected in the notes to Tuttle v. George A. Tuttle Co. 8 Ann. Cas. 260, and Moore, etc. Hardware Co. v. Towers Hardware Co. 13 Am. St. Rep. 23.

At Law.

At law a corporation is not liable to third persons on the contracts of its promoters entered into in its behalf. Previous to incorporation, as it has no existence, it can have no representatives and cannot be bound. The occurrence of some intervening circumstance after incorporation is necessary to impose liability.

Thus in Peek v. Steinberg, 163 Cal. 127, 124 Pac. 834, the court said: "It is quite apparent that the judgment against The Greater City Lumber Company cannot be sustained. The Corporation was not a party to the agreement, and the writing, on its face, did not assume to bind any one but the three individuals who executed it. The concluding words of the paper indicate that the signers contemplated that a further contract, between Peek and the corporation, should be made. But it is not alleged that this provision was carried out." And in Cushion Heel Shoe Co. v. Hartt, 181 Ind. 167, 103 N. E. 1063, it was said: "It is certain that, under ordinary circumstances, a corporation cannot be sued successfully on a contract made for its benefit by its projectors before its incorporation. Contracts of this character, however, are not void but voidable and it is well settled in nearly all jurisdictions that in so far as they are not ultra vires, such contracts may become binding on the corporation if ratified by it, either expressly or by implication, after its organization." So in Quinn v. American Bankers' Assur. Co. 183 Mo. App. 8, 165 S. W. 823, the court said: "The rule is, that although the corporation can incur no liability until it has an existence—that is, until the breath of corporate life is infused into it—for that, until then it may have no authorized agent to enter into contracts, it may nevertheless subsequently, when the organization is complete, adopt obligations created for its benefit by the promoters." Likewise in Sumner-May Hardware Co. v. Scally, 66 Fla. 93, 62 So. 900, it was said: "The settled general rule is that contracts made for a corporation by its promoters prior to its creation are not enforceable by or against the corporation after its organization." But in Strause v. Richmond Woodworking Co. 109 Va. 724, 65 S. E. 659, 132 Am. St. Rep. 937, wherein the evidence consisted of oral statements and correspondence tending to show the intentions of the contracting parties as to the liability for supplies furnished to a corporation, the trial court gave an instruction to the jury directing their attention to the written evidence only, ignoring the oral testimony and authorizing a verdict on this evidence. Holding the giving of that instruction to be reversible error, the appellate court said: "Upon the soundest reasoning, the tendency of the courts in recent years is to an adherence to the doctrine, that those dealing with promoters should be left with the double security of the promoter and the company when one is formed, unless it clearly appears that the liability of the promoter was not intended, or that it was intended to be released when the liability of the corporation began."

In Equity.

In equity the courts refuse to enforce against a corporation a contract made on its behalf by its promoters, unless there appears to be some sound equitable reason demanding its enforcement. Bloom v. Home Ins. Agency, 91 Ark. 367, 121 S. W. 293; Bobzin v. Gould Balance Valve Co. 140 Ia. 744, 118 N. W. 40; Pond v. Atlantic Terra Cotta Co. 137 App. Div. 671, 122 N. Y. S. 425; Weathersby v. Texas, etc. Lumber Co. (Tex.) 146 S. W. 243, 180 S. W. 735. See also Hawkeye Gold Dredging Co. v. State Bank, 157 Fed. 253; In re Lance Lumber Co. 224 Fed. 598; Mantle v. Jack Waite Min. Co. 24 Idaho 613, 135 Pac. 854, affirmed on rehearing 24 Idaho 639, 136 Pac. 1130; Swarthmore Lumber Co. v. Parks, 72 W. Va. 625, 79 S. E. 723. Thus in Bond v. Atlantic Terra Cotta Co. 137 App. Div. 671, 122 N. Y. S. 425, the court said: "The law is well settled that the promoters could make no contract for the corporation and that it came into existence unfettered by any contract obligations, and could become bound by said agreement only by subsequent acts of its board of directors or officers within the apparent scope of their duties by ratifying or accepting or adopting it."

Adoption of Contract by Corporation.

A contract entered into between the promoters of a proposed corporation and third persons is not binding on the corporation thereafter formed, but it usually lies within the power of the corporation to adopt the contract and thereby make, in effect, a new contract with such persons. Bloom v. Home Insurance Agency, 91 Ark. 367, 121 S. W. 293; Peek v. Steinberg, 163 Cal. 127, 124 Pac. 834; McCally v. Blue Ribbon Gum Co. 173 Ill. App. 66; Van Noy v. Central Union F. Ins. Co. 168 Mo. App. 297, 153 S. W. 1090; Quinn v. American Bankers' Assur. Co. 183 Mo. App. 8, 165 S. W. 823; Stilwell v. Spokane Alarm Co. 66 Wash. 703, 120 Pac. 85. And see the reported case. See also Rideout v. National Homestead Assoc. 14 Cal. App. 349, 112 Pac. 192; Mitchell v. Gifford, 133 Ga. 823, 67 S. E. 197; Henry Gold Min. Co. v. Henry, 25 Idaho 333, 137 Pac. 523; Marshalltown First Bank v. Church Federation, 129 Ia. 268, 105 N. W. 578; Teeple v. Hawkeye Gold Dredging Co. 137 Ia. 206, 114 N. W. 906; Richard Brown, etc. Contracting Co. v. Bambrick Bros. Const. Co. 150 Mo. App. 505, 131 S. W. 134; American Home L. Ins. Co. v. Jerkins (Tex.) 138 S. W. 424. Thus in McCally v. Blue Ribbon Gum Co. 173 Ill. App. 66, it appeared that the plaintiff, an attorney at law, brought suit for money paid out and services rendered at the request of two promoters. It was shown by the minutes of the corporation that at the first meeting of directors, held four days before the company was authorized to do business, the secretary by a vote was instructed to "draw an order on the treasurer for the payment of all bills for expense of incorporating, for the sale of certificates of stock and records incidental thereto." Following this was a statement, not dated, signed by the full board of directors, that "the above and foregoing minutes are hereby ratified, affirmed and approved." The court said: "The foregoing facts are sufficient to evidence the adoption and assumption by the company of the indebtedness due plaintiff, and the judgment is therefore affirmed."

The English and Canadian rule is that a contract made by a promoter with third persons cannot be adopted by the corporation after its creation, but that the corporation must enter into a new and original contract in order to be bound. Kelner v. Baxter, L. R. 2 C. P. 174; North Sydney Invest. etc. Co. v. Higgins [1899] A. C. 263. See also Thomson v. Feeley, 41 U. C. Q. B. 229; Crane v. Lavoie, 22 Manitoba L. Rep. 330, 4 Dominion L. Rep. 175, 21 West. L. Rep. 313. Thus in Kelner v. Baxter, L. R. 2 C. P. 174, Erle, C. J., said: "I agree that if the Gravesend Royal Alexandra Hotel Company had been an existing company at this time, the persons who signed the agreement would have signed as agents of the company. But as there was no company in existence at the time, the agreement would be wholly inoperative unless it were held to be binding on the defendants personally. The cases referred to in the course of the argument fully bear out the proposition that, where a contract is signed by one who professes to be signing 'as agent,' but who has no principal existing at the time, and the contract would be altogether inoperative unless binding upon the person who signed it, he is bound thereby: and a stranger cannot by a subsequent ratification relieve him from that responsibility. When the company came afterwards into existence it was a totally new creature, having rights and obligations from that time, but not rights or obligations by reason of anything which might have been done before. It was once, indeed, thought that an inchoate liability might be incurred on behalf of a proposed company, which would become binding on it when subsequently formed: but that notion was manifestly contrary to the principles upon which the law of contract is founded. There must be two parties to a contract; and the rights and obligations which it creates cannot be transferred by one of them to a third person who was not in a condition to be bound by it at the time it was made." And in North Sydney Invest. etc. Co. v. Higgins [1899] A. C. 263, the court said that it did "not think that the adoption and confirmation by directors of a contract made before the formation of the company by persons purporting to act on behalf of the company creates any contractual relation whatever between the company and the other party to the contract, or imposes any obligation whatever on the company towards that party."

An express ratification was held to be necessary in Cushion Heel Shoe Co. v. Hartt, 181 Ind. 167, 103 N. E. 1063, wherein it was contended that the corporation was bound on an implied contract by an acceptance of the benefits of the services rendered. The court said: "We believe that the better reason and the weight of authority support the holding that, in the absence of statutory or charter provisions, a corporation will be held liable for services rendered by its promoters before incorporation only when, by express action taken after it has become a legal entity, it recognizes or affirms such claim." However, in Van Noy v. Central Union F. Ins. Co. 168 Mo. App. 287, 153 S. W. 1090, the court said: "After becoming a legal entity the corporation has the option of repudiating contracts for its benefit made by its promoters and the exercise of such option may be manifested as well by the acceptance and retention of the benefits of such contract as by an express formal ratification." And in the case of In re Quality Shoe Shop, 212 Fed. 321, it appeared that a promoter, already engaged in the sale of shoes, intending that the corporation should take over his business entered into a lease for the premises occupied on behalf of the corporation. Holding that the lease was impliedly ratified by the corporation, the court said: "The lease was never formally assigned to the corporation, and the corporation never accepted it by any formal official action. But neither of these steps was essential. The substance and reality of this family transaction appear to be plain enough. When Cohen signed the lease, he was acting as promoter and agent of a corporation then on the point of being formed, and (while he may have bound himself also by the execution of the lease) I have no doubt that he intended to bind the corporation, and I find as a fact that he was acting in its behalf. That the corporation could ratify this previously unauthorized act done for its benefit is a proposition that needs no citation of authority to support it; and that such ratification might be proved by the company's conduct as completely as by a formal corporate act is I think equally plain." See to the same effect, Central Trust Co. v. Lappe, 216 Pa. St. 549, 65 Atl. 1111.

Where a contract is made by promoters, in behalf of and for the benefit of a corporation to be formed thereafter, and the corporation after its organization, with full knowledge of all the facts, enters into the enjoyment of the contract or receives the benefits accruing thereunder, it will be held liable as on an original contract. The corporation cannot accept and retain the benefits of the contracts of its promoters without taking on itself the burdens and liabilities thereof. Hawkeye Gold Dredging Co. v. State Bank, 157 Fed. 253; In re Ballou, 215 Fed. 810; Mantle v. Jack Waite Min. Co. 24 Idaho 613, 135 Pac. 854, affirmed on rehearing 24 Idaho 639, 136 Pac. 1130; Maryland Apartment House Co. v. Glenn, 108 Md. 377, 70 Atl. 216; Bobzin v. Gould Balance Valve Co. 140 Ia. 744, 118 N. W. 40; Van Noy v. Central Union F. Ins. Co. 168 Mo. App. 287, 153 S. W. 1090; Pearshall v. Tennessee Cent. R. Co. 2 Tenn. Ch. App. 682. See also Jones v. Allert, 161 Cal. 234, 118 Pac. 794; Exline-Reimers Co. v.

Lone Star Ins. Co. (Tex.) 171 S. W. 1060. Compare Cushion Heel Shoe Co. v. Hartt, 181 Ind. 167, 103 N. E. 1063. Thus in Hawkeye Gold Dredging Co. v. State Bank, 157 Fed. 253, the court held that where promoters have purchased property before incorporation, on a transfer and acceptance by the corporation of the property, it must pay the purchase price, when by its articles of incorporation it has the authority to incur and pay the liabilities for property so acquired. And in the case of In re Ballou, 215 Fed. 810, the court said tersely: "If a corporation after it is organized adopts such a contract, it is bound thereby and, if it accepts the benefits of the contract, it thereby adopts it." So in Van Noy v. Central Union F. Ins. Co. 168 Mo. App. 287, 153 S. W. 1090, the court said: "Defendant became a corporate entity for the purpose of entering into contracts for the sale of its capital stock on April 2, 1910, when it received its first certificate . . . and in accepting the benefits of the contracts its promoters had procured from plaintiff, it adopted those contracts as its own and took them with all their burdens and infirmities." Likewise in Kline v. Royal Ins. Co. 192 Fed. 378, it was said: "In the case at bar the corporation certainly ratified the contract on December 16, 1908, when Kline's accounts were passed. Moreover, even if, as president and manager of the company, Kline could not virtute officii take out insurance, the corporation ratified the policies by inaction after the corporation was formed, for they were in the corporation's possession. It is of no consequence, however, to determine when the ratification occurred at the earliest, for it certainly occurred before any fire." In Bradshaw v. Jones (Tex.) 152 S. W. 695, it appeared that the plaintiff's services, contracted for by promoters, were actually rendered for the corporation after its inception. The court held that the plaintiff had a right of action against the corporation and not against the promoters. So in Girard v. Case Bros. Cutlery Co. 225 Pa. St. 327, 74 Atl. 201, it appeared that the plaintiff entered into the service of a corporation and so continued for some time in pursuance of a contract made with the promoter. The court said that the contract "would be binding upon the present corporation unless it was renounced and disapproved by its directors." And it was held that there was "no evidence in the case that the new corporation took any official action expressing its disapproval of the contract made between the plaintiff and the promoters."

In Marshalltown First Nat. Bank v. Church Federation, 129 Ia. 208, 105 N. W. 578, it appeared that a promoter contracted with a third person to pay him a commission for the procurement of members to the organization contemplated. The court said: "The association could not ratify an agreement which it was prohibited from originally making. It was organized under chapter 9 of the title 9 of the Code, and section 1833 provides that 'such associations shall not employ paid agents in soliciting and procuring members, except in the organization or building up of subordinate bodies or granting members inducements to procure new members.' . . . He undertook to do something which the statute prohibited the association from employing him to do, and for this reason, the contract to compensate him was ultra vires, and therefore not subject to ratification." In Exline-Reimers Co. v. Lone Star L. Ins. Co. (Tex.) 171 S. W. 1060, it appeared that after the charter of a corporation was filed the incorporators attempted to assign it to a promoter. He thereafter selected a board of directors, who in turn selected officers, one of whom accepted certain material necessary to the conduct of the business and promised that the corporation would pay for it. In affirming a judgment for the corporation, the court said that there was nothing in the act under which it was created, which would by reasonable deduction or inference authorize the incorporators by simple assignment of the charter to confer on others even the authority conferred on them, much less authorize their assignee to do that which the state denied the original incorporators the right to do; and that without in the least restricting the authority conferred on the incorporators, it was clear that their authority, after the charter was approved, was to do the things specified by the act; i. e., sell stock, invest same, call a meeting of the stockholders, and to do any and all other incidental or necessary things thereto or reasonably to be inferred. Compare Bobzin v. Gould Balance Valve Co. 140 Ia. 744, 118 N. W. 40.

However, in Rideout v. National Homestead Assoc. 14 Cal. App. 349, 112 Pac. 192, it was said: "It is incumbent upon a party claiming a resulting benefit to show actual ratification, or some affirmative act from which it may be inferred. Ratification will not be presumed, even when the corporation has received benefits, unless actual knowledge of the specific contract out of which the benefits arose is made to appear . . . and the same knowledge is essential in considering the question of estoppel." In Teepie v. Hawkeye Gold Dredging Co. 137 Ia. 206, 114 N. W. 906, the court said: "Assuming that ratification may be implied from an acceptance and retention of the proceeds or benefits of such a contract, still two things in addition to the fact that the benefits of the contract came into the hands of the company are essential to be proven—the ratification must be by the officer or governing body having authority to make or enter into such a contract, and the ratification must be upon full knowledge."

Liability Imposed by Charter.

In Hawkeye Gold Dredging Co. v. State Bank, 157 Fed. 253, wherein it appeared that the articles of incorporation, binding when executed, provided for the assumption of liabilities incurred before incorporation, the corporation was held to be liable to pay for property acquired by its promoters of which it had accepted a transfer.

REIRDEN

v.

STEPHENSON ET AL.

Vermont Supreme Court—February 6, 1914.

87 Vt. 430; 89 Atl. 465.

Partnership — Power of Partner to Bind Firm.

A partner may bind the firm when acting therefor within the scope of the partnership business.

[See 12 Am. St. Rep. 304.]

Power of Majority of Partners.

In case of a diversity of opinion regarding the internal affairs of a partnership, partnerships act by a majority, and such a majority, when acting in good faith and within the scope of the partnership business, binds the firm.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A majority of the members of a partnership engaged in manufacturing butter tubs which had sold its plant and most of its personal property, but which still had some personal property and some debts due it, and which so far as appeared had not gone out of business, have implied authority to employ a person to examine the books and affairs of the partnership and ascertain its financial standing and to fix his compensation either before or after the work is completed.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In an action against a partnership by a person employed by a majority of the members to examine its books and affairs and ascertain its financial standing, where, though it appeared that it had sold most of its property, there was no finding that it had gone out of business, or that the firm was not to continue, this cannot be assumed in order to hold a judgment for plaintiff erroneous on the ground that such members of the firm had no authority to bind it.

[See note at end of this case.]

Exceptions from Orleans County Court: STANTON, Judge.

Action on account stated. W. W. Reirden, plaintiff, and Stephenson, et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants allege exceptions. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Fred S. Wright for defendants.

W. W. Reirden for plaintiff.

[431] POWERS, C. J.—The action is general assumpsit on an account stated. The defendants were partners in the manufacture of butter packages. Stephenson had but little to do with the affairs of the firm; Valley worked for the firm as a laborer, and knew but little regarding its business affairs; Wright kept the books and seems to have been the business man of the concern. About March 1, 1910, the firm sold its plant and most of its personal property. Some personal property and some debts due the firm remained as assets of the partnership. In May of the same year, Stephenson and Valley, acting for the partnership, employed the plaintiff to examine the books and affairs of the partnership and ascertain its financial standing. Both represented to the plaintiff that they were acting for the partnership, and the plaintiff understood that his engagement was for and in behalf of the firm. The court below did not find that Wright specifically agreed to the plaintiff's employment, but did find that he knew that the work was being done by the plaintiff and gave some assistance therein.

After the work was completed, Stephenson and Valley agreed with the plaintiff that there was due him from the partnership for this service the sum of $200. Valley died and Stephenson went into bankruptcy before this suit was brought. Judgment below was for the plaintiff and Wright excepted.

A partner may, by force of the relation, bind his firm when acting therefor within the scope of the partnership business. It was said by this Court in Scott v. Shipherd, 3 Vt. 104, that a partner could bind his firm by a contract when the subject matter thereof is consistent with the business of the partnership. In case of a diversity of opinion regarding their internal affairs, [432] partnerships act by a majority, and such a majority, when acting in good faith and within the scope of the partnership business, binds the firm.

The case in hand comes within these rules. The business for which the plaintiff was engaged was within the scope of the firm's business. To be sure, it was not a part of the actual processes of manufacturing butter tubs, or selling personal property, or collecting outstanding bills. But it none the less pertained to the affairs of the partnership, and the contrary not appearing, we must assume that it was warranted by the exigencies of the business and beneficial thereto. It was much like the employment of extra help to take an inventory of a mercantile business. In the case of a going concern, there could not be much doubt of the character of this service. But Wright contends that this firm had gone out of business, to all intents and purposes. In this claim, he is outside the findings. For aught that appears, the firm was to continue, and the investigation contracted for required to determine the scope of its future business. We can make no assumptions to find error.

Inasmuch as Stephenson and Valley had implied authority to make the contract on behalf of the firm, we need not consider the effect of Wright's knowledge of and participation in the work.

And since they had authority to employ the plaintiff, they had authority to fix his compensation. Waite v. Windham County Mining Co. 37 Vt. 608. This they could do in advance of the work, or after it was completed. Woodworth v. Downer, 13 Vt. 522, 37 Am. Dec. 611, is not to the contrary, for there the partnership had been dissolved before the act in question, while here the partnership continued in force.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

Power of Majority of Partners to Bind Firm.

General Rule.

The act of a majority of partners in a transaction with third persons with respect to a matter within the scope of the partnership business is binding on a minority which objects thereto. Cotton Plant Oil Mill Co. v. Buckeye Cotton Oil Mill Co. 2 Ark. 271, 122 S. W. 658; Johnston v. Dutton, 27 Ala. 245; Western Stage Co. v. Walker, 2 Ia. 504, 65 Am. Dec. 789; Staples v. Sprague, 75 Me. 458; Nolan v. Lovelock, 1 Mont. 224; Kirk v. Hodgson, 3 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 400; Clarke v. Slate Valley R. Co. 136 Pa. St. 408, 20 Atl. 562, 10 L.R.A. 238. And see the reported case. See also Copp v. Longstreet, 5 Colo. App. 282, 38 Pac. 601; Steele v. Joliet First Nat. Bank, 60 Ill. 23; Matthies v. Herth, 31 Wash. 665, 72 Pac. 480. Compare Potter v. McCoy, 26 Pa. Pa. St. 458. "Whenever a partnership is formed by more than two persons, we think that, in the absence of any express provision to the contrary, there is always an implied understanding that the acts of the majority are to prevail over those of the minority, as to all matters within the scope of the common business; . . . The rule, as thus laid down, is certainly more reasonable and just, than to allow the minority to stop the operations of the concern, against the views of the majority. We do not say that it would be deemed a bona fide transaction, so as to bind the firm, if the majority choose wantonly to act without information to or consultation with the minority (Story on Part. sec. 123); but when, as in the present case, the one partner has given notice, and expressed his dissent in advance, there could be no reason or propriety in requiring him to be consulted by the other two. . . . Our conclusion is, that the act, being concurred in by two of the partners, was, under the circumstances, the act of the firm; and that the charge, asserting the proposition that the dissent of one partner against the other two would necessarily exonerate him, was properly refused." Johnston v. Dutton, 27 Ala. 245.

In Kneisley Lumber Co. v. Edward B. Stoddard Co. 181 Mo. App. 15, 109 S. W. 840, a contract made by the two active partners of a firm and not ratified by a dormant partner was held to be enforceable against the firm though it was outside the scope of the partnership business. In Johnston v. Dutton, 27 Ala. 245, a note given by a majority of the members of a firm for supplies for a sawmill operated by the partnership was held to bind the firm. In Nolan v. Lovelock, 1 Mont. 224, it was said of the power of the majority of a mining partnership to bind the firm: "It devolves upon the firm to show that they had an express agreement with each other, that one should not contract for what was useful or necessary without the express consent of the others, and that the party contracting with any member of the firm had notice of this agreement. Without this the law gives authority to each member of a mining copartnership to bind the rest for what is useful and necessary in their undertaking." In Kirk v. Hodgson, 3 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 400, it was held that the action of a majority of partners in continuing the employment of a clerk after he had overdrawn his account bound the firm. In Walker v. Yellow Poplar Lumber Co. (Ky.) 35 S. W. 272, it was held that a compromise of partnership claims made by a majority of the partners was binding on all of the members of the firm, it not appearing that there was any fraud in the transaction. In Burns v. Russell (Tex.) 146 S. W. 707, it appeared that there were three individuals associated as partners in the business of real estate brokerage. Two of the partners purchased a tract of land from a client and agreed that the vendor should not pay a commission on the sale to the firm. It was held that the agreement not to charge a commission was binding on the third partner as to the vendor. In Staples v. Sprague, 75 Me. 458, it was held that the action of a majority of partners in making a sale of the partnership property in good faith bound the firm. See also Western Stage Co. v. Walker, 2 Ia. 504, 65 Am. Dec. 789. And in Williams v. Kemper, etc. Dry Goods Co. 4 Okla. 145, 43 Pac. 1148, it was said that a deed of trust of partnership property executed by two of the three members of a firm binds the firm by force of a statute.

Exception to Rule.

A majority of the members of a firm cannot by an act which is fraudulent or for their individual benefit bind the firm as to third persons having knowledge of the facts. Brobston v. Penniman, 97 Ga. 527; 25 S. E. 350, Western Stage Co. v. Walker, 2 Ia. 504, 65 Am. Dec. 789. See also Staples v. Sprague, 75 Me. 458. In the case first cited it appeared that a partnership was entered into between the president of a bank, its cashier and a third person. The third person agreed to convey certain land to the firm and the other partners agreed to contribute a certain sum which they raised by borrowing from the bank of which they were officers on a note executed in the firm name. In an action on the note brought by the receiver of the bank against the firm it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. The court said: "We have no difficulty whatever in holding that the plaintiff was not entitled to a recovery in this case. It was the duty of Lloyd and Cunningham to raise, on their own account, the money which they had agreed to contribute to the partnership business. It is perfectly obvious that the partnership itself had no immediate concern in this matter, it not being in any sense a transaction for its benefit, but one exclusively for the benefit of the two members who contracted for the loan. The debt created by the giving of the note was not a partnership debt, and therefore, upon general principles, it should not be made liable for its payment. It was insisted, however, that as the note was executed by a member of the firm who had authority, as a partner, to make and deliver notes in the partnership name, the bank ought to be protected, because it in good faith advanced its money upon the note in ignorance of the fact that the note was not really given to raise money for the partnership, but for the private benefit of two of its members to enable them to meet their obligations to it in accordance with their agreement with Mrs. Penniman. If this proposition had any foundation in truth, the position of the plaintiff would be unanswerable; but it is perfectly clear, from the facts recited, that the truth of the matter was fully known to the bank, and therefore it does not occupy the position claimed for it. Lloyd and Cunningham represented the bank in making the loan and taking the note. Lloyd was its alter ego, and Cunningham its special agent for the purpose of negotiating loans. It was within the immediate scope of their business and authority, as the representative of the bank, to make just such transactions as the one in question; and it follows beyond doubt that whatever they actually knew with reference to this transaction while engaged in the very act of making it, must be chargeable to the bank itself." In Western Stage Co. v. Walker, 2 Ia. 504, 65 Am. Dec. 789, it was held that whether a sale of partnership property by a majority of the partners on the dissolution of a partnership, passed the interest of a dissenting partner depended on the good faith of the transaction. See also Staples v. Sprague, 75 Me. 458.

In Chapple v. Cadell, Jac. 537, 23 Rev. Rep. 138, 37 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 953, it was held that a sale of the partnership property assented to by a majority of the members of the firm did not pass title to the whole, but only to the shares of the partners assenting to the sale. It appeared in that case that the partnership agreement provided for the management of the affairs of the partnership by a committee of five. The agreement also provided that if any member of the firm desired to dispose of his share it should first be offered to the committee to be purchased for the general body of the remaining members. There were thirty-one members of the firm and the sale was made against the wishes of two of the partners.

PEOPLE

v.

PARISI.

New York Court of Appeals—January 18, 1916.

217 N. Y. 24.

Ball — Forfeiture — Necessity of Notice to Surety to Produce Principal.

Though a person bound over before a magistrate may be indicted and tried either in the county court or the supreme court, a surety on his bail bond is not entitled to a notice of the time and place at which the principal must appear as a condition precedent to a forfeiture of the bond.

Enforcement of Forfeiture — Defenses.

A surety on a forfeited bail bond cannot urge as a defense that he should have had notice of the time and place at which the principal was required to appear, as that should have been presented by a motion to relieve from the forfeiture.

Interest on Penalty.

Interest should not be allowed on the amount of the penalty of a bail bond from the date of the forfeiture of the bond.

[See note at end of this case.]

People v. Parisi, 164 N. Y. App. Div. 900, modified.

Appeal from Appellate Division of Supreme Court, Second Judicial Department.

Action to recover penalty of forfeited recognizance. State of New York, plaintiff, and Louis Parisi, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff in trial court. Judgment affirmed by Appellate Division of Supreme Court. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. MODIFIED.

Thomas C. Whitlock for appellant.

James C. Cropsey, Hersey Egginton and Ralph E. Hemstreet for respondent.

[26] HISCOCK, J.—This action was brought to recover with interest the penalty of a forfeited recognizance.

One Sullivan was held by a city magistrate in the borough of Brooklyn to await the action of the grand jury upon a charge of violating section 410 of the Penal Code. Thereupon the appellant Parisi in accordance with the provisions of section 568 of the Code of Criminal Procedure executed an undertaking whereby he undertook that said Sullivan should "appear and answer the charge above mentioned, in whatever court it might (may) be prosecuted; and should (shall) at all times render himself amenable to the orders and process of the court, and if convicted should (shall) appear for judgment . . . or if he fail to perform either of these conditions that he would (will) pay to the People of the State of New York one thousand dollars."

Sullivan having been indicted upon said charge and having been duly called to answer at a term of the Supreme Court in Kings county failed to appear or answer and thereupon his default was taken and an order made declaring appellant's undertaking forfeited and this action was brought to recover the penalty of said undertaking with interest from the date when said order of forfeiture was entered. By a motion made on the trial to dismiss the complaint as not stating a cause of [27] action and by objections duly taken appellant raised two questions which are now argued.

These questions involve the propositions that it was necessary that appellant should be notified of the indictment of his principal and of the court in which he should be produced to answer said indictment, which was not done, and, secondly, that no interest should be allowed on the penalty fixed in the recognizance.

In support of the first proposition it is urged that the principal, after being held by the magistrate, could have been indicted and tried either in the County Court or in the Supreme Court, and that it was reasonable and necessary that the surety should have been informed where an indictment had been found and would be brought to trial before he could be expected to produce his principal or become in default for not doing so.

It seems to be settled that a surety who has given an undertaking for the appearance of his principal to answer to an indictment at a given term of court is responsible for his appearance, not only on the first day of the term, but on any subsequent day thereof without notice. (People v. Blankman, 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 252; People v. Kurtz, 16 Daly 188, 9 N. Y. S. 745; Rubush v. State, 112 Ind. 107, 13 N. E. 877.)

While compliance with this principle is more burdensome where the surety has given an undertaking which makes his responsible for the appearance of his principal in either of two or more courts instead of one, I do not think that the rule is thereby changed but that he undertakes the obligation to produce his principal at whichever term of court becomes proper. I assume that, as a matter of practice, no district attorney would be inclined to take advantage of the default of a surety who, through innocent inadvertence, mistake or ignorance, had failed to produce his principal at the proper time and place, and if such a case should occur the court would doubtless find it easy to relieve the surety from his default under the ample provisions of section 594 and 597 of the Code [28] of Criminal Procedure. In this case there is no indication that appellant's default was due to any innocent inadvertence or failure to learn the court wherein his principal was bound to appear.

But if I am wrong in the view thus expressed, I think there is still another answer to appellant's claim on this branch of the case. Under section 593 of the Code of Criminal Procedure on default of the surety an order of forfeiture was duly entered by the court and thereby his recognizance became fully and completely forfeited and his obligation to pay the amount therein fixed accrued and became absolute. The order was entered in the Supreme Court and its jurisdiction to declare the forfeiture and enter the order must be presumed, and so long as this order remains in force it is conclusive upon the appellant of such forfeiture. If there was sufficient excuse for his failure to produce his principal, the court, under the provisions of the Code already referred to, had power to relieve him from his default and vacate said order, and in the absence of such action it is not permissible to him to go back of the order and insist that he should have had some notice before default was taken and the same was entered. (People v. Blankman, supra, 252, 257; People v. Bennett, 136 N. Y. 482, 32 N. E. 1044.)

We then come to the second question, whether the trial court erred in allowing a recovery of interest on the penalty of the recognizance from the date of forfeiture. Our attention has not been called to any decision authoritatively settling this question, and we are assured that there has been more or less confusion of practice in the trial courts, sometimes a recovery of interest being allowed and at other times not.

Section 595 of the Code of Criminal Procedure in force at the time in question provided: "If the forfeiture be not discharged, . . . the district attorney may, at any time after the adjournment of the court, . . . proceed against any surety upon his undertaking."

[29] Section 1966 of the Code of Civil Procedure provided: "Where a recognizance to the people is forfeited, and the district attorney of the county in which it was taken, brings an action to recover the penalty thereof, it is not necessary, in such an action, to allege or prove any damages, by reason of the breach of the condition; but where the people are entitled to judgment therein, they must have judgment absolute, for the penalty of the recognizance."

This latter section was a substantial reenactment of the provisions of the Revised Statutes (2 R. S. 485, section 29), which provided: "Whenever any recognizance to the people of this state shall have become forfeited, the district attorney of the county in which such recognizance was taken, shall prosecute the same, by action of debt for the penalty thereof; and the proceedings and pleadings therein, shall be the same in all respects, as in personal actions for the recovery of any debt, except that it shall not be necessary to allege or prove any damages by reason of a breach of the condition of such recognizance; but on such breach being found or confessed, or upon a judgment by default being entered against the defendants, the judgment shall be absolute for the penalty of the recognizance."

We think that a reasonable interpretation of these sections standing by themselves indicates a legislative intent to limit the recovery in such a case as this to the penalty of the recognizance and without any addition of interest. But if there were any uncertainty in the interpretation of these statutory proceedings considered by themselves, we think this uncertainty is removed by a consideration of general principles applicable to their interpretation and by a consideration of other kindred and subsequent statutory enactments.

This recognizance is executed under a statute for the purpose of securing and insuring the performance of an act and not for the payment by the principal of moneys and in such a case the general rule seems to have been [30] early established both in England and in this state that the recovery should be limited by the penalty. (Lyon v. Clark, 8 N. Y. 148.)

This principle finds expression in section 1915 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that in an action upon a penal bond damages to be recovered for a breach or successive breaches of the condition "cannot, in the aggregate, exceed the penal sum, except where the condition is for the payment of money; in which case, they cannot exceed the penal sum, with interest thereupon, from the time when the defendant made default in the performance of the condition."

In addition, since the execution of the recognizance and the forfeiture thereof upon which this action is based, section 595 of the Code of Criminal Procedure has been so amended as to provide that in the case of the forfeiture of a recognizance similar to the present one the recognizance "together with a certified copy of the order of the court forfeiting the same, shall be filed by the district attorney in the office of the clerk of the county wherein such order shall have been made, and thereupon the said clerk shall docket the same in the book kept by him for docketing of judgments and enter therein a judgment against the surety or sureties in said recognizance named for the amount of the penalty of said recognizance, and the recognizance, and the certified copy of the order forfeiting the recognizance, shall constitute the judgment roll."

This section clearly limits the amount of the judgment to be entered to the penalty and while it provides so far as concerns a case arising in the county where this one did, a new method of entering judgment upon the recognizance, there is no reason to believe that it was intended to change the amount for which said judgment should be entered or to adopt any different rule of practice in that respect than was understood by the legislature to be in effect at the time the amendment was adopted. I think [31] in this manner it amounted in some degree to a legislative interpretation of the statutory provisions theretofore governing this subject.

These views are confirmed by the decisions in U. S. v. Broadhead, 127 U. S. 212, 8 S. Ct. 1191, 32 U. S. (L. ed.) 147, and People v. Hanaw, 106 Mich. 421, 64 N. W. 328.

In the former case it was held, in a suit brought upon a bond in the penal sum of five thousand dollars conditioned for the appearance of the principal, in the District Court of the United States, to answer to an indictment, that no interest could be recovered; and in the latter case, which interpreted a statute not seeming to differ materially from our own, it was held that the allowance of interest upon the penal sum of the recognizance from the date of its forfeiture was error.

In accordance with these views I recommend that the judgment appealed from be modified by striking therefrom the amount allowed by way of interest upon the recognizance from the date of forfeiture, and as modified affirmed, without costs.

Collin, Hogan, Cardozo, Seabury and Pound, JJ., concur; Willard Bartlett, Ch. J., not voting.

Judgment accordingly.

NOTE.

Allowance of Interest on Forfeited Bail Bond.

This note is intended to discuss the allowance of interest on a forfeited recognizance or bail bond given in a criminal prosecution only. As being related generally to the topic under discussion, see the note to Empire State Surety Co. v. Lindenmeier, Ann. Cas. 1914C 1189, wherein is considered the liability of a surety for interest when the effect is to exceed the penalty of a bond.

The reported case holds that it is error to allow the recovery of interest against a surety on the penalty of a recognizance bond from the date of its forfeiture declared by an order of court, and this conclusion is re-enforced by the consideration that the bond in question was executed under a statute for the purpose of securing and insuring the performance of an act and not for the payment by the principal of money, the general rule in such a case being that the amount of recovery is limited by the penalty. This view finds support in People v. Hanaw, 106 Mich. 421, 64 N. W. 328, wherein it was held that interest cannot be recovered against the sureties on a bail bond from the date of the forfeiture, the court saying: "We think error was committed in entering judgment for interest on the amount of the recognizance from the date of forfeiture. Section 8457, 2 How. Stat. provides that the judgment shall be for the amount of the penalty of the recognizance." And in U. S. v. Broadhead, 127 U. S. 212, 8 S. Ct. 1191, 32 U. S. (L. ed.) 147, wherein it appeared that the penalty of a bail bond alone was not equal to the jurisdictional amount, it was held that the court could not take jurisdiction since no interest (presumably between the time of the forfeiture and the proceedings in the appellate court) could be recovered against the sureties on a forfeited bail bond executed in criminal proceedings by the United States against the principal. The court said: "These cases are suits brought upon two bonds given by John F. Broadhead and his sureties, conditioned for his appearance in the District Court of the United States for the District of California, to answer two separate indictments for making and forging checks on the Assistant Treasurer of the United States at San Francisco. The penalty of each of these bonds was five thousand dollars, and, according to well settled principles, no interest can be recovered in such suit as this, nor can any recovery be had beyond the amount prescribed in these instruments, except for costs. . . . As the act of 1875, above cited, requires that there shall be an amount in controversy, exclusive of costs, exceeding five thousand dollars, and as no such recovery can be had in the cases now under consideration, the writs are dismissed."

But it has been held that interest from the date of the judgment of forfeiture of a bail bond is recoverable by the state. Swerdfeger v. State, 21 Kan. 475; State v. Sullivan, 12 La. Ann. 720; State v. Frazier, 52 La. Ann. 1305, 27 So. 799; Kinney v. State, 14 Ohio Cir. Ct. 91, 7 Ohio Cir. Dec. 97. Thus in State v. Sullivan, supra, the court said: "The only point on which appellants rely in this court, is as to the legality of that part of the judgment which allows interest from the day of judgment. They contend, that the amount of the bond is a penalty which the law imposes on them; that its exact amount is prescribed by law, and the lower court had no right to make it more onerous by obliging them to pay interest. They further aver, that there is no analogy between this and civil cases, in which the law expressly provides that interest shall be paid on a debt from the time it is due. We are of opinion that the judgment is correct. It is true, that the exact amount of the bond is fixed by the Judge, who bails a prisoner, and the security signs for a particular sum, but when the bail bond is forfeited, it then becomes a debt due the state. There is no reason why the state should not be entitled to the same privileges as its citizens, with relation to the right of receiving interest on debts due it. There is nothing in the law which excepts the state from the benefit of the statute, which declares that all debts shall bear interest at the rate of five per cent from the time they become due, unless otherwise stipulated. As then the bail bond when forfeited, is a debt due the state, it bears legal interest from the date of its forfeiture, for then it became due. This does not render the surety responsible beyond the amount of his obligation; for when he signed the bond, he is supposed to have known the law, and to have been aware that he was contracting not only to pay the amount of the bond, in the event of its forfeiture, but also legal interest thereon from the time the judgment of forfeiture rendered it a debt due the state." Similarly in State v. Frazier, 52 La. Ann. 1305, 27 So. 799, in upholding a similar recovery from the date of the rendition of the judgment of forfeiture, the court said: "In answer to the appeal, the District Attorney prays an amendment of the judgment so as to allow the state legal interest from the date of its rendition until paid. That the state is entitled to recover interest on a forfeited bond from the date of the judgment of forfeiture, was expressly so held in State v. Sullivan, 12 La. Ann. 720. It is, therefore, ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be so amended as to allow legal interest on the amount thereof from February 8, 1900, until paid, and as thus amended the said judgment be affirmed at the cost of the appellant." Likewise in Swerdsfeger v. State, 21 Kan. 475, which was an action against the surety on a forfeited criminal recognizance, it was held that under the Kansas statutes (laws 1871, p. 250, sec. 1) interest from the day of forfeiture was properly allowed by the trial court. And in Kinney v. State, 14 Ohio Cir. Ct. 91, 7 Ohio Cir. Dec. 97, wherein it was held that the state could recover against the surety interest on a bail bond from the date of its forfeiture, the court said: "It is also said there was judgment here for interest but we are inclined to believe that is correct. It is said or stated that this sum is not fixed, that is to say, it is within the power of the court to reduce it. The statute authorizes in two different sections that the court on presentation of a case like this may reduce the bond or amount, or in one section provides that they may reduce it entirely if defendant appears and in the other the court may reduce it in accordance as the facts may show right and justice to be, but that is not a sufficient reason for holding that the bond does not draw interest. It is a promise to pay the money on condition broken and we think draws interest from the time when due."

WEILBACHER

v.

J. W. PUTTS COMPANY

Maryland Court of Appeals—April 8, 1914.

123 Md. 249; 91 Atl. 343.

Negligence — Erection of Scaffold — Injury to Pedestrian — Independent Contractor.

The owner of a building contracted with a painter to paint it, he to furnish the appliances and employ the labor therefor, the owner not retaining any supervision of the work or any control over the men, and the contractor used a stage fastened by guy lines which were not tight enough, and which allowed the stage to slip, so that he fell therefrom and struck plaintiff as she was passing on the sidewalk below. Held, that the negligence was the negligence of an independent contractor, for which the owner was not liable.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The owner of a building employed an independent contractor to paint it, and the contractor negligently fastened the guy ropes so that the stage on which he was painting slipped, and he fell and struck plaintiff on the sidewalk below. It appeared that the work was done in the usual way, and there was no evidence that it was customary to erect guards over sidewalks above which men were painting from a suspended stage during the work. Held, that, while an abutting owner causing a nuisance to be erected on his property is not excused from liability for an injury therefrom to a person using the street because he employs an independent contractor to do the work, yet, as the suspension of the stage above the sidewalk was not such a menace to the safety of those using it as to amount to a nuisance, the owner was not liable.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Such conditions were not such that the injury might have been anticipated by the owner as the probable consequence of the work if he failed to take proper precaution to prevent it, and hence the owner was not liable; although, if the injury had been such that he should have anticipated it, he would have been liable.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The duty of the owner of property abutting on a highway not to create a nuisance on the highway endangering the public use thereof does not make him an insurer against injury to the public or require him to provide against all possible injury, and does not require him, on employing an independent contractor to paint the building, to see that the guy ropes used by the contractor to fasten a stage are properly tied.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The question whether an injury might reasonably have been anticipated by the owner of a building abutting on a public street as a probable consequence of work, such as painting and repairing, which he has done by an independent contractor is generally a question of fact for the jury.

[See note at end of this case.]

Independent Contractor — Liability of Owner — Burden of Proof.

Plaintiff, in an action for injury from being struck by an independent contractor who fell from a painter's stage suspended from defendant's building over the sidewalk, by reason of his negligent fastening of the guy ropes, has the burden of showing that defendant owner was guilty of negligence; and the mere fact that the contractor fell and injured him will not justify an inference of defendant's negligence.

Res Ipsa Loquitur.

The maxim "res ipsa loquitur," meaning that, although there must be reasonable evidence of negligence, yet where the thing is shown to be under the management of defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those in control use proper care, affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation, that the accident arose from want of care, does not apply to the owner of a building who had no control over a contractor engaged in painting it, through whose negligence plaintiff was injured.

Admissibility of Evidence.

In an action for damages by being struck by an independent contractor who fell from a staging suspended over the sidewalk by reason of his own negligence in fastening the guy ropes, where the president of the defendant owner testified for plaintiff that the contract for painting was given to the contractor and that the owner had nothing to do with the work, did not employ the men engaged in it, or control the methods, the plaintiff has a right to ask on redirect examination who owned the appliances used in the work, but not to inquire whether defendant took any precaution to safeguard travel on the sidewalk below; since the latter question does not relate to any matter covered by the cross-examination.

Same.

Evidence as to whether witness had ever known paint buckets, brushes, or ropes to fall from ladders or scaffolds used in painting buildings is irrelevant and inadmissible.

Expert Evidence — Subjects of Opinion Evidence — Ultimate Issue in Case.

Where witnesses stated that it is not generally necessary to erect barriers on the sidewalk to prevent persons from using it when painting from a suspended stage, and that he had never seen a man fall from a stage, his opinion as to whether the suspension of the stage above the sidewalk made the sidewalk dangerous or more dangerous is incompetent, since it is the very question the jury has to decide on all the evidence in the case.

Harmless Error — Exclusion of Opinion Evidence.

The exclusion of such opinion, if error, is harmless, where it appears that the witness had seen a man fall from a different kind of scaffold, which fact would not have aided the jury in determining whether there was any reason for defendant to anticipate injury from the falling of a man from a staging such as was used in the present case.

Appeal from Baltimore City Court: HALLAN, Judge.

Action for damages. Carrie P. Weilbacher, plaintiff, and J. W. Putts Company, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

R. Lee Slingsluff and Thomas Foley Hisky for appellant.

Clarence A. Tucker, Samuel J. Harman, Charles H. Knapp and Joseph N. Ulman for appellees.

[251] THOMAS, J.—This suit was brought to recover for injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the J. W. Putts Company, a corporation, the defendant below and appellee in this Court, and as the case was withdrawn from the jury at the close of the plaintiff's testimony on the ground that there was no "evidence in the case legally sufficient to entitle the [252] plaintiff to recover under the pleadings," it will be necessary to refer to the pleadings and evidence.

The declaration contained three counts, each one of which was demurred to. The Court below overruled the demurrers to the first and third counts and sustained the demurrer to the second count. The second count was amended, and the case was tried on the issues joined on the first, third and amended second counts with the result stated.

The first count alleges that the defendant was, on the 25th of September, 1911, the owner and in possession of the store and premises on the northwest corner of Park avenue and Lexington street, two of the public streets of Baltimore City, and, for the purpose of repairing and painting the building, caused "a large ladder or scaffold to be suspended from the roof of said building, over and above the sidewalk along said building on Park avenue, in a negligent and unskilful manner in that the defendant, its servants and agents, neglected to make said scaffold fast by proper guy lines," and that, as a result of such neglect, the ladder or scaffold slipped and one of the defendant's servants, who was working on the ladder, was preceipitated to the sidewalk, and, in falling, struck the plaintiff, who was passing along the sidewalk, and seriously and permanently injured her.

The amended second count charges that the injury to the plaintiff was caused by the negligence of the defendant, "its agents and servants, in erecting, using and operating said ladder or scaffold in that the defendant, its agents and servants in charge thereof negligently failed and omitted to properly fasten said ladder or scaffold with guy lines," by reason of which negligence the defendant's servant "slipped and fell from said ladder" to the sidewalk and struck the plaintiff.

The third count avers that the defendant caused the ladder or scaffold to be suspended from the roof of the building over and above the sidewalk for the purpose of painting the building; that the erection and use of the ladder or scaffold [253] "endangered the travel" on the sidewalk and that it became the duty of the defendant to "guard said work" and sidewalk for the protection and safety of person using the sidewalk, which the defendant failed to do, and that by reason of said failure on the part of the defendant the plaintiff, while passing along the sidewalk, "was struck by the defendant's servant in falling from said ladder" and seriously injured.

It appears from the evidence in the case that the appellee owned and was conducting a store in the building on the northwest corner of Park avenue and Lexington street, two of the public streets of Baltimore City, and in August, 1911, contracted with Crooks, Zick & Co. for the painting of the outside or exterior wood and metal work of the building. Crooks, Zick & Co. submitted, in writing, a bid for the work, on the 24th of August and the bid was accepted by the defendant verbally. The building was six stories high, and the painting was done in the usual way from a "stage" or scaffold about twenty-four by thirty feet long (which resembles a ladder in a horizontal position with boards on it), suspended on the outside of the building above the sidewalk by ropes fastened to each end of the stage and attached to L-shaped hooks, which were hooked to the cornice of the building and kept in place by guy lines extending over the roof and tied to a chimney. On the day of the accident, Zick, a member of the firm of Crooks, Zick & Co., the contractors, and two employees of the firm were engaged in doing the painting. After working in the morning they changed the position of the stage, so that at the time of the accident the stage was at the top of the fourth floor of the building, just outside of and about on a level with the cornice of a bay window which extended beyond the building line and over the sidewalk. Zick and one of the employees of the firm were on the stage, and Zick was kneeling with one knee on the stage and the other knee on the top of the bay window, when the rope slipped, one end of the stage was slightly lowered, and Zick lost his balance and fell to the sidewalk. The [254] man on the stage with Zick did not fall nor did anything fall from the stage, and the other employee of Crooks, Zick & Co., who was painting from the cornice above, testified that the lowering of one end of the stage, which caused Zick to lose his balance, was due to the fact that the guy rope was "not tied tight enough," that is, it was not taut, and that as soon as it was "stretched tight enough" the stage stopped; that shortly before the accident he was on the roof of the building and noticed that the guy line was not "tied tight enough," and that when he went down he told Mr. Zick so. In falling from the stage Zick struck the plaintiff's foot as she was walking along the sidewalk and seriously injured her. The evidence further shows that the stage extended beyond the building line and over the sidewalk; that the defendant knew of the position of the stage and did not erect any barrier on the street or "rope the street off" to prevent persons walking on the pavement under the stage; that defendant did not employ the men engaged in painting the building, had nothing to do with the methods used in the performance of the work, did not exercise any control "over the appliances, methods or men used or engaged in the work," and that the appliances belonged to Crooks, Zick & Co.

As we have said, the case was withdrawn from the jury at the close of the testimony offered by the plaintiff, so that in reviewing that ruling we are dealing with the case as presented by the pleadings and the plaintiff's evidence.

The first and amended second counts of the declaration declare that the injury complained of was caused by the negligence of the defendant's servants in failing to make the stage or scaffold fast by "proper guy lines," and in neglecting to "properly fasten" the scaffold "with guy lines." The evidence shows that the accident was, as alleged, due to the fact that the guy lines were not properly fastened or, as the witness expressed it, were not "tied tight enough," but it also shows that the work was not done by the defendant but by Crooks, Zick & Co. who contracted to do it and furnish [255] the appliances and employed the labor for that purpose, and that the defendant did not have supervision of the work or any control over the men engaged in it. The negligence of which the plaintiff complains in the first two counts was not, therefore, the negligence of the defendant or its servants, but the negligence of the servants of an independent contractor, for which the defendant is not liable, unless the injury to the plaintiff resulted from its disregard or neglect of some duty that it owed to her and other persons using the sidewalk on which she was injured. Deford v. State, 30 Md. 179; City, etc. R. Co. v. Moores, 80 Md. 348, 30 Atl. 643, 45 Am. St. Rep. 345; Smith v. Benick, 87 Md. 610, 41 Atl. 56, 42 L.R.A. 277; Decola v. Cowan, 102 Md. 551, 62 Atl. 1026; Philadelphia, etc. R. Co. v. Mitchell, 107 Md. 600, 69 Atl. 422, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 974.

The free and unobstructed use of the public streets is a right that belongs to the public, and it is the duty of those owning and occupying property abutting on a highway to so use their property and keep it in repair as not to endanger the public while in the exercise of that right. If, therefore, an abutting owner causes a nuisance to be erected on his property and injury to a person using the street follows as the result of the existence of the nuisance, the owner is not absolved from liability because of the fact that he employed an independent contractor to do the work. In other words, if the injury be caused by the thing contracted to be done, the owner is responsible, but he is not liable for the negligence of the employees of the contractor in a matter collateral to the contract. Again, the person for whom work is done will be liable when the injury is such as might have been anticipated by him, as the probable consequence of the work, and he failed to take the proper precaution to prevent it, or where it results from his neglect to discharge a duty that he owes to third persons or the public in the execution of the work.

In Deford's Case, according to the evidence offered by the plaintiff, the wall on the defendant's property, fronting on a public street, was erected in such a defective and dangerous [256] manner that it constituted a nuisance, and Judge Alvey said: "If this be so, it (the wall) constituted a nuisance, for which the defendant would be liable. And the fact that the wall was erected by others, under contract, and to whom he did not bear the relation of master, will not excuse him; for, as was said by Lord Campbell in Ellis v. Sheffield Gas Consumers Co. 2 El. & Bl. (Eng.) 767, 75 E. C. L. 767, it is a proposition absolutely untenable that in no case can a man be responsible for the act of a person with whom he has made a contract. If the contractor does the thing which he is employed to do, the employer is responsible for that thing as if he did it himself." Judge Alvey then adopts the statement of Baron Wilde in Hole v. Sittingbourne, etc. R. Co. 6 H. & N. (Eng.) 488: "The distinction appears to me to be that, when work is being done under a contract, if an accident happens, and an injury is caused by negligence in a matter entirely collateral to a contract, the liability turns on the question whether the relation of master and servant exists." In City, etc. R. Co. v. Moores, supra, the Court speaking through Judge Boyd, said: "Even if the relation of principal and agent, or master and servant, do not, strictly speaking, exist, yet the person for whom the work was done may still be liable if the injury is such as might have been anticipated by him, as a probable consequence of the work let out to the contractor, or if it be of such character as must result in creating a nuisance, or if he owes a duty to third persons or the public in the execution of the work." In Mitchell's Case the late Judge Schmucker, after referring to Deford's Case and others, said: "As a result of these cases it may now be said to be settled in this State that although, when the work is being done by an independent contractor, the employer will not be liable for an injury caused by negligence in a matter collateral to a contract, he will be liable if the injury be caused by the thing contracted to be done, or if it be such as might have been anticipated, as a probable consequence of the work let out to the contractor, and he took no precaution to prevent it." [257] And in the case of Baltimore v. O'Donnell, 53 Md. 110, 36 Am. Rep. 395, where the appellee was injured by reason of the fact that there was no light nor signal to warn persons of the dangerous condition of the street, the Court held that the primary obligation was upon the city to keep the street in a safe condition, and that it could not commit that duty to a contractor so as to avoid liability for injury resulting from a failure to maintain a proper warning of danger.

Now applying these well-established rules to the facts of this case, it is apparent that the plaintiff, much as her painful and serious injury is to be regretted, is not entitled to recover from the defendant unless we are to hold that the suspension of the stage or scaffold above the sidewalk was such a menace to the safety of those using the street as to amount to a nuisance, or that the injury was one that might have been anticipated by the defendant, as a probable consequence of having its building painted from a suspended stage or scaffold.

The evidence shows that the work was done in the usual way in which buildings located on public streets are painted; that the stage or scaffold was a good one, and that the accident was due entirely to the negligence of the servant of Crooks, Zick & Co. in not tying the guy line tight enough. There was no evidence to show that it was a common occurrence for painter to fall from a suspended stage, or that it was customary to erect guards or covers over sidewalks above which men are engaged in painting a building from a suspended stage, or to "rope" the street so as to prevent persons from using the sidewalk during the progress of the work. On the contrary, the only evidence reflecting upon this feature of the case was the testimony of the witness, Israel, who was engaged in painting the building at the time of the accident, and who testified that he had had forty-three years' experience in such work and that he had never seen a man fall from a painter's stage, and had never seen a stage fall to the sidewalk; that it was not necessary as a general thing [258] to erect barriers to prevent people from walking under the stage, and that after the accident he went back to work and used the same stage and same guy lines, and the testimony of James L. Thomas, who stated that he was a member of a firm engaged in house painting and decorating, and that the firm employed from twenty-five to sixty-five men; that he had been engaged in the business for thirty-three years, and that he had seen one man fall from a scaffold but had never seen a painter fall from a swinging scaffold. This evidence not only tends to show that the suspended stage was not a nuisance, but also shows that there was no reason why the defendant should have anticipated or provided against injury to persons using the sidewalk.

In Deford's Case the plaintiff was injured by the falling of the wall of a house which was in course of erection by an independent contractor for Deford. There was no suggestion in that case that the erection of a building fronting on the sidewalk of a public street was a nuisance, but Deford's liability was based by the Court upon the evidence that the particular wall in question was constructed in such a dangerous and defective manner that it became and was a nuisance. And in Decola's Case the plaintiff was injured by a brick that fell from a house which Cowan, the contractor, was erecting for and on the property of the North Baltimore Construction Company. The suit was abandoned as to the owner of the property, and this Court said that there was no evidence in the case to make the company liable for the injury. The Court could not have decided as it did in those cases if the erection of a house fronting on the sidewalk of a public street is a nuisance, yet it is a matter of common knowledge that the erection of such buildings is attended with some risk, and that appliances extending over and above the sidewalk are employed in the execution of the work. In the case of Boomer v. Wilbur, 176 Mass. 492, 57 N. E. 1004, 53 L.R.A. 172, the owner of a house employed a contractor to repair a chimney, and the plaintiff was injured by the falling of a brick [259] during the performance of the contract. The Court there said: "The instructions to the jury allowed them to find a verdict for the plaintiff . . . upon the ground that the work of repair called for by the contract was necessarily a nuisance, within the rule stated in Woodman v. Metropolitan R. Co. [149 Mass. 335], ubi supra, and other similar cases. The work called for was the repair of chimneys. At most, the brick were to be taken off for a few feet and relaid. The work which was to be done was not such as would necessarily endanger persons in the street. It did not involve throwing the brick into the street, or causing or allowing them to fall so as to endanger persons traveling therein. It is plain that, unless there was negligence in the actual handling of the brick, there could be no injury to the passing traveler. . . . This is not a case where the work, if properly done, creates a peril, unless guarded against as in the cases relied upon by the plaintiff. The accident was caused by the act of the contractor in doing what it was not necessary for him to do, what he was not expected to do, and what he did not intend to do. If it had been necessary for him to topple the chimney over into the street, or to remove the bricks by letting them fall into it, or the contract had contemplated such action, the instructions would not have been objectionable; but, as this was not necessary or intended, the work could not be classed as work which, if properly done, was ordinarily attended with danger to the public. The negligence, if any, was in the mere detail of the work. The contract did not contemplate such negligence, and the negligent party as the only one to be held." In the case of Laffery v. U. S. Gypsum Co. 83 Kan. 349, Ann. Cas. 1912A 590, 111 Pac. 498, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 930, the Court, after referring to the general rule which exempts the employer from liability where the work is done by an independent contractor, and to the exception to that rule in cases where the work is intrinsically dangerous, however skillfully performed, said: "No effort will be made to define precisely the expressions 'intrinsically dangerous' or 'inherently dangerous,' or like phraseology, as used in the [260] authorities. Regard must be had to the reason of the principle and the consequences flowing from its application in the given situation. The mere liability to injury from doing the work cannot be the test, for injuries may happen in any undertaking, and many are attended with great danger if carelessly managed, although with proper care they are not specially hazardous." After stating further that although the erection of buildings in cities is attended with hazards, such work has not been regarded as coming within the rule applicable to work intrinsically dangerous, the Court quotes with approval the statement of Mr. Chief Justice Cockburn in Bower v. Peate (1876), 1 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 321, that, "There is an obvious difference between committing work to a contractor to be executed from which, if properly done, no injurious consequences can arise, and handing over to him work to be done from which mischievous consequences will arise unless preventive measures are adopted." In the case of Geist v. Rothschild, 90 Ill. App. 324, the defendant employed a contractor to paint the wall of his store. The painting was done from a scaffold suspended from the top of the building, and the scaffold was lowered and raised by ropes at the end of the scaffold. The plaintiff was injured by the falling of the ropes, the slack ends of which were coiled on the scaffold and were in some way knocked off and struck the plaintiff. The Court there said that it was a daily occurrence in large cities like Chicago for the walls of buildings on its streets to be painted, and that the fact that it was necessary to suspend a scaffold over the street in order to do it did not make it a nuisance if the scaffold was securely suspended; that there was nothing inherently dangerous in doing the work, provided it was done by competent persons in the usual and ordinary way, and that there was no question of fact for submission to the jury in that connection. In the case of Sartirana v. New York County Nat. Bank, 139 App. Div. 597, 124 N. Y. S. 197, the plaintiff was struck by a platform which was being lowered by means of a derrick on a building in course [261] of construction by an independent contractor. The Court held that the bank, the owner of the property, was not liable, and said: "The work being done here was no more intrinsically dangerous than the construction of a building along a public street usually is. . . . The building was not of extraordinary height or at all out of the ordinary, so far as exterior construction was concerned, and unless the owner is in every case bound to guard against possible injuries to passersby, which is not the law, the bank could not be held liable for the negligence of a contractor." See also Mehler v. Fisch, 65 Ohio 549, 120 N. Y. S. 807.

Without meaning to go to the full extent of some of the authorities cited in the application of the rules announced, applying the principles there established to the facts of this case we cannot hold that the suspension of the stage or scaffold from the cornice of the defendant's building created a nuisance, or that the use of the stage in painting the building rendered the work so dangerous as to require the defendant to erect covers or guards over the sidewalk in order to protect persons walking thereon, or to erect barriers to prevent persons from using the sidewalk during the progress of the work. To do so would impose a useless burden upon property owners in cities, and subject the public to unnecessary inconvenience. Of course, there is some risk incident to the projection of any object over a highway, but the duty of the owner of abutting property does not require him to provide against all possible injury, and it is only such injury as may be reasonably anticipated that he is bound to take precautions to prevent.

The appellant relies largely upon Mitchell's Case and the cases of Doll v. Ribetti, 203 Fed. 593, C. C. A. and McHarge v. Newcomer, 117 Tenn. 595, 100 S. W. 700, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 298. In Mitchell's Case the alleged injury was inflicted by a hammer which fell from a bridge being erected over one of the public streets of Havre de Grace and struck the plaintiff's umbrella as she was passing along the street under the bridge, and the Court said: [262] "There is evidence in the record tending to show that in the construction of such bridges, when the workmen are engaged in riveting the ties and braces between the girders composing the span they are compelled to work with great rapidity in order to put the rivets in place and clench them while at a white or red heat, and as a result rivets, tools and other articles handled with such rapidity frequently fall to the ground beneath and render it unsafe for travel unless properly guarded. There is like evidence that in the construction of the bridge now in question such objects did in fact frequently fall upon the street below it and that no precautions were taken to hinder the public from passing under the bridge or to prevent the falling of the objects from it." In the case of McHarge v. Newcomer, supra, the plaintiff while passing along the street was struck by a heavy awning roller which was "allowed by a party repairing the awning, in some way not shown, to suddenly fall upon her." The defendants offered no evidence explaining the falling of the roller, but introduced proof to show that the awning was being repaired by an independent contractor. The Supreme Court of Tennessee held that the awning was a nuisance, and held further "that the work contracted for involved a thing intrinsically dangerous to the public, from which injuries to those using the street were probable and might reasonably be anticipated by the proprietor," and in conclusion said: "The awning of the defendants, so far as it appears from this record, was being repaired by that contractor, over a much frequented street, in a populous city, and at a place where persons were constantly coming and going and standing, upon the invitation of the defendants, for the purpose of trading with them and taking the street cars, without any precautions taken to prevent portions of the awning, material or tools from falling on those below." In the case of Doll v. Ribetti, supra, the syllabus contains the following statement: "Where defendant, a tenant of a building erected flush with the sidewalk, permitted the servant of an independent contractor to stand [263] on the window ledges to clean windows on the outside without providing scaffolding or other safety appliances, and the servant fell and injured the plaintiff, who was walking past the building, whether the tenant was negligent in not providing scaffolds or safety appliances was for the jury." The statement of claim in that case charged, "That in the city of Pittsburgh, it had been a custom to have the windows of such buildings cleaned by persons standing on the outside of the sash or sills of the windows, secured from falling by a stout belt worn about the waist, with a strap on each side thereof, fastened to a hook or other fixture set for the purpose in the side frames or casing of each window." It further averred "that the building occupied by the defendant was not and never had been provided with such hooks, or with any other fit or appropriate fixtures for the purpose stated," and that the defendant, long prior to the day of the accident, "knew, or by the exercise of reasonable care should have known, that the windows of the building were not equipped with the customary hooks or other appropriate fixtures," etc., and that while the servant of the contractor was engaged in cleaning the window on the fourth floor of the building, he accidentally lost his balance and fell upon the plaintiff, who was walking upon the sidewalk below. The Court said that the facts alleged in the statement of claim were for the most part undisputed, "and that there was evidence tending to support all of the allegations of fact upon which were based the charge of negligence of the defendant." In that case, therefore, the negligence of the defendant alleged and shown by the evidence was his failure to furnish the appliances and safeguards usually provided by the owner or occupier of a building to prevent those engaged in washing the windows from falling.

The distinction between those cases and the case at bar is obvious. Here the evidence shows that the accident was due to the failure of the servants of Crooks, Zick & Co. to properly fasten or tie the guy lines. There is no evidence to [264] show that the defendant neglected to provide any safety appliance that was customarily supplied by the owner of the building, or that it was a common occurrence for painters to fall from a suspended stage or scaffold.

The appellant contends that the defendant owed an absolute duty to the public not to interfere "with their right to the safe and unimpeded use of the sidewalk." The duty that the owner of property on a highway owes to the public is not to create a nuisance on the highway, and to take proper precautions to prevent injuries that may be anticipated as a probable consequence of work in which he, or his contractor, is engaged. But that duty did not make the defendant an insurer against injury to the public, or require him to provide against all possible injury, however remote, nor did it require the defendant to go on the top of its building to see that the guy lines used by the contractor were properly tied. In City, etc. R. Co. v. Moores, supra, the plaintiff was injured by reason of her horse becoming frightened at a steam engine which was being used by White, an independent contractor, in the execution of certain work on a turnpike. After referring to the rule stated in O'Donnell's Case, supra, and Water Co. v. Ware, 16 Wall. 566, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 485, Judge Boyd said: "But the evidence shows that the injury was sustained by the negligent use of the engine in not stopping it and in blowing the whistle as she (the plaintiff) approached. It would be carrying the obligation of the Turnpike Company beyond that required or authorized by the authorities to hold that its duty to the public required it to see that the servants of White were not thus negligent, although the use of the steam engine was not a nuisance per se and could be operated so as not likely to do any injury to anyone using the road. It would be requiring too much of it to make it take such precautions against accidents when letting out lawful work to an independent contractor. It must be admitted that the work to be done was lawful and the company had the right to assume that there would be no such negligence as that [265] complained of, which was entirely collateral to and not a probable consequence of the work contracted for. To hold the company to such a strict liability would practically forbid it from having such work done by contractors as it would have to keep its own agents on engines to see that there was no negligence on the part of the contractors or their servants." This statement of Judge Boyd's was quoted at length and approved in the later case of Symons v. Road Directors, 105 Md. 254, 65 Atl. 1067.

It is also urged on behalf of the appellant that the question whether the injury might reasonably have been anticipated by the defendant as a probable consequence of the work contracted to be done was one of fact for the jury. That, of course, is the general rule (Bonaparte v. Wiseman, 89 Md. 12, 42 Atl. 918, 44 L.R.A. 482; Philadelphia, etc. R. Co. v. Mitchell, supra), but here we are considering the legal sufficiency of the plaintiff's evidence, the burden being upon her to show that the defendant was guilty of negligence. There was no evidence to show that the injury might have been anticipated as a probable consequence of the work in which the contractor was engaged. On the contrary, as we have said, the work was done in the usual way, and all the evidence tends to show that there was no reason why the defendant should have anticipated any injury to persons using the sidewalk. The mere fact that the servant of the contractor fell and injured the plaintiff would not justify an inference that the injury was caused by the negligence of the defendant, especially as it was shown to have been due entirely to the negligence of the contractor's servant, which the defendant had no reason to anticipate. Joyce v. Flanigan, 111 Md. 481, 74 Atl. 818. The maxim res ipsa loquitur cannot aid the plaintiff in this case. The man who fell and injured her did not fall from the defendant's building, but from the stage or scaffold which was not under its management or control. The case most frequently referred to in this State as containing the true statement of the rule is the case of Scott v. London, etc. Docks Co. 3 H. & C. (Eng.) 596, where [266] it is said: "There must be reasonable evidence of negligence. But where the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or its servants, and the accident is such as, in the ordinary course of things, does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from want of care." Howser v. Cumberland, etc. R. Co. 80 Md. 146, 30 Atl. 906, 45 Am. St. Rep. 332, 27 L.R.A. 154; Decola v. Cowan, supra; Walter v. Baltimore Electric Co. 109 Md. 513, 71 Atl. 953, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1178; Chesapeake Iron Works v. Hochschild, 119 Md. 303, 86 Atl. 345.

Albert C. Putts, the president of the defendant, was called as a witness for the plaintiff and was asked if the painting that was done on the defendant's building was not done by the defendant, and he answered, "Yes." He was then asked, "Your company was having the building painted?" to which he replied, "Yes, we gave the contract to have it painted." On cross-examination he was asked by counsel for the defendant to whom the appliances used in connection with the painting belonged. The plaintiff objected to the question, but the Court overruled the objection, and the witness answered that they belonged to Crooks, Zick & Company. After stating further that the defendant had nothing to do with the work, did not employ the men engaged in it, and had no control over them or the appliances and methods used in doing the work, the witness was asked on redirect examination by counsel for the plaintiff if the defendant took "any precaution to safeguard the travel on the sidewalk" or did anything "to protect the pedestrians walking along the street under the ladder," which questions were objected to by the defendant, and the Court refused to permit the witness to answer them. These rulings formed the subject of the first three exceptions. The witness having stated in his examination-in-chief that the painting "was done by" the defendant, and that the defendant "gave the contract to have it painted," the defendant had a right to have him explain and to interrogate him as to the extent of the defendant's connection [267] with the work. The questions asked in the second and third exceptions did not relate to any matter referred to in the cross-examination, and there was, therefore, no error in either of those rulings.

The fourth, fifth, sixth and tenth exceptions are to the refusal of the Court below to permit the witnesses to say whether they had ever known paint buckets, brushes or ropes to fall from ladders or scaffolds used in painting buildings. We see no error in these rulings. The plaintiff was not injured by the falling of a paint bucket or brush, and even if proper care required the defendant to provide against injuries from such causes, it would not follow that it was its duty to anticipate injury from the falling of a man from the scaffold. Mr. Israel stated that it was not necessary as a general thing to erect barriers on the sidewalk to warn persons against using it when a building is being painted from a suspended stage, and that with forty-three years' experience he had never known a man to fall from a stage. Mr. Thomas, who had been a painter for thirty-three years, testified that he had never seen a man fall from a swinging scaffold. They were asked by the plaintiff's counsel whether, in their opinion, the suspension of a stage above a sidewalk "made the use of" the sidewalk more dangerous or dangerous, and the seventh, eighth and ninth exceptions are to the refusal of the Court to permit those questions to be answered. The burden was on the plaintiff to show that the injury was such as might reasonably have been anticipated, as a probable result of the work that was being done, and that could not be shown by the opinion of the witnesses that the suspended stage rendered the use of the sidewalk more dangerous or dangerous. That was the very question the jury had to decide upon all the evidence in the case, and it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to produce evidence from which the jury could infer that the suspension of the stage made the "use of" the sidewalk dangerous. There was nothing in the conditions surrounding the scene of the accident that would suggest the [268] propriety of allowing a witness, who was familiar with those conditions, to express an opinion as to whether the suspension of the stage rendered the use of the sidewalk unsafe, and the rule that allows a witness to state that a particular road, with which he is familiar, is in a dangerous condition, should not, for obvious reasons, be applied in this case. But even if this is not so, it is not probable that the plaintiff was prejudiced by the rulings, for the witnesses had already stated that they had never known a man to fall from a swinging scaffold. Mr. Thomas was asked in the examination-in-chief if he had ever known a man to fall from a painter's scaffold and he answered, "Yes." On cross-examination it developed that he did not mean that he had seen a man fall from a suspended scaffold, but that he had seen one fall from a different kind of scaffold, and the defendant then moved that his statement that he had seen a man fall from scaffold be stricken out, and the eleventh exception is to the granting of that motion. The question in the case was whether there was any reason to anticipate injury from the falling of a man from a ladder such as was used in painting the defendant's building, and the fact that a man had been known to fall from a different kind of scaffold would not have aided the jury in determining that question. It would not follow because a man had been known to fall from a different kind of ladder that a painter would likely fall from one of the kind referred to in this case. It might very well be that one could be used without any risk of injury to persons on the sidewalk while the other could not.

Finding no error in the rulings of the Court below, the judgment will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed, with costs to the appellee.

NOTE.

Liability of Owner of Building for Injury to Pedestrian Resulting from Erection of Scaffold for Repairing or Painting Building.

In General, 123.

Act of Independent Contractor:

General Rule, 123.

Exception to Rule, 125.

In General.

It seems that the owner of a building is liable for an injury to a pedestrian resulting from the carelessness of his employees in using a scaffold while making repairs to the building. Keyes v. Bangor Second Baptist Church, 99 Me. 308, 59 Atl. 446. It appeared in that case that the defendants were engaged in making repairs to a church building owned by them, and that the plaintiff was injured by a board which fell from a scaffold. It was held to be a question for the jury whether the defendants had erected proper barriers or given proper warning to pedestrians. The defendants claimed that they were not liable because the work of enlarging the church was given to an independent contractor but the court in disposing of this contention said: "The contract of the defendants with Otto Nelson . . . does not state, nor can it be reasonably implied from its terms, that Nelson was 'employed to do a job of work.' He and his men, in express terms, were hired by the day. No time was specified in which he should complete the work; no specifications as to what work or how it should be done. The defendants so far as the contract itself shows not only had the right, but must necessarily have controlled and directed not only Nelson's men, but Nelson himself, with respect to everything that was to be done upon that church, for the contract does not refer to any plans, specifications, architect or any person, even, to whom Nelson should go for instructions. All the contractor could have done under this bare contract, without any other information or directions, when he and his men arrived at the church ready for duty, would have been to remain idle and wait, until some person vested with proper authority, directed them what to do. Under the contract Nelson was to furnish the labor and the materials, and every thing else essential to the performance of the work, was, by necessary implication, to be furnished by the defendants. . . . The evidence taken in connection with the written contract of Nelson conclusively shows that Nelson instead of 'not acting,' did act under the direction and control of his employers, 'and did not determine' for himself in what manner the work should be done. He was compelled to so act, if he worked at all, and did so act. We are also unable to see any reason why, at any time if they so desired, the defendants could not have discharged Nelson and all his men without subjecting themselves to any liability whatever, for breach of contract. Nelson was not an independent contractor and the ruling of the presiding justice must stand."

As to the liability of a person maintaining an awning, sign or similar object suspended over a street, for personal injuries caused by its fall, see the notes to Waller v. Ross, 10 Ann. Cas. 715, and McCrorey v. Thomas, 17 Ann. Cas. 373.

Act of Independent Contractor.

GENERAL RULE.

The owner of a building is not liable for an injury to a pedestrian caused by the negligence of an independent contractor in the use or erection of a scaffold put up for the purpose of painting or repairing the building. Geist v. Rothschild, 90 Ill. App. 324; Davis v. John L. Whiting, etc. Co. 201 Mass. 91,

87 N. E. 199; Regan v. Superb Theater, 220 Mass. 259, 107 N. E. 984; Mehler v. Fisch, 65 Misc. 549, 120 N. Y. S. 807. And see the reported case. See also Hurlstone v. London Electric Ry. 30 Times L. Rep. (Eng.) 398; McCarty v. Second Parish, etc. 71 Me. 318, 36 Am. Rep. 320. In Geist v. Rothschild, supra, it appeared that defendant made a contract for the doing of certain carpentry and painting work on its department store building. The contractor agreed to furnish all labor and materials and provide all necessary scaffolding and implements necessary therefor. The contractor sublet the painting part of the contract and retained no supervision over that work, which was done under the general supervision of an architect selected by the defendant, though he in no way controlled or directed the men doing the painting, or the manner of doing it, or directed the appliances to be used. While the plaintiff, a pedestrian, was passing the building, one of the slack ends of the rope by which the painter's scaffold was suspended, and which had been coiled up thereon, fell and struck her, causing serious injuries. It was held that the owner of the building was not liable. The court said: "No case has been cited by counsel, nor have we been able to find any authority which holds that there is such a primary duty or obligation upon the owner of a building to persons passing along on an adjoining public sidewalk, or to prospective customers who are going toward his premises where he conducts a public business, that he is liable in damages for the negligence of an independent contractor to such persons, when the injury occurs while they are going along such public sidewalk, or to such customers before they actually come upon the premises where he is conducting his business, or into some passageway or entrance way used as a part of the owner's premises. . . . It is claimed by counsel for plaintiff that the owner is only relieved from liability for the negligence of his contractor whom he employs to perform work upon his premises by an independent contract, when the entire and exclusive control of the premises is surrendered to such contractor. We cannot give our assent to this contention, as in our opinion, it is not sustained by authority to the extent claimed. . . . The fact that the work was to be inspected by the architect to see that it was done according to the contract, does not make the defendant liable."

In Regan v. Superb Theatre, 220 Mass. 259, 107 N. E. 984, it appeared that the suit was brought to recover for personal injuries received by the plaintiff from the upsetting or tipping over of a stage erected by the employees of an independent contractor, for use by them in connection with the painting of a marquee over the entrance to the defendant theater. At the time of its tipping over it stood on the sidewalk, parallel to the entrance to the theater and somewhat nearer to the entrance than to the curbstone. The men who worked on it had left it ten or fifteen minutes before, unwatched and unguarded. The plaintiff left her home to see the performance at the theater. She passed by the side of the staging, arrived in front of the entrance, and was about to enter, when the staging, seemingly lifted by a gust of wind, tipped over on her and threw her into a corner of the doorway. The staging was built of two trestles, each eight or nine feet high, standing eight or nine feet apart, connected by one or two boards or planks nine inches wide and one and a half or two inches thick, and not at either end fastened to the trestles. The ends of the boards or planks rested on the second rung from the top of the trestles, and the horizontal line of the plank was about seven feet above the sidewalk. The staging could be moved about as needed. The court in holding that the owner of the building was not liable said: "In the furnishing and erection of this staging the defendant had no part. In the painting it was interested only to see that the contract was performed in accordance with its terms. There was no occasion to anticipate that injurious consequences necessarily might follow from the placing and use on the sidewalk of a staging adequate for the work expected or required to be done by men who were to paint the marquee which was to be placed over the entrance to the theater building. In fact no harm came from the form of the structure, from the manner of its use, or from the careless acts of men in the execution of work while upon it. No one could foresee that the men would leave the staging unwatched and unguarded in the middle of a crowded sidewalk for more than a momentary period of time. . . . There was no liability on the part of the defendant, and the verdict for the defendant was rightly ordered."

In Davis v. John L. Whiting, etc. Co. 201 Mass. 91, 87 N. E. 199, it appeared that the defendant contracted with a painter to paint the iron shutters of a building occupied and kept in repair by the defendant. In the performance of the work, a light ladder scaffold was used, and while this was being raised by tackle hung from the cornice, it came in contact with the bottom of a shutter which had been carelessly left open and raised it off its hinges, so that it fell on a passer-by in the street. The defendant was held not to be liable, the court saying: "The jury were instructed to answer this question: 'Was the work of painting the shutters on the building necessarily attended with danger to persons passing along Belcher Lane?' They answered it in the affirmative. If the question meant, 'Was there such risk of accident from the probable negligence or want of skill of some of the workmen as necessarily to involve an appreciable danger of injury to persons passing below,' there was evidence to warrant the finding. But the finding of this fact would not create a liability on the part of the defendant." In Mehler v. Fisch, 65 Misc. 549, 120 N. Y. S. 807, the petition alleged that the defendant, her agents, and employees were engaged in painting the front wall of the defendant's house, and while so engaged the defendant, her agents, and employees conducted the work so negligently that a scaffold fell and injured the plaintiff. At the trial it was shown by the evidence that the painting was being done, not by the defendant's servants, but by independent contractors. The trial justice submitted the case to the jury on the theory that the defendant was liable for the acts of the contractors if the jury believed that, in spite of her contract that the work should be performed by independent contractors, she, through her husband, supervised and took part in the work, or if the defendant did not exercise care in the selection of experienced and competent contractors. There was a verdict for the plaintiff and the appellate court in deciding whether the judgment could be sustained on the theories under which the case was submitted, said: "Upon the first point the justice's charge was correct, but there is not sufficient evidence to sustain a verdict for the plaintiff upon this point. The plaintiff claims that he heard the defendant's husband order the contractors to hoist the scaffold; but he does not state that the defendant's husband was even present at the time of the accident. Plaintiff's own witnesses do not corroborate him on this point, and his testimony is directly and circumstantially denied by the husband and by both contractors. I do not think that the respondent could seriously contend that the plaintiff has borne the burden of producing a preponderance of evidence upon this point. Nor can the judgment be sustained upon the theory that the owner did not exercise due care in engaging competent contractors. Even if the owner is under a duty, the plaintiff has not shown any failure to perform it. The work done here was not hazardous, nor requiring great skill. The contractors, while not long in this country and only just beginning to work for themselves, testify that they have had long experience as journeymen in work of this kind. Absolutely the only evidence of incompetence is the fall of the scaffold. Under such circumstances a judgment against the defendant could be sustained only upon the theory that the exemption of liability of an employer for the acts of an independent contractor is an exception to the rule of respondent superior, and that the defendant must show facts which will bring him within the exception. I do not think that that is the law. The employer is not liable for the acts of the contractor, because the relation of principal and agent does not exist. If he is liable in this case, it is only for his own acts, and the plaintiff must show that he owed him a duty and has failed to perform such duty."

In McCarthy v. Second Parish, etc. 71 Me. 318, 36 Am. Rep. 320, it appeared that one who was engaged in business as a "slater" was employed to repair the roof of a church. While he and his employees were at work, they carelessly allowed a ladder which they used to get on and off the roof to be blown down by the wind and injure a passer-by. It was held that the owners of the church were not liable on the ground that the negligent act was the act of an independent contractor. See to the same effect Press v. Penny, 242 Mo. 98, 145 S. W. 458.

EXCEPTION TO RULE.

The owner of a building is liable for the negligence of an independent contractor in the use of a scaffold or ladder while engaged in painting or repairing the building where the negligence consists in the failure to perform a duty which the owner of the building cannot delegate. Moore v. Townsend, 76 Minn. 64, 78 N. W. 880. See also Press v. Penny, 242 Mo. 98, 145 S. W. 458. And see the reported case. In Moore v. Townsend, supra, it appeared that a painter who had been employed to paint the defendant's building placed one end of the ladder which he was using in the street, inclined it over the walk and rested the upper end against the building. The ladder was left in this position after the work had been completed for a period of thirteen days when it was blown down by an unusual blast of wind and injured a passer-by. The owner of the building was held to be liable. The court said: "The occupants and the owner of the building, without surrendering control over it, permitted the painter to create a nuisance in the public street when they allowed him to put the ladder in a position over the walk where it was a continual menace to all persons within its reach should it fall down. . . . By employing an independent contractor the owner or occupants of the building could not relieve themselves of the continuing duty which they owed to the public not to create or maintain a public nuisance on their premises. Nor could the village absolve itself of a like duty in respect to permitting a nuisance to be maintained, partly or wholly, in its streets. If a ladder placed over the sidewalk, as this was, could be allowed to endanger the lives and limbs of passers-by, the keeping open of a coal hole in a sidewalk could be defended on the same grounds. . . . There is nothing in the claim that defendants were not guilty of negligence, because the ladder was blown down by an unusual wind. The negligence of the defendants, owner and occupants, in allowing the ladder to be inclined and to remain across the walk, and of the village, after its officers had knowledge of the fact, was the efficient cause of the injury to plaintiff. The fact that some other cause operated in connection with this negligence could not relieve defendants from liability. The original negligence concurred with another cause, and, operating at the same moment, produced the injury. The original negligent act of placing one end of the ladder in the public street, inclining it over the walk, and resting the upper end against the building, thus creating a public nuisance, was the proximate cause of the accident, and without this act plaintiff's injuries would not have been received."

v.

NIPPER ET AL.

North Carolina Supreme Court—March 26, 1914.

166 N. Car. 272; 81 S. E. 164.

Convicts — Corporal Punishment.

Laws 1909, c. 281, § 6, applicable to Wake county, provides that convicts sentenced to hard labor shall be under the control of the county commissioners, who shall have power to enforce all needful regulations for the successful working of convicts on the highways, and may authorize the supervisors in custody to use such discipline only as may be necessary to carry out the regulations to the same extent as is allowed by law to the authorities of the penitentiary as to convicts employed in the state's prison. It is held that, since there is no law authorizing the authorities of the state's prison to enforce the discipline by flogging, supervisors in charge of a camp of convicts working on the roads in Wake county are not authorized by mere custom or otherwise to flog a convict under their charge, to enforce discipline and compel him to work.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake county: COOKE, Judge.

Criminal action. J. M. Nipper et al., convicted of assault and appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Attorney General Bickett and Assistant Attorney General Calvert for State.

R. N. Simms, Armistead Jones & Son and J. W. Bunn for defendants.

[273] CLARK, C. J.—The defendant Nipper was supervisor in charge of a camp of convicts working upon the roads of Wake County, and the defendant Johnson was a guard at said camp. They were charged with assaulting, beating, and wounding one Dan Gallagher, a convict under their charge and supervision, with a leather strap 16 inches long and 3½ inches wide, attached to a wooden handle 5 inches long, whereby he was badly beaten and bruised. Said Gallagher was a man between 40 and 45 years of age. He was flogged on his bare flesh. A few hours later he was taken ill, and died that afternoon. The county physician testified that he did not think the death of the said Gallagher was attributable in any way to the whipping. The chastisement was inflicted for refusal to work when ordered to do so. It was in evidence that "chastisement with a strap as a means of discipline for prisoners had been in general use and adoption and had been generally practiced in Wake County for more than a generation."

The court stated from the bench, before the argument began, that "after full consideration of the subject, he had reached the conclusion that under the Constitution and laws of this State the authorities who have control over convicts have no right to administer whippings to them for causes of discipline, and that this feature was eliminated from the further discussion of the case." The exception to this presents the controversy before us. The jury found the defendants guilty, and his Honor imposed a fine of $10 and costs on each defendant.

The indictment was not for homicide, but for assault. It was doubtless due to the fact that there was absence of all evidence of malice, the testimony of the physician above stated, and the further evidence that the use of such punishment had always been customary, that his Honor imposed so light a punishment.

The Attorney-General presents for our consideration the fact that the Constitution, Art. XI, sec. 1, declares that "Death, imprisonment [274] with or without hard labor, fines, removal from office, and disqualification to hold office" shall be the only punishments known to the laws of this State. Previous to 1868 we had retained the common-law punishments by which many corporal punishments could be inflicted, such as branding for manslaughter.

ter, cropping the ears for perjury, setting in the stocks, and flogging. The Constitution of 1868 intended by the above provisions to restrict the sentences which might be imposed by the courts upon conviction of crime to those above enumerated.

This constitutional provision has no direct application to the discipline required in our jails and penitentiaries, for if so it would prevent solitary confinement, restriction of rations, and other reasonable punishments that are in customary use in prisons and penitentiaries.

The question whether flogging can be used as part of the discipline in our State and county prisons depends not alone upon the constitutional provision, but also upon the question whether it is reasonable or authorized. Laws 1909, ch. 281, sec. 6, provides: "The convicts sentenced for hard labor shall be under the control of the county commissioners of said county, and said authorities shall have power to enact and enforce all needful rules and regulations for the successful working of all convicts upon the highways, and commit to the superintendent or supervisors the custody of the whole and any part of the convict force. And they may authorize and empower them to use such discipline only as may be necessary to carry out the rules and regulations in the working of the highways to which said convicts may be put by the order of the county commissioners to the same extent as is allowed by law to the authorities of the penitentiary in the custody and control of convicts committed to the State's Prison." This act is applicable only to Wake County.

We find no rule or regulation of the county commissioners authorizing the flogging of convicts, and as we find no authority of law given the State's Prison authorities to inflict such punishment, such regulation by the county commissioners would be void and no protection to the defendants, if it had been made.

It is true that flogging has been customary in the State's Prison, and also in the county convict camps; but that is no defense, since there is no statute authorizing it, unless such discipline is reasonable and necessary. In the absence of such statute, [275] whether any given measure of discipline can be authorized by those in charge of the State and county prisoners depends upon whether the measure of discipline is reasonably necessary. In view of the enlightenment of this age, and the progress which has been made in prison discipline, we have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that corporal punishment by flogging is not reasonable, and cannot be sustained. That which degrades and embrothers a man cannot be either necessary or reasonable.

Originally, flogging was recognized as a proper punishment in the armies and navies of the world. But it has long since been abolished in those services everywhere, notwithstanding the protests of officials who declared that the result would be mutiny and disorganization. Flogging has been long since abolished as a part of prison discipline by all the great and enlightened nations of the world, except Russia. In England, France, Germany, Austria, Italy, Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, Spain, and by the government of the United States, and even in Mexico and in most other civilized countries, the lash as an adjunct of prison discipline has long since been forbidden. In Mexico, in 1903, Art. 385 was adopted: "The lash or any other violent physical punishment shall not be employed" either as a sentence of the court or as a part of prison discipline. This has been taken substantially from the statutes obtaining in the more advanced countries.

The statute in New York provides: "No guard in any prison shall inflict any blows whatsoever upon any prisoner, unless in self-defense or to suppress a revolt or insurrection." Statutes or regulations to the same effect abolishing flogging prevail in all the northern and western States, 32 out of 48, and it is there looked upon as a survival of barbarism. In many of the southern States, as in Maryland, District of Columbia, West Virginia, Oklahoma, Tennessee, Texas, and others, it has also been abolished and prohibited. This is one of the very few States in which it has been retained, and here not by authority of law, but as a matter of custom, and is the survival, doubtless, of a former condition of society, and it has lingered here, probably, owing to the fact that an unusually large part of our criminal population are colored.

The growing humanity of the age demands that punishment for crime, however justly inflicted, should be humanely administered, [276] with due regard to the rights of the prisoner. About a century and a quarter ago, when the celebrated John Howard visited the prisons of Europe, he awoke the world to a realization of evils inflicted upon prisoners in England, and in other countries. He found that "the prisons were for the most part pestiferous dens, overcrowded, dark, foully dirty, not only ill-ventilated, but deprived altogether of fresh air. The wretched inmates were dependent for food upon the caprice of their jailers or the charity of the benevolent; water was denied them except in the scantiest proportions; their only bedding was putrid straw. Every one in durance, whether tried or untried, was heavily ironed. All alike were subject to the rapacity of their jailers and the extortions of their fellows. Jail fees were levied ruthlessly; also a contribution was paid by each individual to a common fund to be spent by the whole body generally in drink. Idleness, drunkenness, vicious intercourse, sickness, starvation, squalor, cruelty, chains, awful depression, and everywhere culpable neglect. In these words may be summed up the state of the jails at the time of Howard's visitation. At this time prisons were primarily places of detention, not of punishment, peopled by accused persons still innocent in the eyes of the law, and debtors guilty of breaches of the financial rules of a commercial country, framed chiefly in the interest of the creditor. Freedom from arrest was guaranteed by Magna Carta, save on a criminal charge; yet thousands were committed to jail on legal fictions and retained indefinitely for costs far in excess of the original debt. The impecunious were locked up and deprived of all hope of earning means to obtain enlargement; while their families and persons dependent on them shared their imprisonment and added to the overcrowding. The prisons were always full. Jail deliveries were a rare occurrence, and even when tardy trial ended in acquittal, release was delayed until illegal charges in the way of fees had been satisfied." Encyclopedia Britannica, Art. "Prison." Our Constitution of 1868 abolished imprisonment for debt as well as all corporal punishment.

We also know from the history of those times that even in England prisoners had no allowance from the Government for food, and were indebted to the contributions of charity or to the consideration of the jailer for their daily sustenance, and that when acquitted or discharged they were detained by the jailer [277] till the debt for their support was liquidated by their friends. When it was proposed in Parliament that the Government should pay the jailers a salary, and should afford food for the prisoners at the public expense, a most serious and prolonged opposition was made against the incurring of such expense by the public.

Under the agitation begun by the investigations of Howard and maintained by the ability of Jeremy Bentham, a reform of prison discipline was begun which has alleviated to some extent the tyranny often inflicted upon those who were till then treated as if deprived of all rights as human beings because deprived of their personal liberty. It has been found that it is unsafe and unjust to intrust to the discretion of men, often of bad judgment and sometimes of evil passions, the infliction of corporal punishment upon helpless prisoners who, protected by no publicity and without any trial for breaches of discipline, are subjected to the arbitrary power of those in charge of them.

Further back in the so-called days of chivalry, throughout Europe every baron and lordling had beneath the lower floor of his castle a cellar into which he cast without trial, and often without food, in the mire and ooze, any one who displeased him. Their only avenger were the diseases which, rising from such pollution, often devastated the families of those on the upper floors, who spent their time in dancing and revelry while the unhappy victims, without light, often without food, were groaning in the underground receptacles, where, amid pollution and filth, they passed to miserable death. From that state of things to the condition found by John Howard was a gradation, but very far from what now obtains generally throughout civilized countries. The usual appeal for the maintenance of abuses is to the usages of the common law and of past ages, but cannot be maintained.

In 9 Cyc. 877, it is said: "A convict who violates any of the prison regulations may be subjected to solitary confinement or such other reasonable punishment as the statute may authorize (Boone v. State, 8 Lea (Tenn.) 739); but corporal punishment cannot lawfully be inflicted without legislative sanction. Smith v. State, 8 Lea (Tenn.) 744." The survival of flogging in a few of the Southern States only is doubtless due to the public attitude as to this matter which has descended to us from a former state of society. It is utterly tabooed elsewhere. Delaware and Maryland retain flogging, not as a part of prison discipline, [278] but as a court sentence for "wife beaters"—admirable arrangement and a most just application of the lex talionis.

There can be no analogy to the corporal punishment which is sometimes inflicted on pupils in the public schools. In those cases there is the utmost publicity as a deterrent against abuse and the protection of the parent, or other relatives, of the pupil. Still less is there any analogy to the punishment of a child by its parent. In that case, besides the protection of public sentiment, there is the safeguard of natural affection. The common-law right of a husband to chastise his wife was held as late as State v. Rhodes, 61 N. C. 453, 98 Am. Dec. 78, where a husband was held not guilty upon a special verdict that he "whipped his wife without provocation, with a switch as large as his finger, but no larger than his thumb," citing State v. Black, 60 N. C. 263, 86 Am. Dec. 436, which held that if there was no permanent injury nor excessive violence, the law permitted the husband to thrash her "to make her behave herself," and that if the courts intervened it would "encourage insubordination" on the part of wives. But in 1874, in State v. Oliver, 70 N. C. 60, without any intervening statute, it was held that we had "advanced beyond that barbarism." Yet the wife had the protection of the affection of her husband and of public opinion. There is no protection to prisoners in jail. They are under a cloud, and receive small sympathy from any one. The discipline is necessarily peremptory, and when punishment is inflicted by flogging, whether it is justly imposed or not rests in the bosom of the officer who orders it. There is no inquiry or publicity, either as to the justice of the punishment or of its extent as commensurate with the offense. The extent of punishment, if legal, is committed to the arbitrary power of men who may happen to be unjust or of bad judgment. Their action is irreviewable except when in some cases of gross excess the matter may possibly be brought to public attention, and then the victim is at every disadvantage. The punishment, if by flogging, has already been inflicted, whether justly or not, and the suffering and degradation cannot be removed. The victim is usually ignorant and always impecunious and generally without friends. His fellow convicts often dare not testify in his behalf, and their testimony will not carry the weight given to statements made by those in authority. In such circumstances, abuse is easy and almost invited. And reparation is impossible when [279] wrong has been done. Suppose a young man of otherwise good record is sentenced in a recorder's court without a grand jury and without a jury trial for carrying a concealed weapon or for an affray or other offense not involving moral turpitude, and while in jail or on the roads he should violate some order of the prison authorities, shall he be flogged as Gallagher was, and disgraced for life? We have no decision sustaining the right to flog prisoners to be overruled, as in the case of husband and wife, above cited.

In view of these considerations and the impolicy of subjecting men without trial, at the arbitrary will of other men, to a punishment whose effect must be to destroy the self-respect of the victim and harden and embroil him, it is no wonder that the intelligence and humanity of the age has abolished flogging, in all but a few States of this country, as any part of prison discipline. While our constitutional provision against the infliction of corporal punishment as a part of the sentence of the courts does not directly prohibit its infliction in prison discipline, its spirit is certainly against the longer use of flogging for that purpose.

The smallness of the sentence imposed in this case (a fine of $10 each and the costs) indicates that the humane and just judge who tried this cause deemed that the act of the defendants was without aggravation, and that they were only following the custom which has been observed in this State up to this time. We have been, however, discussing the legal rights of prisoners, and we find no authority for its longer continuance.

In at least two of the States, where the parole system obtains, it has been found that prisoners can be worked, with some exceptions, by humane methods which require the imposition of no punishment and by the hope of reward and by the shortening of their sentences for good conduct. In others a modification of that system has been successful. These are matters, however, which rest with the Legislature and the prison authorities.

We may note that the act of 1911, ch. 64, prescribing that persons sentenced to work on the public roads for misdemeanors shall not wear felon's stripes, is an indication that the Legislature did not intend that prisoners should be subjected to any unnecessary degradation. We are constrained to say that there is no statute or decision in this State that authorizes the infliction of flogging as a part of prison discipline, and that it is contrary [280] to the spirit, at least, of the constitutional provision referred to. Such being the case, we must hold that the flogging of Gallagher was inflicted illegally and without authority of law.

No error.

Hoke, J. (concurring).—I concur in the disposition made of this appeal and am of opinion that the laws of North Carolina applicable to the subject do not refer the control and discipline of prisoners to the unregulated discretion of subordinate administrative officials. The general statute on the subject of working convicts on the public roads, Rev. 1905, sec. 1356, provides that "The county authorities shall have power to enact all needful rules and regulations for the successful working of convicts on the public roads," etc., and the law of 1909, the statute specially applicable to Wake County, confers like power on the authorities of that county, with the limitation that the regulations made shall be in accord with those which prevail in the State's Prison—a limitation which does not obtain unless and until the authorities of the State's Prison shall have made such rules. These statutes clearly contemplate that the control and discipline of convicts and particularly in reference to their punishment, corporal or other, shall be pursuant to rules formally made and published by the board of county commissioners, or their duly authorized agents, and I would not hesitate to hold that these rules should be humane, reasonably designed to affect the well ordered governance of convicts, and that, in their prominent features, they should be made known beforehand to each and every prisoner, that they may live and act with knowledge of the penalties attendant on disobedience. In applying such a standard, I am not prepared to say that never, under any circumstances, is corporal punishment permissible, or that carefully prepared rules, looking to such result, are, in all instances, unlawful; but the question is not presented on this appeal, for there is no proof or suggestion that there were any rules or regulations of any kind which authorized the punishment inflicted in the present case. I am of opinion, therefore, that acts of defendants were without warrant of law and that they have been properly convicted.

Walker, J., and Brown, J., concurring in this opinion.

NOTE.

Right to Inflict Corporal Punishment on Convict.

The right to inflict corporal punishment on a convict is governed largely by the statutes of the different jurisdictions regulating the care, discipline, and treatment of convicts. The rule laid down in Westbrook v. State, 18 Ann. Cas. 295, that, in construing those statutes, the tendency of the courts is to discountenance corporal punishment, is supported by the recent cases.

Thus in the reported case, the court construes a North Carolina statute (Laws 1909, ch. 281, § 6) which provides as to convicts in the county where the cause of action arose, as follows: "The convicts sentenced for hard labor shall be under the control of the county commissioners of said county, and said authorities shall have power to enact and enforce all needful rules and regulations for the successful working of all convicts upon the highways, and commit to the superintendent or supervisors the custody of the whole and any part of the convict force. And they may authorize and empower them to use such discipline only as may be necessary to carry out the rules and regulations in the working of the highways to which said convicts may be put by the order of the county commissioners to the same extent as is allowed by law to the authorities of the penitentiary in the custody and control of convicts committed to the State's prison." The court adverts to the absence of any rule or regulation of the county commissioners authorizing the flogging of convicts, and says that such a rule would be void if made, as there is no authority of law given the prison authorities to inflict such punishment. The corporal punishment of convicts by flogging, the court holds, is unreasonable and cannot be sustained.

Likewise, in State v. Morris, 166 N. C. 441, 81 S. E. 462, wherein it appeared that there were no written rules or regulations and there was no evidence that the county commissioners had formulated or adopted any rules or regulations for the discipline of convicts, in affirming the conviction of the superintendent of a chain gang for whipping a convict, the decision of the court in the reported case was held to be controlling, and though there was a difference of opinion among the members of the court on some of the questions raised in the reported case, it was agreed by all that in the absence of rules and regulations by the county commissioners, guards had no right to whip convicts.

In Stephens v. Conley, 48 Mont. 352, Ann. Cas. 1915D 958, 138 Pac. 189, which was an action for damages by a convict, against the warden of the penitentiary, the complaint alleged that the defendant as warden, caused him to be (a) confined in a cell with an insane Italian and (b) with a negro, (c) to be shackled, manacled and placed in a dungeon and confined on a bread and water diet, and (d) assaulted, beaten and wounded, his collarbone broken, and his head and chest cut and bruised. It was held that he could not recover for such treatment, where it appeared that (a) the Italian's insanity was not known to the prison officials, and the plaintiff did not complain or request a change; (b) that on account of the crowded condition of the prison it was necessary to confine some one in the cell with the negro; (c) that the punishments enumerated above were a species of punishment provided for by the state prison board, pursuant to statutory authority, in certain rules and regulations made by them for the management of the penitentiary and the discipline of the convicts, and that the infliction of the punishment on the prisoner was necessary to compel his submission to the prison authority; and (d) that the injuries complained of, were received in the quelling by the prison guards of a riot and attempt to escape from the prison, in which the plaintiff took a leading part, actually participating in the murder of the deputy warden and an assault on the warden, which occurred at that time.

For a discussion of the personal liability of a prison officer to a convict for tort, see the note to Stephens v. Conley, Ann. Cas. 1915D 958.

v.

MACKAY.

Vermont Supreme Court—December 10, 1913.

97 Vt. 271; 89 Atl. 228.

Fish and Game — Requirement of License to Hunt — Persons Entitled to License — Alien.

Acts 1912, No. 201, § 47, provides that, if the applicant for a hunter's license is a bona fide resident of the state, or owns improved realty listed for taxes at $1,000, he shall pay 75 cents. Section 48 provides that, if he is a nonresident, and does not own improved realty of a certain valuation, he shall pay $10. Section 1 provides that the word "resident" as used in the act is intended to cover "all citizens of the United States who have lived in this state for not less than six months" before applying, and that the term "nonresident" shall include all persons not coming within the definition of "resident." Section 4, subd. 3, provides that game or fish protected by law, if taken by a nonresident, may be transported without the state as provided. Held, that one who had for 14 years been a bona fide resident and taxpayer of the state, though not on real estate of the required value, but was not a citizen of the United States, being a subject of Italy, was not entitled to a license.

Validity of Statute.

Const. c. 2, § 63, provides that the inhabitants of a state shall have liberty in seasonable times to hunt on their own lands and others not inclosed, and take fish in all waters under proper regulations, and chapter 1, art. 5, provides that the "people of this state by their legal representatives have the sole . . . right of governing and regulating the internal police of the same." Held, that article 5 authorized the enactment of Acts 1912, No. 201, requiring hunting licenses, section 1 of which provides that the word "resident" as used in the act which provides that, if applicant is a bona fide resident or owner of improved realty of a certain taxable value, he shall pay a certain fee shall "cover all citizens of the United States" living in the state for not less than 6 months, even though the section is construed to exclude a resident alien.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Wild game belongs to the people of the state in their collective capacity except so far as private ownership is acquired under the Constitution.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The legislature may regulate the right to take game, with respect to its decrease as well as its preservation and increase.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Acts 1912, No. 201, § 1, providing that the word "resident" as used in the act which requires one hunter's license fee of a bona fide resident or property owner, and another in case of a nonresident, shall cover all citizens of the United States living in the state for 6 months, does not contravene Const. U. S. amend. 14, relating to the equal protection of the law, even if construed to exclude a resident alien and taxpayer from obtaining a license.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A hunting license fee of $10.50 required by Acts 1912, No. 201, § 48, of nonresidents is not unreasonable.

Treaties — Right of Resident Alien — Exclusion from Privilege of Hunting.

The treaty between the United States and Italy (Feb. 26, 1871, 17 Stat. 845) providing that citizens of each country shall enjoy the same rights and privileges which are granted to the natives is not violated by Acts 1912, No. 201, § 1, providing that the word "resident" as used in the act which related to hunters' licenses is intended to include all citizens of the United States, though the section construed excludes from obtaining a license an Italian subject who is both a resident and a taxpayer.

Construction of Treaty.

Treaties conferring rights upon the subjects of a foreign nation partake of the nature of municipal law, and will be treated and construed as a statute, if the right can be enforced by the courts, and the treaty prescribes a rule for its determination.

Same.

A treaty provision should receive a reasonable construction with reference to the purpose of the treaty and the intention of the parties.

Original petition for mandamus. Abramo Bondi, petitioner, and James MacKay, defendant. The facts are stated in the opinion. PETITION DISMISSED.

Richard A. Hoar for petitioner.

Rufus E. Brown, John G. Sargent and Henry B. Shaw for State.

[273] MUNSON, J.—Our fish and game statute provides, with certain exceptions not material here, that "no person shall at any time hunt, trap, shoot, pursue, take or kill wild animals, wild fowl or birds in this State, nor use a gun for hunting the same, . . . without having first procured a license therefor. . . ." The license is to be issued by town clerks under such rules and regulations and in such form as may be prescribed by the fish and game commissioner. The statute requires the payment of a license fee, the amount of which depends upon the classification of the applicant. "If the applicant is a bona fide resident of this State or owns improved real estate therein and pays taxes thereon, on the listers' appraised valuation of not less than one thousand dollars," he is to pay seventy-five cents. "If the applicant is a non-resident and does not own improved real estate upon which he pays taxes on the appraised valuation by the listers of not less than one thousand dollars," he is to pay ten dollars and a clerk's fee of fifty cents. Acts 1912, No. 201, §§ 47, 48. Section one of the same act provides as follows: "The word resident as used in this act is intended to cover all citizens of the United States who have lived in this State for not less than six months prior to date of making application for a license."—"The term non-resident as used in this act, shall include all persons not coming within the definition of resident as set forth in this act."

It appears from an agreed statement of facts that the petitioner is now, and for the past fourteen years has been, a bona fide resident and taxpayer of the city of Barre; but that he does not now own, and has not owned, improved real estate within this State upon which he now pays, or has paid, taxes on the listers' appraisal of one thousand dollars. The petitioner was born in Italy, and has never been naturalized. The petitioner is the clerk of the city of Barre. The petitioner applied to the petitioner for a resident hunter's license, and offered to comply with all the prescribed regulations, including the payment of the seventy-five cents fee. The petitioner refused to issue to the petitioner a resident hunter's license, solely on the ground that he was not a citizen of the United States or of this State, [274] and did not own improved real estate upon which he paid taxes on an appraised valuation by the listers of one thousand dollars.

The first question is whether the petitioner is a bona fide resident of this State within the meaning of the statute. It is not necessary to inquire regarding the meaning of the word "resident" as used in statutes relating to the qualification of voters or the support of the poor. The meaning of the word as used in this statute is determined by the statute itself. The word resident "is intended to cover all citizens of the United States who have lived in this State" the required period, and is intended to exclude all persons who are not within this definition, as is manifest from the accompanying definition of non-resident. This plainly confines the class who are entitled to the cheaper license to citizens of the United States. It is agreed that the petitioner has been a bona fide resident of this State the prescribed period, but this is immaterial in his case because of his want of United States citizenship. It is not necessary, in this branch of the inquiry, to consider the word "resident" as synonymous with or distinguished from the word "inhabitant" on the one hand, or the word "citizen" on the other hand. It will not avail the petitioner to treat the word "resident" as used in § 48 as synonymous with "inhabitant," unless the word "citizen" as used in the definition contained in § 1 is given the force of "inhabitant." If this were done, the provision would be that all inhabitants of the United States who had been bona fide inhabitants of this State for six months were entitled to a license on payment of the smaller fee. But it is not to be supposed that the Legislature, in referring to citizens of the sovereignty which has the exclusive power of converting aliens into citizens, used the word "citizens" in the sense of "inhabitants."

Subdivision C of § 4 of the statute provides that "wild game or fish protected by law if taken by a non-resident may be transported by him from a point within the State to a point out of the State," under certain regulations; and the petitioner argues that this is virtually a definition of the term "non-resident." It might easily be so treated in the absence of a more specific provision; for the association of the right of removal from the State with persons designated as non-residents, taken by itself, points to the use of the term in its ordinary sense. But this provision is to be construed in connection with a special statutory definition, the controlling effect of which has already been indicated. [275] The petitioner's want of the citizenship which is acquired by naturalization will be fatal to his claim, unless the statute is in conflict with some constitutional or treaty provision.

The petitioner contends that if the word resident as used in § 48 is restricted to citizens by force of the definition in § 1, the statute is in conflict with the constitution of this State, and also with the Federal constitution. In considering this objection as applied to our State constitution, the nature of the property had in wild game and the status of the petitioner with reference to it must first be determined. In citing Chapter II of our constitution the references are to the sections as recently renumbered, unless otherwise indicated.

It will be well to refer at the outset to Chap. II, § 39 of the early constitutions,—a section adopted and readopted while Vermont was exercising the powers of an independent State. That section, now embodied in part in Chap. II, § 62, was as follows: "Every person of good character, who comes to settle in this State, having first taken an oath or affirmation of allegiance to the same, may purchase, or by other just means acquire, hold and transfer land, or other real estate; and after one year's residence shall be deemed a free denizen thereof, and entitled to all rights of a natural born subject of this State, except that he shall not be capable of being elected Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Treasurer, Councillor, or Representative in Assembly, until after two years' residence." The first clause of this provision was needed to secure to an alien some of the rights enumerated, but was not well adapted to the status of one who had taken an oath of allegiance to the State in which he had become a resident. The use of the word "denizen" to designate one entitled to all the rights of a natural born subject shows a lack of technical exactness which might justify, if occasion required, some latitude in the construction of other words pertaining to the same subject. But no question arises directly upon this section, for there has been no taking of the prescribed oath.

Chap. II, § 63 of the constitution reads as follows: "The inhabitants of this State shall have liberty in seasonable times, to hunt and fowl on the lands they hold, and on other lands not enclosed, and in like manner to fish in all boatable and other waters (not private property) under proper regulations, to be made and provided by the General Assembly." Another source of legislative power over this subject is found in Chap. I, Art. 5; [276] which provides, "That the people of this State by their legal representatives, have the sole, inherent, and exclusive right of governing and regulating the internal police of the same." The petitioner claims that the power to adopt proper regulations, given to the Legislature in the last clause of § 63, applies only to fishing, and that the Legislature can regulate hunting only in respect to the seasons. A different view was taken in Zanetta v. Bolles, 80 Vt. 345, 67 Atl. 818, where the restrictive provision of the second clause was applied directly to the liberty to hunt and fowl. But if this were held otherwise, the regulation would be a valid exercise of the police power of the State under Chap. I, Art. 5, above quoted. State v. Theriault, 70 Vt. 617, 41 Atl. 1030, 43 L.R.A. 290, 67 Am. St. Rep. 695.

The nature of all property interests in wild game is fully set forth in our decisions. "The wild game in the State belongs to the people of the State in their collective and sovereign capacity, and not in their individual and private capacity, except so far as private ownership may be acquired therein under the constitution. . . ." Zanetta v. Bolles, 80 Vt. 345, 67 Atl. 818. See also State v. Niles, 78 Vt. 286, 62 Atl. 795, 112 Am. St. Rep. 917; Payne v. Sheets, 75 Vt. 335, 55 Atl. 656; State v. Haskell, 84 Vt. 429, 79 Atl. 852, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 286. The right of the Legislature, in the exercise of the police power, to take measures for the preservation and increase of this common property is fully recognized. State v. Theriault, 70 Vt. 617, 41 Atl. 1030, 43 L.R.A. 290, 67 Am. St. Rep. 695. It is equally within the power of the Legislature to provide for and regulate its decrease, if its development becomes injurious to other property rights.

So the relation of an inhabitant of the State, in his individual capacity, to the State in its sovereign capacity, as regards this common property, is determined by Chap. II, § 63, in connection with Chap. I, Art. 5. If we treat the word "resident" as used in § 48 of the act in question as synonymous with "inhabitant," no difficulty is created; for the inhabitants of the State, in the broader sense, are the people of the State, and the meaning of the latter term in the constitutional provisions affecting this subject is derivable from the constitution itself. "The inhabitants of this State" who are secured rights in game by Chap. II, § 63, are the same as "the people of this State" who are given the power to regulate those rights by Chap. I, Art. 5; and these last are the people who act "by their legal representatives;" [277] a designation which plainly points to the native-born and naturalized inhabitants of the State—the citizen body from which the electorate is taken.

But the petitioner claims that the act conflicts with the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, which secures to all persons the equal protection of the laws. Here the petitioner's claim is to be considered with reference to what he really is, and not with reference to what the statute arbitrarily calls him. He is clearly an actual resident of this State, and the act distinguishes him from others who are residents in a different sense. The petitioner claims that the distinction made between citizens and resident aliens is an unjust and arbitrary discrimination, which renders void the provision regarding licenses. We think the distinction between residents who are citizens and those who are not, made with reference to the acquirement of individual interests in property which belongs to the State, affords a just basis for classification, and that a reasonable discrimination may properly be made against an alien who becomes a permanent resident without taking upon himself the full obligations of citizenship. But the petitioner says that the license fee of ten and one-half dollars is unreasonable and excessive. We think it is not so disproportionate to the privilege as to be in any sense prohibitory. See State v. Norton, 45 Vt. 258.

The petitioner urges further that the provision as we construe it is in conflict with the treaty between the United States and Italy, in that it denies him rights and privileges to which the treaty entitles him. The provision in question is, in substance, that the citizens of each country shall receive in the states and territories of the other the most constant security and protection for their persons and property, and shall enjoy in this respect the same rights and privileges which are granted to natives, provided that they submit themselves to the conditions imposed on natives. The treaties of the United States are the law of the land, superior to the constitution and statutes of any State, and binding upon all courts. U. S. Con. Art. VI. Treaty provisions which confer rights upon the subjects of another nation residing in this country partake of the nature of municipal law; and when the right conferred is one that can be enforced in a court of justice, and the treaty prescribes a rule by which the right is to be determined, the court resorts to the treaty for the rule of decision as it would to a statute. [278] Head Money Cases, 112 U. S. 580, 28 U. S. (L. ed.) 798, 5 S. Ct. 247. The provision under consideration is to receive a reasonable construction, having reference to the purpose of the treaty and the intention of the contracting parties. Under this provision the Italians residing here are to receive complete protection for the property they have or may acquire, and are to have in respect to such property the rights and privileges granted to natives. But there is nothing in this which entitles them to share equally with the natives in such privileges as the Legislature may grant in the wild game of the State, and nothing which seems intended to protect them from the minor discriminations incident to the ordinary exercise of the police power.

Our conclusion is that the petitioner, although by the agreed statement a resident of Barre, is not entitled to a resident hunter's license, because not a citizen of the United States and of this State.

Petition dismissed with costs.

NOTE.

Validity of Statute Requiring License to Hunt Game.

As a general rule a statute requiring a license to hunt game is valid. In re Eberle, 98 Fed. 295; Kyle v. People, 226 Ill. 619, 80 N. E. 1081; State v. Morgan, 133 La. 1033, 63 So. 509; State v. Snowman, 94 Me. 99, 46 Atl. 815, 80 Am. St. Rep. 380, 50 L.R.A. 544; State v. Kirby, 34 S. D. 281, 148 N. W. 533, opinion modified 34 S. D. 497, 149 N. W. 168; State v. Niles, 78 Vt. 266, 62 Atl. 795, 112 Am. St. Rep. 917. And see the reported case. See also Lewis v. State, 110 Ark. 254, 161 S. W. 154; Harper v. Galloway, 58 Fla. 255, 19 Ann. Cas. 235, 51 So. 226, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 794; Cummings v. People, 211 Ill. 392, 71 N. E. 1031; State v. Holcomb, 80 Kan. 243, 101 Pac. 1072; State v. Kooek, 202 Mo. 223, 100 S. W. 630; Ex p. Helton, 117 Mo. App. 609, 93 S. W. 913. Thus in State v. Kirby, 34 S. D. 281, 148 N. W. 533, opinion modified 34 S. D. 497, 149 N. W. 168, the defendant was convicted of the offense of hunting game birds without having procured a license. It was contended on his behalf that the purpose of the act, under which the conviction was had, was to extort money for private use and to penalize the failure to pay a tax for the ancient right to hunt and fish. The court affirming the judgment, said: "He entirely loses sight of the proposition that the fundamental purpose of the act is the protection and preservation of the game and fish for the people of the present as well as for posterity. That the police power of the state is adequate to accomplish this result cannot be questioned. . . . In so far, therefore, as the natural right to hunt and fish is abridged, the law is clearly within constitutional limits." Likewise in Kyle v. People, 226 Ill. 619, 80 N. E. 1081, wherein the defendant was convicted of unlawfully hunting rabbits without obtaining a license to do so, the court said: "The prosecution was under section 25 of chapter 61, (Hurd's Stat. 1905, p. 1114). . . . Section 25 was originally passed in 1903 and contained no reference to rabbits, but provided that no person should pursue or kill with a gun any of the wild animals, fowl or birds that are protected during any part of the year, without the person so killing first obtaining a license. In 1905 this section was amended as above, by inserting the word 'rabbits.' It was manifestly the purpose and intention of the legislature by the amendment to specifically protect rabbits and bring them within the provision requiring hunters to obtain a license before killing them. . . . But, . . . no provision of the Constitution has been pointed out which the statute violates. The power of the legislature to enact statutes if plenary, except in so far as that power has been limited by the Constitution, and every presumption is in favor of the validity of legislative enactments. They will only be declared unconstitutional and void when they are clearly violative of some express constitutional limitation. There is nothing whatever shown in this case against the validity of the section of the statute under which plaintiff in error was found guilty." So in State v. Snowman, 94 Me. 99, 46 Atl. 815, 80 Am. St. Rep. 380, 50 L.R.A. 544, the defendant was found guilty of a violation of the public laws, in acting as a guide for fishing or hunting without having caused his name, age and residence to be recorded in a book kept by the commissioners of inland fisheries and game, and in not having procured from the commissioners a certificate setting forth that he was deemed suitable to act as a guide. Overruling the exceptions as to the constitutionality of the statute the court said: "The privilege of hunting and fishing is granted by the state freely and without price; and it is reasonable and proper that all who avail themselves of such privilege, whether they be fisherman, hunters or guides, should conform and be amenable to such regulations as the state may impose. We are of opinion that the legislature has the constitutional power to regulate the employment of guides in fishing and hunting as provided in the statute in question. The learned counsel for the respondent further contends that, assuming the statute to be otherwise constitutional, the requirement that each person registered and certified under the provisions of the act, shall pay a fee of one dollar, is repugnant to the constitution, and that the statute is for that reason unconstitutional and void. We do not sustain that contention. It is well settled that when the state issues a license to any person to carry on any business or to engage in any vocation, it may exact a reasonable fee therefor. . . . The fee is one placed upon the defendant; and it is not, and in the very nature of things cannot be, contended that the restriction invades any constitutional right of his. It is not the right of any person to hunt on the lands of another without the consent of the owner; and one hunting without consent is a trespasser, subjecting himself to a civil action for the offense."

An act requiring the payment of a license by a nonresident to hunt is valid. In re Eberle, 98 Fed. 295; State v. Miles, 78 Vt. 266, 62 Atl. 795, 112 Am. St. Rep. 917.

In State v. Holcomb, 80 Kan. 243, 101 Pac. 1072, the court, without discussing the validity of an act requiring license, interpreted the statute for the guidance of public officials, as to the proper disposition of license fees when collected from hunters. And in State v. Kooek, 202 Mo. 223, 100 S. W. 630, the validity of an act requiring a hunter to have a license was not discussed, but the court construed the statute and held that "the legislature never intended that a hunter's license should first be obtained in order to authorize a person to hunt in the county in which he resided." See to the same effect Ex p. Helton, 117 Mo. App. 609, 93 S. W. 913. In Lewis v. State, 110 Ark. 254, 161 S. W. 154, wherein the issue was the validity of an act requiring licenses to hunt from residents only of certain counties, the court substantially acknowledged the right of the state to pass laws of that kind but said that this must be done on the same terms to all people, and that the law under consideration was invalid for failure so to do. For a further consideration of this point see the note to Harper v. Gallo-way, 19 Ann. Cas. 235, wherein the question of the constitutionality of a game law discriminating between persons or classes as to the right to hunt game is discussed.

In Hyde v. State, 155 Ala. 133, 46 So. 489, the court held that an act of the legislature which made it unlawful for a person to hunt on the lands of another without obtaining his written permission was not unconstitutional. It was contended that the section of the game law requiring of the landowner a written, as distinguished from an oral, permission, transcended the power of the state. The court said: "The argument in support of the contention proceeds on the theory, not that any right of the hunter is restricted, but that the right of the landowner in the use of his property is unduly restricted. Assuming, from this point of view, that the defendant is in position to bring in question the constitutionality of the act, which right in defendant may well be doubted. . . . We are of the opinion that his contention is untenable. It is clear to our minds that, instead of the laws being an invasion or an undue abridgement of any right of the landowner in the use of his property, it operates as a protection to it against trespassers. The only restriction, it seems to us, required by this statute is certainly reasonable, being no more than is sufficient to defray the expense of registering and certifying and maintaining necessary supervision. We, therefore, hold that the statute under which the respondent is indicted is not repugnant to the constitution of the state, but is constitutional and valid."

KING COUNTY.

Washington Supreme Court—June 26, 1914.

80 Wash. 196; 141 Pac. 340.

Wharves — Personal Injury from Defect — Liability.

Whether a county maintaining a public dock was negligent in leaving a fender pile loose and insecure, contrary to its own plan of construction adopted three or four years before an accident to a person on the dock, held for the jury.

[See note at end of this case.]

Negligence — Question for Jury.

The question of negligence is for the jury where minds of reasonable men may differ as to its existence.

Wharves — Personal Injury from Defect — Liability.

A county maintaining a public dock under Rem. & Bal. Code, § 8114, for public use and convenience, must exercise reasonable care for the safety of the public and all persons having occasion to use it.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where a county maintains a public dock for public use and convenience, a child entering on the dock is not a trespasser, but he has the same right to be on the dock as he has to be on a public road contiguous thereto.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A child six years old going on a county public dock with an elder brother visiting the dock to receive a newspaper is not a trespasser, but is legally thereon connected with a purpose for which it was intended, and the county cannot escape liability for injury to the child on the ground that he was a trespasser.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A county maintaining a public dock for public use and convenience is chargeable with notice that it may be used as a public street or other public place by any member of the public, including young children, especially in view of the presence of a confectionery store on the dock constituting an implied invitation to children and others to visit the dock, and it cannot escape liability for injuries to a child on the dock on the theory that it could not anticipate the presence of the child thereon.

[See note at end of this case.]

Contributory Negligence — Children.

In the absence of evidence to the contrary, a child of six or seven years of age is presumptively incapable of contributory negligence.

[See Ann. Cas. 1913B 492.]

Imputed Negligence.

The contributory negligence of a parent is not imputed to a child six years old suing for a personal injury.

[See Ann. Cas. 1912D 521.]

Same.

Where a mother was ill and the father was away from home at the time a child six years old accompanied his elder brother to a public dock without the knowledge of either the mother or father, the parents are not as a matter of law guilty of any negligence defeating a recovery by the child for injuries while on the dock.

Wharves — Personal Injury from Defect — Liability.

The degree of care required by a county maintaining a public dock for public use and convenience must be considered with reference to the uses and purposes for which the dock was constructed, maintained, and operated, and open to all classes of people, including children, who may be drawn there by curiosity or interest in the arrival of boats or who may be sent there on errands for their parents.

[See note at end of this case.]

Damages — Excessiveness — Personal Injury.

A verdict for $3,202 for injuries to a child is not excessive, where his left hand was so injured that it was necessary to amputate the little finger, and where the hand became stiff and lacked the power of gripping, and where it is doubtful whether the hand will ever be as strong as a normal hand.

Appeal from Superior Court, King county:
TALLMAN, Judge.

Action for damages. Alton Louis Gregg, plaintiff, and King county, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

John F. Murphy and Robert H. Evans for appellant.

B. J. Shipman and Dudley G. Wooten for respondent.

[197] ELLIS, J.—This action was brought to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff, a boy between six and seven years old, through the alleged negligence of the defendant in the construction and maintenance of its dock, at Juanita, on the eastern shore of Lake Washington.

The facts are practically undisputed. The dock in question was owned and operated by the county for the use of the public in connection with boats touching at Juanita. It was constructed on wooden piles, driven into the bed of the lake. The floor was of planking, and was bounded on its outer edge by a line of beams or "stringers," rising about ten inches above the floor. These, at the southerly side of the dock, where the accident occurred, were flush with the edge of the dock. At that side were driven piles about a foot in diameter, called "fender-piles," the purpose of which was to receive the impact of boats and to protect the wharf. The pile causing the injury was driven into the bottom of the lake eight or ten feet, and rose alongside the dock to a height of about a foot and a half above the stringer. It was not bolted to the dock, and there was a space of four or five inches between it and the dock.

A few feet east of this fender pile was a small warehouse for storing freight, and a few feet west was a slip or incline for the convenience of persons going to and from the boats. A few feet north of the warehouse was a small confectionery store. Contiguous to the wharf on the shore side, and constructed upon a trestle on a level a little above the floor of the wharf, ran the road from Juanita to Kirkland. A line of [198] boats ran to this dock regularly, making four or five landings a day to receive and discharge freight and passengers.

The dock was regularly used by the public in meeting, embarking upon, and leaving boats. Among the persons thus using the dock, were the older brother and sister of the plaintiff, one of whom was sent there daily by their parents to meet the boat arriving at five o'clock in the afternoon and receive the Seattle paper. On August 9, 1912, the plaintiff's older brother, aged nine, accompanied by the plaintiff, visited the dock for this purpose, arriving a few minutes in advance of the boat. They seated themselves in the narrow space between the warehouse and the slip, and on the stringer running along the edge of the dock, their feet resting upon the floor. The plaintiff was sitting behind the fender-pile above mentioned, his right arm around the pile, and his left arm hanging down between the pile and stringer upon which he was seated. He remained in this position, watching the incoming boat, until the vessel struck the fender-pile, driving it against the dock, and mashing his left hand between the pile and the stringer. The hand was crushed so that it was necessary to amputate the little finger, the skin from the palm of the hand and on the forearm was badly lacerated, and the whole hand was severely bruised. After the arm was healed, a large scar remained, and the hand was stiff and lacked the power of gripping. Physicians who examined the boy testified that the injured hand does not perform its normal functions, that it is doubtful whether or not the hand will ever be as strong as a normal hand, and that the scar on the arm will be permanent. The plaintiff resided with his parents over a quarter of a mile from the dock and had been repeatedly warned by his parents not to go upon or play upon the dock.

It is undisputed that, if the fender-pile in question had been bolted to the dock, this accident would not have happened, and it appears that many of the piles about this dock were bolted at the time of the accident. There was [199] some dispute as to whether a bolted pile would be as adequate a protection to the dock as a loose one; but the county inspector of docks and bridges, a witness for the defendant, testified that, about four years before the trial, the county engineer's office had adopted the plan of bolting the fender-piles to the county docks in order to keep them in place. Another witness, a structural engineer, who had had charge of the construction of bridges and docks for Kings county during the year 1912, and under whose direction the dock here in question had been repaired in May and June of that year, testified that he had constructed and repaired seventy-five or eighty docks and that, according to the approved and safe method of construction, a fender-pile such as that which caused the injury should be bolted to the dock, and that a pile not so bolted would be dangerous.

At the close of the plaintiff's case in chief, the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which was denied. The jury returned a verdict upon all the evidence and the court's instructions, for the sum of $3,202 and costs. The defendant appealed.

The appellant assigns as errors: (1) the overruling of the motion for a nonsuit; (2) the giving of certain instructions and the refusal to give certain requested instructions; (3) the refusal of a new trial because of these things and because of excessive verdict.

I. The appellant claims that its motion for a nonsuit should have been granted because no actionable negligence on its part was shown. It is argued that the function of a given structure controls the plan of construction; that the wharf here in question was built only to accommodate travel and traffic on the lake; that its construction was reasonably safe for that purpose; that it was not intended as a lounging place or playground for trespassing children and that the fact that it was unsafe for that purpose was no evidence of negligence, since the presence of children on the dock and an injury such as occurred could not have been anticipated. The vice of this argument consists in the initial assumption [200] that the wharf, as constructed, was, as a matter of law, reasonably safe for all things connected with traffic and travel. Let us suppose that this child had gone on to the wharf with his elder brother or, for that matter, with his parents, for the purpose of taking passage upon the boat, and, while waiting alongside the slip for the boat to make a landing, the child had been injured just as he was injured. Eliminating, for the present, the question of contributory negligence, it is clear that, under the evidence, the question of the appellant's negligence in leaving the fender-pile loose and insecure, contrary to its own plan of construction adopted three or four years previously, would have been a question for the jury. The question of primary negligence, like that of contributory negligence, is always a question of fact for the jury and not a question of law for the court, whenever the minds of reasonable men might differ as to its existence. Richmond v. Tacoma Ry. etc. Co. 67 Wash. 444, 122 Pac. 351; 1 Thompson, Negligence (2d ed.) § 425.

The second phase of this argument is also unsound in assuming that, as a matter of law, the child who was injured was a trespasser not using the dock for, or in connection with, any purpose for which it was intended. The argument overlooks the fact that this dock was a public dock, intended for the use of all members of the public, children as well as adults. While we have held that a public dock is not a highway in such sense as to extend the right of eminent domain conferred by statute for the acquiring of rights of way for highways to the acquiring of dock sites, such statutes being strictly construed, and not extended by mere analogy (State v. Superior Ct. 68 Wash. 660, 124 Pac. 127, Ann. Cas. 1913E 1076), it is none the less true that a public dock is a public place, maintained by the county under statutory authority (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 8114, P. C. 533 § 9), for the public use and convenience. There is, therefore, the same duty upon the county to exercise reasonable care for the safety of the public and all persons having [201] occasion to use such docks as is found in case of public highways, since both are, broadly speaking, public ways. Oceanic Steam Nav. Co. v. Compania Transatlantica Espanola, 134 N. Y. 461, 31 N. E. 987, 30 Am. St. 685; 2 Shearman & Redfield, Negligence (6th ed.) § 333. As further sustaining this view, the statute above referred to authorizes the construction and maintenance of such wharves only at the termination of a county road at or near the shore of navigable waters or water courses, thus recognizing a use of such wharves in connection with, and impliedly coextensive with, the use of such roads.

It would seem, therefore, that the child here in question had the same right upon this dock that it would have had upon the trestle forming the road immediately contiguous thereto. Unquestionably, had this child been injured in passing along the trestle, which constituted the public road at this point, by reason of a structural defect in the trestle, he would have had the right to recover from the county for such injury. Eskildsen v. Seattle, 29 Wash. 583, 70 Pac. 64. Moreover, even assuming that a child six years of age is capable of trespass in the strict legal sense—a thing upon which we have more than once expressed doubt (Haynes v. Seattle, 69 Wash. 419, 125 Pac. 147; Bjork v. Tacoma, 76 Wash. 225, 135 Pac. 1005, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 331; 1 Thompson, Negligence (2d ed.) § 1026),—this child was not a trespasser under the circumstances shown by the evidence. He visited the wharf in company with his brother on an errand connected with the purpose for which the wharf was intended. Even taking the appellant's restricted view of the matter, visiting the dock to receive a newspaper was as lawful an errand as a visit to receive freight or to meet a friend. True, the boy was not sent on this errand with his brother, but his presence would have been no more necessary had he been sent by his parents with the brother. Obviously, the mere circumstance of such sending could have no effect upon the quality of his act. It could not change a trespass to an [202] innocent visit, yet we have held, in effect, that a child six years old sent by a parent with an older sister to the post office in a populous city was rightfully on the street. Tecker v. Seattle, etc. R. Co. 60 Wash. 570, 111 Pac. 791, Ann. Cas. 1912B 842.

Nor are we impressed with the assertion that the presence of young children on the dock could not have been anticipated. Being a public dock, the appellant was chargeable with notice that it might be used, just as a public street, road or other public place may be used, by any member of the public. It is not claimed that any notice was given or measures of any kind taken to exclude children. Under such circumstances, it has even been held that the use of a public wharf for recreation is such lawful use that a parent may recover for the death, caused by a structural defect in the wharf, of a boy eight years old so using it with the parents' knowledge.

Delaney v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 78 Hun 303, 29 N. Y. S. 226; see, also, Gluck v. Ridgewood Ice Co. 56 Hun 642, 9 N. Y. S. 254. No decision of any court has been cited to the contrary. In addition to this, the presence of the confectionery stand upon the dock, which it must be assumed was there with the appellant's permission, was an implied invitation to children and others to visit the dock for purposes not strictly connected with its function as a wharf. The appellant can hardly be heard to say that the presence of children could not reasonably have been anticipated. Harriman v. Pittsburgh, etc. R. Co. 45 Ohio St. 11, 12 N. E. 451, 4 Am. St. Rep. 507. "The liability in such a case should be coextensive with the inducement or implied invitation." Plummer v. Dill, 156 Mass. 426, 31 N. E. 128, 32 Am. St. Rep. 463; Sweeney v. Old Colony, etc. R. Co. 10 Allen (Mass.) 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644. Under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, we are clear that the question of the appellant's negligence was properly submitted to the jury.

The appellant intimates, rather than argues, that the nonsuit should have been granted because of contributory negligence [203] on the child's part. Contributory negligence was charged in the answer, and the court gave the usual instruction as to the affirmative nature of this defense and that to be available the defense must be established by the evidence. No evidence was offered as to the capacity of this child. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, a child of six or seven years of age "is everywhere presumed to be incapable of contributory negligence." 1 Shearman & Redfield, Negligence (6th ed.) § 73a. The motion for a nonsuit was properly overruled.

II. The court instructed the jury to the effect that no act of negligence on the part of the parents of the child, whether of omission or commission, could prevent a recovery by the child if, under the evidence and other instructions, the jury was of the opinion that the defendant was liable for the injuries sustained by the child; that the rights of the parties must be judged without regard to acts of negligence on the part of the child's parents, and that:

"It would not necessarily be negligence in law for the parents to send the plaintiff, aged six years, along with his older brother, aged ten years, to the public dock at Juanita, to meet the boat for the purpose of getting a newspaper or to permit him to go with the older brother, but even if the facts should be such as to lead the jury to believe that the parents were negligent in that regard, that can make no difference as to the right of the plaintiff to recover if the facts as shown by a preponderance of the evidence and the law as given you by the court entitled him to a verdict at your hands."

The appellant contends that, in these instructions, the court went entirely too far in exonerating the parents from any duty in the custody and control of the child. The whole argument in this connection is based upon the doctrine of imputed negligence. The only logical basis for the doctrine of imputed negligence is tersely stated by Shearman & Redfield as follows:

[204] "The ethical proposition at the basis of the legal theory is that the person to whom the negligence of another is imputed, owing to the relation between them, ought to be held responsible for the conduct of such other in respect to the cause of the injury." 1 Shearman & Redfield, Negligence (6th ed.), § 65a.

In cases of injury to, or wrongful death of, a child, where the action is brought by a parent for his own benefit, the contributory negligence of the parent, the actual plaintiff, will, of course, bar a recovery. It is obvious that such cases afford no support to the doctrine that the negligence of the parent is to be imputed to the child. Both the ethical basis of the rule of imputed negligence and sound authority sustain the view that, where the child is the real plaintiff in an action for his own injury, the parent's contributory negligence is no defense. This is certainly sustained by reason, and is now supported by the great weight of authority. 1 Shearman & Redfield, Negligence (6th ed.), § 71. Bellefontaine, etc. R. Co. v. Snyder, 18 Ohio St. 399, 98 Am. Dec. 175; Bellefontaine R. Co. v. Snyder, 24 Ohio St. 670; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Hoffman, 80 Tex. 420, 15 S. W. 1048, 26 Am. St. Rep. 759; Pratt Coal, etc. Co. v. Brawley, 83 Ala. 371, 3 So. 555, 3 Am. St. Rep. 751; Atchison, etc. R. Co. v. Calhoun, 18 Okla. 75, 11 Ann. Cas. 681, 89 Pac. 207; Robinson v. Cone, 22 Vt. 213, 54 Am. Dec. 67. At any rate, this court is committed to that view. Roth v. Union Depot Co. 13 Wash. 525, 43 Pac. 641, 44 Pac. 253, 31 L.R.A. 855; Eskildsen v. Seattle, 29 Wash. 583, 70 Pac. 64. There was no evidence in this case from which it could be held, as a matter of law, that the parents were guilty of any negligence. The mother was ill and the father was away from home. The child who was injured accompanied his elder brother to the dock without the knowledge of either parent, but even had the parents known of the fact, or had they sent the child to the dock with his brother on the errand in question, that would not have constituted negligence as a matter of law, even in a suit for the parents' benefit. [205] Tecker v. Seattle, etc. R. Co. supra. We find no error in the instructions above referred to. They correctly stated the law of the case as applied to the facts presented.

The court also instructed the jury as follows:

"In this case the degree of care and prudence required by law of the defendant must be considered with reference to the uses and purposes for which the dock or wharf where the accident occurred was constructed, maintained and operated. It is admitted by the pleadings that this dock was a public one, owned and operated by the county, the defendant, and as such you are instructed that it was open to be visited by all classes of people, including children who might be drawn there by curiosity or interest in the arrival and departure of boats, or who might be sent there on errands for their parents."

It is urged that this instruction was erroneous in that it was contrary to the theory of the respondent's complaint. We find it unnecessary to enter into a lengthy analysis of the complaint. It must suffice to say that the complaint alleged that this dock was a public dock, owned and operated by the county. From what we have already said in discussing the question of nonsuit, it is clear that the instruction correctly states the law relative to such places. We find it unnecessary to discuss in detail the instructions requested by the appellant. They were addressed to a theory of the law in direct antagonism to that upon which the instructions were given, and which we have found correct. They were properly refused.

III. Finally, it is urged that the verdict is excessive. While, on first impression, the recovery may seem large in view of the nature of the injuries, yet, when we consider that this child must go through life with a maimed hand, we cannot say that it is so large as to indicate passion or prejudice on the part of the jury. A careful consideration of the evidence convinces us that the injuries are permanent and that the child will never have the same use of the injured hand that it would have enjoyed of a normal hand. One of the [206] physicians testified that certain operations might tend to relieve the hand of its stiffened condition, but even he did not predict such a result with any degree of certainty.

We find nothing in the record before us warranting a reversal of the judgment, or a reduction of the recovery.

The judgment is affirmed.

IV. Contributory Negligence of Person Injured, 157.

I. Generally.

As a general rule, a wharfinger or the proprietor of a wharf, dock, or pier is liable in damages to a person rightfully on or about the premises for an injury sustained by reason of an unsafe or defective condition negligently caused or permitted to exist, if the person injured is not guilty of contributory negligence or is not a bare licensee or a trespasser.

In Buckingham v. Fisher, 70 Ill. 121, the court said: "They [the proprietors of a wharf] were not occupying the relation of common carriers, to whom persons and property are entrusted for transportation. In that class of employments, the law has imposed higher obligations, and demands a greater degree of diligence than in ordinary pursuits. Persons engaged in the usual avocations of life are only held to reasonable care and diligence, while carriers are held to the highest degree of care which the mind is capable of exercising, for the safety of persons entrusted to their care to be carried, that is consistent with the exercise of their business, and a carrier of property is an insurer against all casualties, except the acts of God or the public enemy. But an ordinary warehouseman is only liable for ordinary care—such care as prudent men usually exercise over their own property. Thus it is seen there is a broad difference between the liability of a carrier and a warehouseman, as to the custody of goods. The same difference seems to exist as to the means of approaching the warehouse, or the vessel, train, or other means of transportation. A railway company is bound to not only provide safe engines, cars, track and other machinery and servants, but they are bound to provide and maintain safe platforms and approaches to the cars on their road. Carriers by water are also required to furnish safe approaches to their vessels. Again, a wharfinger is not distinguishable, on principle, from a warehouseman, and has not been distinguished in adjudged cases; whilst the case of a carrier has always been treated as an excepted case, turning on principles peculiar to public policy. Story on Bailments, § 452. If, then, appellants be treated as warehousemen, or as wharfingers, their obligation was only that of ordinary care for property entrusted to them. We have been referred to no case in which a warehouseman has been held liable for failing to provide safe approaches to his warehouse, nor is it believed that any can be found. It would not be consistent with the analogies of the law, to hold that a person, who is only held to ordinary care in conducting his business, should be held to an extraordinary degree of care in protecting persons coming to his place to transact business with him. He, like a merchant, blacksmith, miller, or other person engaged in business, is only liable for ordinary care in the structure of their buildings and their appurtenances. If such persons should construct approaches they knew to be defective, or were to have trap-doors known to be unsafe, and such defects were not apparent, but concealed, where their customers would necessarily pass, and injury were to result therefrom, they would probably be liable, but otherwise, if reasonable care was employed in their construction."

In Campbell v. Portland Sugar Co. 62 Me. 552, 16 Am. Rep. 503, it was held that a wharf, by reason of the change of the positions of the vessels docked there, is in its nature a passageway in nearly every direction and due care should be observed to keep its surface in safe condition. The court said: "A wharf used for the loading and discharge of the cargoes of vessels, is in its very nature a passageway over which, in all directions, the exigencies of business may take those people who have business to transact in connection with the vessels and those on board of them. To suffer a man-trap like this hole into which the plaintiff stepped, to remain as this had done for months, until an accident had demonstrated the necessity of replacing the worn out covering, might well be deemed a want even of ordinary care. The opening a way through the shed, when other access to the vessel lying there was prevented by piles of lumber, was no such unusual use of the property by the tenant, as would in any manner affect the liability of the owner. Had the accident occurred in the shed itself, (which was not the case) it would still have been in a passage to which the plaintiff had been impliedly invited in the prosecution of the common business. . . . The business to be done was the loading and unloading of vessels, including, necessarily, the transportation to and from them, not only of seamen's chests, but of all such articles as make up their multifarious outfit for sea voyages. A covering to the wharf that would be secure in any and all parts of it for the varying exigencies of such business, was an imperative necessity, and the wharf proprietors, so long as they kept the wharf open, and occupied or rented it for such business, were bound as to all whom the proffered facilities should bring there, to use due care to furnish it. Vessels frequently change their position at a wharf for their own convenience or that of others, and all parts of the wharf where they are allowed to lie, which are not actually covered by closed structures, are liable to come in use as ways of access, and due care should be used by the owners for the security of those having business there accordingly."

The state courts have exclusive jurisdiction of a suit to recover damages for injuries suffered by a person on a public pier consequent on the collision of a boat with the pier, and the federal statute permitting limitation of liability has no application to such a case. Elwell v. Bender, 79 Hun 243, 29 N. Y. S. 357. For a full discussion of the jurisdiction of admiralty in tort, see the note to Cleveland Terminal, etc. R. Co. v. Cleveland Steamship Co. 13 Ann. Cas. 1215.

This note purports to deal only with physical injuries to persons on or about wharves, docks and piers. Furthermore, the cases that treat of the liability of a master for injuries received by his servant while in his employ on premises which he owns or has control of have been excluded.

II. Persons to Whom Duty Is Owed.

1. DUTY TO INVITEE.

a. Generally.

A proprietor or wharfinger owes to invitees the duty of exercising ordinary care to see that the wharf, dock, or pier is in a reasonably safe condition. Smith v. London, etc. Docks Co. L. R. 3 C. P. (Eng.) 326, 18 L. T. N. S. 403, 16 W. R. 728, 37 L. J. C. P. (Eng.) 217; York v. Canada Atlantic Steamship Co. 22 Can. Sup. Ct. 167; Johnson v. Port Dover Harbour Co. 17 U. C. Q. B. 151; Wilson v. Union Iron Works Dry Dock Co. 167 Cal. 539, 140 Pac. 250; Low v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 72 Me. 313, 24 Am. Rep. 331; Trask v. Hallowell Granite Works, 106 Me. 458, 76 Atl. 919; Owens v. Associated Realities Corp. 81 N. J. L. 586, 80 Atl. 325; Miller v. Delaware River Transp. Co. reported in full, post, this volume, at page 165; Swords v. Edgar, 59 N. Y. 28, 17 Am. Rep. 295, affirm- ing 1 Thomp. & C. 23, Addenda; Newall v. Bartlett, 114 N. Y. 399, 21 N. E. 990 affirming 1 N. Y. St. Rep. 718; Stinson v. Edgewater Saw Mills Co. 139 App. Div. 169, 123 N. Y. S. 745. See also Furey v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. 67 N. J. L. 274, 51 Atl. 505; McMullin v. Archibald, 22 Nova Scotia 146. Thus a boy who has not paid money for admission to an amusement pier, but has been given the privilege of admission in exchange for services rendered to the concessionaires, is not a trespasser but an invitee, and the duty of exercising ordinary care toward him is incumbent on the owner of the pier. Owens v. Associated Realities Corp. 81 N. J. L. 586, Ann. Cas. 1912D 45, 80 Atl. 325, wherein the court said: "In this action the plaintiff recovered damages for injuries sustained by him while he was upon the amusement pier of the defendant, in Atlantic City, by coming into contact with certain high tension electric wires maintained in the cupola of the pier, as a result of which plaintiff's body was burned. . . . Plaintiff's right to visit that part of the pier where he was injured must rest, if at all, upon an invitation, express or implied, from the owner. Upon this point the case shows that the defendant owned and controlled a large structure known as 'The Million Dollar Pier,' extending for a distance of one thousand feet or thereabouts into and over the waters of the Atlantic ocean, and there conducted amusements and exhibitions of various kinds, and that the pier was open to the public upon payment of admission fees. There was evidence from which the jury was warranted in finding that employees of defendant in charge of admissions to the pier had given to the plaintiff (who was a boy about fifteen years of age) the privilege of entering the pier and visiting the various parts of it without paying the ordinary admission fee, in compensation for services performed by him as an attendant upon some of the exhibitions held upon the pier. It was objected that those who had given to the plaintiff this permission had no right to give it, because not authorized by the defendant to do so. The evidence, however, if believed, showed such continued practice of employing the plaintiff and compensating him as mentioned that it was open to the jury to infer that those who gave him the admission privilege had the implied authority of the defendant to give it in exchange for the services that plaintiff rendered. Since he was there by defendant's invitation, the law imposed upon the defendant the duty of exercising care for his safety while going about upon the pier within the scope of invitation. As to this, we think the evidence does not show limitation of the invitation to the ground floor or to any other particular part of the pier, but that it was open to the jury to find that it extended to the tower of the cupola. There was also, we think, clear evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant in permitting highly-charged electric wires to be in such a position that one going into the tower, as the plaintiff went, might come into contact with the wires and receive a harmful electric shock."

b. Custom Officer.

Custom officers injured on or about a wharf while discharging their duties are invitees and may recover for the damages caused by reason of the failure of the proprietor or wharfinger to exercise ordinary care to provide reasonably safe premises. Wilson v. Union Iron Works Dry Dock Co. 167 Cal. 539, 140 Pac. 250; Low v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 72 Me. 313, 39 Am. Rep. 331; Stinson v. Edgewater Saw Mills Co. 139 App. Div. 169, 123 N. Y. S. 745. Thus where it is customary for custom officers to board a vessel engaged in foreign trade and to precede the passengers in disembarking, a dry dock company owes such an officer the duty of exercising reasonable and ordinary care to provide a safe gangplank. Wilson v. Union Iron Works Dry Dock Co. 167 Cal. 539, 140 Pac. 250. Similarly, a custom officer sent to pass the night on a vessel having on board dutiable articles is an invitee, and may recover for an injury occasioned by falling through a defective plank, while he is crossing the wharf to which the vessel is moored. Stinson v. Edgewater Saw Mills Co. 139 App. Div. 169, 123 N. Y. S. 745. Likewise in Low v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 72 Me. 313, 24 Am. Rep. 331, it was held that it was not an exercise of ordinary care to leave a gangway, which cut the direct passage along the wharf transversely and was six or eight feet deep, without a railing at its sides, or a light at night, when a recently arrived ship was lying there, and that a custom officer in the discharge of his duties on a wharf where foreign vessels landed, being an invitee, could recover for his injuries sustained by falling. The court said: "The counsel for defendants, while recognizing as sound law the general principle that 'an owner is bound to keep his premises in a safe and suitable condition for those who come upon and pass over them, using due care, if he has held out any invitation express or implied, by which they have been led to enter there in,' stoutly contend that this custom house officer, who on the night of the accident was upon the defendants' wharf, in the regular course of his duty to watch for smugglers and prevent smuggling from the steamer which was just hauling into the dock there from a foreign port, had no such invitation, but was a mere licensee. We cannot so regard him. His presence there was made necessary by the business to which the defendants had devoted their wharf, the reception of cargoes from foreign going vessels."

c. Passenger on Boat or Train.

It seems that a wharfinger or proprietor of a wharf is required to exercise only ordinary care to keep the premises used by intending or disembarking passengers on boats landing at the wharf, in a reasonably safe condition, they being under the circumstances no more than invitees. Plant Inv. Co. v. Cook, 74 Fed. 503, 41 U. S. App. 109, 20 C. C. A. 625; Bacon v. Casco Bay Steamboat Co. 90 Me. 46, 37 Atl. 328. See also Wilson v. Union Iron Works Dry Dock Co. 167 Cal. 539, 140 Pac. 250; Borlase v. St. Lawrence Steam Nav. Co. 3 Quebec 329. Compare Knight v. Portland, etc. R. Co. 56 Me. 234, 96 Am. Dec. 449. Thus in Plant Inv. Co. v. Cook, supra, wherein appeared that a woman while in the act of walking along a dock for the purpose of taking passage on a steamer, slipped and fell by reason of the presence of cotton-seed meal saturated with water which was left on the planks of the dock, it was said by the court that substantially the following charge should have been given to the jury: "If you find from this evidence that the slip over which the plaintiff was passing to the steamer, upon which she was to take passage, was not in an ordinary safe condition—(such as the nature of the commercial business, shipping, etc., for which the slip, necessarily, was being daily used by the defendant company, as should or would be reasonably required for the safety of passengers going aboard of its steamers)—because or on account of any slippery substance being thereon; and you find that such condition, if faulty, in the sense of legal negligence, was chargeable to the defendant company; and you further find from the evidence that such slippery substance, being on said slip, was the proximate cause of the injury to plaintiff, and that the plaintiff, at the time of her injury, was not guilty of contributory negligence,—then you should find for the plaintiff." Similarly in Bacon v. Casco Bay Steamboat Co. 90 Me. 46, 37 Atl. 328, wherein it was held that the liability of a steamboat company as a common carrier of passengers did not extend to a person awaiting as an intending passenger on its wharf, and that it owed him only the duty to exercise ordinary and reasonable care to keep the wharf in a safe condition and sufficiently lighted, the court said: "We are not aware, however, that the plaintiff contends that the ordinary standard of care was not correctly and sufficiently defined by the court, but the contention is that more than ordinary care, really extraordinary care, should have been exercised by the company, in order to insure absolute safety for the plaintiff in his going and coming, and the able counsel for the plaintiff relies on scattered cases in the reports where may be found expressions, like that contained in the requested instruction to the effect that the company was bound to keep its wharf and its approaches safe and convenient. Such language is not altogether inappropriate, but it is not exact enough, when applied to the present case, and only means, in most cases, that carefulness and prudence must be exercised to effect security or safety, but not that such a result shall positively and absolutely be secured. . . . Furthermore, the force of the distinction between common or ordinary care and extraordinary care, the highest degree of care, a distinction found in the civil law and adopted by English and American courts principally as applicable to the law of bailments, has been greatly diminished in modern times for the reason that extraordinary diligence is no more than an ordinary requirement in extreme situations and conditions. The tendency with many courts is to call all cases of the kind simply cases of negligence, ignoring the ancient classification. In all cases the amount of care bestowed must be equal to the emergency, however the standard be denominated. We do not mean to say that the distinction between ordinary and gross negligence, or between ordinary and extraordinary care does not still exist, but, in reply to the suggestion made by the plaintiff's counsel that the same extreme degree of care should be exercised by the defendants when wharfingers, or tenants of a wharf used in conjunction with their boats, as is imposed on them while common carriers of passengers, we do not mean to say that we perceive no reason for imposing so extreme an obligation upon the defendants when they have completed their trip and ceased to be longer performing the duties of common carriers; and the authorities do not support any such application of the rule of extraordinary care as is contended for." In Wilson v. Union Iron Works Dry Dock Co. 167 Cal. 539, 140 Pac. 250, it was said that a dry dock company owes the duty to passengers disembarking from a steamer at its dock the duty to exercise at least reasonable and ordinary care to provide a safe gangplank and safe fastenings for the steamer at the dock, the court saying: "Under these circumstances, it is clear that the defendant owed to all persons lawfully and properly on board such vessel on arrival at the dock and there wishing to leave it, the duty of providing a safe and sound gangplank for their use. These gangplanks were provided by the defendant and were kept by it for the purpose for which this one was used on this occasion and as a regular part of its business. People were expected to walk over it from the ship to the dock. For their safety, a sound gangplank was required with props therefor if such were necessary on account of the weakness of the plank or the length of the span from the dock to the ship. It was, therefore, incumbent upon the defendant to use at least ordinary care to provide sound gangplanks and see that they were properly shored. It is not necessary here to determine whether it was, to that extent, a carrier of passengers, and bound as such to use the utmost care and diligence for their safe carriage as provided in section 2114 of the Civil Code. It was, at all events, bound to exercise reasonable and ordinary care for the safe carriage of those whom it had reason to expect would avail themselves of that means of leaving the vessel." And in Burke v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. 120 Mo. App. 683, 97 S. W. 981, it was held that a man injured while on a "cradle," a species of adjustable wharf, for the purpose of boarding a steamer, could recover from the railroad company operating the steamer and owning the landing for his personal injuries occasioned by the failure to exercise ordinary care to keep the way safe. The court said: "The main instruction for plaintiff is assigned for error on the ground that it assumes the relationship of carrier and passenger existed between plaintiff and defendant when the former was hurt; whereas it is agreed that he was not a passenger, having neither paid his fare nor signified to defendant an intention to take passage on the boat. Whether plaintiff was a passenger as yet or not, it is apparent that this criticism is immaterial; for the instruction speaks of plaintiff proceeding down the inclined way 'for the purpose of getting on the boat as a passenger.' Moreover, the instruction held defendant liable for failure to exercise ordinary care in providing a reasonably safe way for plaintiff to use in going on the boat; not the high care a carrier must observe for the safety of a person who has already put himself in its charge as a passenger. If plaintiff was not a passenger, but was walking along a way which it was defendant's custom to permit the use of in taking passage on its boats, and plaintiff was using it for that purpose, defendant is liable for the injury he suffered if due to its failure to employ, at the least, ordinary care to keep the way safe; and that is all we need to say in this case."

However, in Knight v. Portland, etc. R. Co. 56 Me. 234, 96 Am. Dec. 449, it was held that a railroad company owes the duty to a passenger traveling on a through ticket to exercise the highest degree of practicable care to maintain in a safe condition a wharf owned and used by it as a passageway to a connecting steamer, the court saying: "The depot and the grounds around the depot belonging to the defendant corporation, and used in connection therewith, should be in safe condition for those who, in the course of travel, are obliged to pass over them. The defendants own the wharf. It is in their use for the purpose of their business as carriers. The cars containing the baggage for the steamboat, with which the defendant corporation is connected, pass over it. The cars, with passengers for the steamboat, formerly passed over it, though they are now discontinued. The wharf is used by the railroad and in connection with the boat. The passengers for the boat pass over it on their way to the boat. It is the way provided. It is the way passengers in the cars are directed to take. The train arrives in the evening. Passengers from the cars to the boat pass rapidly over the intervening distance. The wharf should be lighted. The servants of the defendant corporation should be in readiness to point out the way. The wharf should be safe. The defendants should be justly held responsible for any neglect of their servants, or for any deficiencies in the wharf, which, with due care, might be avoided. If the defendants had carried the plaintiff over the wharf, as heretofore, in their cars, and she had been injured in consequence of the neglect of the defendants, she would have been entitled to recover. Her rights are none the less because she walks over the wharf to reach the steamboat, than if she had been borne over it, if, on the way, she is injured through the negligence of the defendants by leaving the wharf in an unsafe and dangerous condition. The defendants are not released from liability because, for their convenience, she used her own limbs, when she might be entitled to the use of their cars. Their liability did not cease the moment the cars reached the depot. It continued, equally as if at the depot, while she was on her way over the defendants' wharf, and, by their direction, to the steamboat, and until, in the ordinary course of her passage, she should reach the point where the liability of the steamboat company commences. The passage contracted for was from Lawrence to Belfast. The plaintiff was in itinere from the point of departure to the destined point of arrival. The defendants must, at any rate, be deemed liable from the place where they received the passenger to the place where she was to be transferred to the next agent in the course of transmission to the place of her destination. These views seem to be in accordance with the general principles of law established in similar cases. The proprietors of a railroad, as passenger carriers, are bound to the most exact care and diligence, not only in the management of their trains and cars, but also in the structure and care of their track, and in all subsidiary arrangements necessary to the safety of passengers. . . . Assuredly, a safe passage way to and from the cars is a subsidiary arrangement which passengers have a right to require to be safe. The wharf was this passage way for those going to the boat from the cars or coming to the cars from the boat."

For a discussion of the liability of the owner of a ferry to passengers injured on or about the ferry slips, see the notes to Hopkins v. West Jersey, etc. R. Co. 17 Ann. Cas. 370, and Rizzo v. Winnismmet Co. Ann. Cas. 1915C 1003.

d. Person Meeting Passenger or Receiving Freight.

Persons going to meet a passenger on an incoming steamer operated by the occupants of a wharf are implied invitees and to them is owed the duty of exercising ordinary care to keep the premises in a reasonably safe condition. And while a wharf owner is under no obligation to erect barriers around his wharf with a view to prevent persons from falling into the water, a place is manifestly dangerous (res ipsa loquitur) where it is unlighted and a sudden turn has to be made to prevent falling into the water. York v. Canada Atlantic Steamship Co. 22 Can. Sup. Ct. 167, wherein the court said: "I am of opinion that, under the evidence, the plaintiff and his wife were lawfully upon the wharf. The deceased went upon the wharf with the permission and upon the implied invitation of the company for the purpose of meeting her mother, who was in fact a passenger, and assisting her home. In view of the practice which had long previously prevailed she was right in presuming an invitation on the part of the company to go there and assist her friends in disembarking from the steamer. She had equally a right to expect that the means of approach to the steamer were safe for any one using ordinary care, and the company were, I think, under an obligation to see that they were safe. . . . The company, carrying on the business of carriers of passengers by water, inviting as they do the public to use their vessel were bound to use all reasonable efforts to secure the safety of persons who might lawfully come upon their premises. I agree with Mr. Justice Weatherbe that no wharf owner is under any obligation to erect barriers around his wharf with a view to prevent persons from falling into the water; a wharf surrounded by such a structure would cease to be a wharf; nor do I think they were under this obligation as respects the jog where the accident occurred; but the place on the night in question was manifestly a dangerous one; there were no lights near it; it was somewhat in the nature of a trap; the fact that both the husband and wife fell in is some evidence at least that it was dangerous (res ipsa loquitur); and the jury having found that there should have been a light there I am not disposed to disturb their finding on that point."

Ann. Cas. 1916C.—10.

In Miller v. Delaware River Transp. Co. reported in full, post, this volume, at page 165, wherein it appeared that a person injured by falling into a hole on a wharf had been accustomed for a long period of time, both during the day and at night, to receive shipments made to him on the river end of the wharf directly from the boat, especially when the boat was late and the weather was cold, it was held that he was on the wharf by implied invitation, and could recover damages for the injuries sustained by reason of the failure to exercise ordinary care to keep the premises in a safe condition.

e. Persons Having Business with Officer on Boat.

Persons having business with the officers on board of a vessel are invitees and the wharfinger or proprietor of the wharf at which the vessel is docked owes them the duty of exercising ordinary care in providing for their safety. Smith v. London, etc. Docks Co. L. R. 3 C. P. (Eng.) 326, 37 L. J. C. Pl. 217, 18 L. T. N. S. 403, 16 W. R. 728; Campbell v. Portland Sugar Co. 62 Me. 552, 16 Am. Rep. 503. Thus in the case last cited it was held that the driver of a job wagon employed by the mate of a brig to take his chest aboard a vessel lying at a wharf loaded and nearly ready for sailing, was an invitee to whom the duty of exercising ordinary care was owed, the court saying: "The distinction which runs through the cases between the relations which the owners of real estate bear to those who have been induced to enter upon the property of such owners by an appropriation of it to business purposes and to uses from which such owners derive profit, and the relations which they bear to mere licensees who are suffered, but not invited directly or indirectly, to pass over it at their own will and risk—where there is nothing to raise an implication that the property is fit for the use to which it is put, and that one may use it with confidence that no negligence on the part of him who derives a profit or advantage from such use has made or left it unsafe, was carefully observed at the trial. That a proprietor does not and ought not to stand in the same position with respect to injuries received on his premises towards mere licensees, . . . as he does towards one who is there by invitation, express or implied, for the transaction of a business out of which the proprietor gets his gain or income, is very certain. . . . The plaintiff was not a mere licensee. He went to the wharf in the prosecution of his own calling, it is true, but upon business directly connected with that for the transaction of which the wharf was built, and held out by the owners as well to the public as to those more immediately negotiating with themselves, as a safe and suitable place for the transaction of such business. To all who had occasion to transact such business there, whether with themselves directly, or with their tenants, or with those on board the vessels lawfully lying there by the permission of the proprietors or their tenants, the owners of the wharf owed a duty, their neglect of which has been productive of serious injury. The act in which the plaintiff was engaged was a necessary and common incident of the business for which the wharf was constructed and let. It is not necessary that the defendants should have had a direct interest in the transaction itself." Similarly in Smith v. London, etc. Docks Co. L. R. 3 C. Pl. (Eng.) 326, 37 L. J. C. Pl. 217, 18 L. T. N. S. 403, 16 W. R. 728, it was held that a dock keeper engaged in the business of providing berths for ships for hire, and providing a gangplank as the only means of access to the ships, was responsible in damages to an optician who went on board of a ship to show an officer some nautical instruments, and in returning fell by reason of the gangplank having been moved. The court said: "The defendants contend that they were under no duty to the plaintiff, because he had no business with the defendants themselves, and that they are not therefore answerable to him for any negligence in their mode of keeping the gangways. But since the defendants carry on the business of a dock company, and that business consists partly in providing access to the ships in the docks, it seems to me that the use of the access provided by them is as much business with the defendants as placing a ship in the docks would be, and they are, in truth, paid for it, not necessarily by every person who goes there, but by the owners of the ships on behalf of all who use it. It is not one person in ten who goes on board a ship in a dock for the purpose of transacting business in which the dock company are interested, in any other sense than that he goes upon the business of the vessel or of those on board, and it would seem strange if persons who may be obliged to go on board the ship, as, for example, the baker or butcher who supplies the ship, could receive no compensation for injuries received through the negligence of the company's servants. But, moreover, the gangway being provided by the defendants, and paid for by the shipowner, and being for the use of all persons having business on board the ship, and the only access to it, it seems to me that it amounts to an invitation to all persons having business on board the ship to go upon it. It has been contended that if the defendants are under any liability to the plaintiff, they must be equally so to every one who comes into the docks for the mere purpose of hawking goods; but to that I cannot agree. If a person who enters the docks be a mere volunteer, there may be no duty towards him on the part of the defendants; but if he has business on board the ship, then it seems to me the case assumes a different aspect, even independently of the fact that he will be then coming upon the business of the dock company in the sense I have described; for the gangway being placed there as the means of access to all persons having business on board the ship, it amounts to an invitation to persons having business on board the ship to go upon it. . . . The case then comes within the principle that persons inviting others on to their premises are answerable for anything in the nature of a trap. On these grounds I think that there was a duty upon the defendants towards the plaintiff."

1. Employee of Third Person.

Persons in the employ of others than those charged with the duty to keep wharves, docks, or piers in safe condition are invitees if they are on the premises by reason of their employment and the invitation derived through their master. Trask v. Hallowell Granite Works, 106 Me. 458, 76 Atl. 919; Swords v. Edgar, 59 N. Y. 28, 17 Am. Rep. 295, affirming 1 Thomp. & C. 23, Addenda; Newall v. Bartlett, 114 N. Y. 399, 21 N. E. 990, affirming 1 N. Y. St. Rep. 718; Johnson v. Port Dover Harbor Co. 17 U. C. Q. B. 151. See also Anderson v. The E. B. Ward, 38 Fed. 44; Baltimore, etc. R. Co. v. Rose, 65 Md. 485, 4 Atl. 899; Furey v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. 67 N. J. L. 274, 51 Atl. 505; McMullin v. Archibald, 22 Nova Scotia 146. For example, persons employed on vessels moored to a wharf, dock, or pier are invitees to whom is owed the duty of exercising ordinary care to provide for their safety. Johnson v. Port Dover Harbor Co. 17 U. C. Q. B. 151. See also Anderson v. The E. B. Ward, 38 Fed. 44; Baltimore, etc. R. Co. v. Rose, 65 Md. 485, 4 Atl. 899; McMullin v. Archibald, 22 Nova Scotia 146. Compare Quinn v. Staten Island Rapid Transit R. Co. 170 App. Div. 509, 156 N. Y. S. 568. So the owners of a wharf are liable in damages to a sailor on a vessel docked there for the purpose of receiving and discharging its cargo who is injured by falling through a defective plank which in the exercise of ordinary care should have been repaired. Johnson v. Port Dover Harbour Co. 17 U. C. Q. B. 151. Similarly in Baltimore, etc. R. Co. v. Rose, 65 Md. 485, 4 Atl. 899, it was held that the steward on a vessel lying at the pier of a railroad company used for the accommodation of vessels discharging and taking on cargo was an invitee except as to parts of the pier the use of which was prohibited. The court said: "Undoubtedly under the arrangement existing between the two companies, persons employed on board the steamer had a right of transit over the property of the defendant. If there was no particular road or pathway designated and set apart for their use, they were constrained to seek such route as they found open and convenient, and the only obligation resting on them was the observance of due care and caution in the avoidance of danger. The defendant, however, had a right, if it saw fit, to inhibit the use of the trestle, and restrict the passengers to the use of the ground below. There is evidence that this was done by a notice placed in a conspicuous position, but this evidence is met by countervailing proof, and the fact thus in dispute, should necessarily be left for ascertainment by the jury. The obligation of the defendant to keep any property, over which other persons have a right to pass, in a safe condition, cannot be questioned. . . . But this principle is qualified and restricted in its application by another which is obviously just and proper. If the defendant, as soon as he is informed of the existence of the nuisance, takes the proper steps to remove it, and, in order to prevent injury to any one, gives warning of the danger by placing a barrier of any sort so that no prudent person would cross it, he is clearly not liable if rash and reckless individuals disregard the intimations of danger thus given. The evidence of defendant on this point is, that the steps were broken down on Sunday, in the afternoon, and that very soon after the occurrence of this accident a rope was extended across at each entrance to the steps, and a light suspended at the top, so as to warn persons of the existence of danger and that, notwithstanding this warning, the plaintiff passed under the rope and was thus injured by his own recklessness. The whole of this evidence is contradicted by testimony offered on the part of the plaintiff, and, these material facts being in dispute, could only be properly determined by the jury." In McMullin v. Archibald, 22 Nova Scotia 146, it was said that an oiler on a government steamer was to be regarded as an invitee in using a pier at which his vessel was coaling, but as it was not negligence for the owner of the pier to fail to light the pier or provide a watchman, there could be no recovery for personal injuries sustained by falling off the pier, even though the way was partially obstructed by a car, there being a space of ten feet left to the edge of the pier. And in Newall v. Bartlett, 114 N. Y. 399, 21 N. E. 990, affirming 1 N. Y. St. Rep. 718, it was held that a man carrying ashore the trunk of a passenger in the course of his employment on the steamer could recover for injuries caused by a door on the wharf being defectively hung.

However, in Quinn v. Staten Island Rapid Transit R. Co. 170 App. Div. 509, 156 N. Y. S. 568, it was held that the captain of a coal barge moored alongside of a pier for the purpose of being loaded with coal, who walked to the shore on Sunday, and fell into the water by reason of the flooring coming to an end, was not an invitee, the court saying: "He had no necessity, arising out of the business upon which he was engaged, to walk along the pier at all, and did so purely for purposes of his own. It is apparent that plaintiff, if not a trespasser upon the pier, was at the most merely a licensee, toward whom the defendant owed no care beyond the very slightest, and no legal duty except not to wilfully or intentionally injure him. . . . This rule is reiterated and supported by a great number of cases in this state. No act of affirmative negligence is charged against defendant or shown by the proof, and obviously the nature of the construction of the lower deck of the pier was such that no invitation to use it as a passageway could be inferred. The pier was apparently properly constructed for the purpose for which it was intended to be used, and certainly the portion upon which plaintiff elected to walk was apparently not intended to be used as a way of passage. Plaintiff simply took his chance of finding a hole or an obstruction, for 'an open hole which is not concealed otherwise than by the darkness of night is a danger which a licensee must avoid at his peril.'" In Trask v. Hallowell Granite Works, 106 Me. 458, 76 Atl. 919, it was held that the owner of a wharf owes the duty to the employees of a third person working on its wharf to exercise ordinary care to provide reasonably safe appliances in the form of hoisting machines and the duty cannot be delegated. And in Swords v. Edgar, 59 N. Y. 28, 17 Am. Rep. 295 affirming 1 Thomp. & C. 23, Addenda, it was held that a longshoreman though not in the employ of the lessor of a pier was an invitee by implication, to whom was owed the duty of maintaining the pier in a reasonably safe condition. The court said: "We think it is clear that the intestate was lawfully upon the south half of the pier. It may be that it was not a public place or highway in the fullest sense of those terms. It was, indeed, private property to a certain degree. . . . Though private property, it was held as such for public objects. There is an implied license to vessels upon navigable waters, to enter and occupy piers built into or lying adjacent to such waters, in the manner and for the purposes contemplated by their erection. The keeping of such a pier is likened to the keeping of an inn; and a general license is given to all persons to occupy it for lawful and accustomed purposes. . . . One prime purpose is for the vessel to discharge its cargo thereupon. As it may not discharge its cargo without the aid of laborers, all persons hired and acting as such, are upon the pier by right for a lawful purpose. The owner or occupant of a pier may terminate this general license, or may withhold permission to enter from a particular person. . . . There is no pretence that in this case there had been such action. The piers in New York city are not different in these respects from those elsewhere. . . . It was, however, thrown open for entrance upon, by all persons of the calling of the intestate. By the use to which it was put by the tenants and occupants (a use which was contemplated and intended by them and their lessors), from which a profit to them was directly or indirectly derived, and which persons of the calling of the intestate aided, there was a license and an invitation given to him to come and go over this pier, and to remain thereon in the following of his employment." In Furey v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. 67 N. J. L. 274, 51 Atl. 505, it was held that there might be an implied invitation to a person on a pier in the course of his employment as a painter to use the wharf generally but not to use the opening between cars standing on a pier. The court said: "Implied invitation, therefore, is part of the law of negligence by which an obligation to use reasonable care arises from the conduct of the parties; its essence is that the defendant knew, or ought to have known, that something that he was doing or permitting to be done might give rise in an ordinarily discerning mind to a natural belief that he intended that to be done which his conduct had led the plaintiff to believe that he intended. It is not enough that the user believed that the use was intended; he must bring his belief home to the owner by pointing to some act or conduct of his that afforded a reasonable basis for such a belief. Applying these definitions and tests to the circumstances of the present case, it is incumbent upon the plaintiff either to show that the opening between the cars was, in fact, designed to be used as he used it, or else to bring home to the defendant some act or conduct signifying that the place was so prepared or adapted which might naturally lead the plaintiff to suppose that he might properly and safely so use it. For these purposes, three lines of proof are available—first, as to the openings themselves; second, as to the use made of them by the employees of the defendant, and third, as to the use suffered to be made of them by the plaintiff and his associates. With respect to the openings themselves, it is an established fact that they resulted, not from design, but from the exigencies of the business transacted on the pier, and that they varied from day to day with the physical conditions that gave rise to them, viz., the placing of each car opposite to a door in the side of the shed. The use of these openings by the stevedores and train hands employed about the defendant's business was not evidence of any expectation or willingness on the part of the defendant that persons not so employed should use the openings. The fact that the plaintiff and his co-servants had repeatedly, without molestation, crossed the track through the openings in the broken freight trains could not, in the absence of any sign of preparation or adaptation, have evinced to them that the openings were intended for their convenience, or that the general system from which the openings resulted was operated for their accommodation or had their safety in view. The character of the traffic and the obvious conditions that necessitated the breaking of the trains forbade such an implication in any ordinarily discerning mind. The plaintiff and his associates, by taking advantage of a constantly changing condition of things that evidently arose from causes unconnected with their presence upon the premises, could not impose upon the defendant a relationship to which it had, by no act of omission or commission, in anywise contributed. Knowledge is an element of invitation only when it is capable of throwing light upon the object with which a given use may have been permitted. Standing alone, it implies permission, but not invitation. . . . That the present case is wholly within the former of these classes is clear from several considerations—first, the condition of which the plaintiff took advantage was obviously part of an existing traffic system and presented no indications of being designed for any other purpose; second, the fact that there were on the ground none of the ordinary indications of a crossing, or any sign of preparation or adaptation to induce the belief that persons not there employed were either provided for or expected; third, the temporary and constantly shifting character of the openings between the cars forbade any reasonable person from assuming without further assurance that provision had been made for his safe conduct between the cars of the broken train. If, therefore, it be assumed that the defendant knew that unauthorized persons were passing between its standing cars, it owed to them no other duty than 'to refrain from acts wilfully injurious to them.' Whether the failure of the defendant to have given the customary signal before closing the train would have been a violation of this duty need not now be discussed. The trial judge before whom the testimony was taken instructed the jury that there was no dispute that such warning was given—and this is the result of my examination of the case. The conclusion reached upon this branch of the case is that the defendant was not guilty of the breach of any duty that it owed to the plaintiff, and was entitled to the nonsuit for which it asked."

2. DUTY TO LICENSEE.

A wharfinger or proprietor of a pier owes the duty to a licensee thereon to refrain from acts of wanton or wilful injury or active negligence rendering the wharf, dock, or pier unsafe. Taylor v. Northern Coal, etc. Co. reported in full, post, this volume, at page 167. See also Downes v. Elmira Bridge Co. 41 App. Div. 339, 58 N. Y. S. 628; De Boer v. Brooklyn Wharf, etc. Co. 51 App. Div. 289, 64 N. Y. S. 925. Thus a ship carpenter engaged in repairing the side of a ship is not a trespasser, and even if nothing but a licensee, his representatives may recover from the owner of the dock for his death caused by a lump of coal falling on him by reason of a defective hoisting apparatus used on the dock. Taylor v. Northern Coal, etc. Co. reported in full, post, this volume, at page 167. Similarly in Downes v. Elmira Bridge Co. 41 App. Div. 339, 58 N. Y. S. 628, it appeared that a government weigher, having the choice of two routes from the place of his employment, one over a passageway used by wagons and for pedestrians when necessary, and the other over a private wharf to the use of which the public had a license, selected the latter though he knew that it was used at the time for the unloading of heavy bridge material and consequently dangerous. It was held that he was at best a licensee to whom the only duty owed was to refrain from wilful or wanton injury. The court said: "The wharf and the property adjacent were used in connection with piers for the purpose of unloading merchandise from vessels and the delivery of merchandise thereto for shipment. In normal condition this property, wharf and piers, was used by the general public for the purpose of the business usually carried on at such places. The property, however, was private, and the right of the public therein was as licensees. . . . This brings us to a consideration of what the plaintiff's right was at this place, and to arrive at this we must consider the nature of the defendant's obligation to him. The defendant had the right to make use of the dock for the very purpose of doing what it was at the time engaged in doing. This being private property, and the condition of the dock being such as to indicate that the public right of use was interrupted, the obligation of the defendant was quite different from what it would have been had the work been prosecuted in a public street. In the latter case reasonable care is required to be observed, and as this is to be determined by the surroundings, when the use is of a public place, great precaution is necessary to meet the requirement, and in the absence of notice of the particular danger to be encountered, the rule of res ipsa loquitur applies. (Hogan v. Manhattan R. Co. 149 N. Y. 23, 43 N. E. 403; Reed v. McCord, 18 App. Div. 381, 46 N. Y. S. 407.) In the former case the prosecution of the work is the exercise of a legal right, and while under ordinary conditions the plaintiff would be considered as being upon the dock under an implied invitation from the owner, and consequently entitled to protection, so far as the exercise of reasonable care by defendant would insure the same, yet the disarranged condition of the dock, and the character of the work being prosecuted thereon, exclude the implication of an invitation to the plaintiff to come thereon, and under such circumstances no duty was imposed to take affirmative steps to guard from danger persons who trespass thereon or who are there by sufferance. . . . The plaintiff's right, therefore, was to be protected from wanton and wilful injury; beyond this the defendant owed him no obligation. . . . There is not even plausible pretext for saying that in anything which the defendant did it was guilty of a wanton act or of a wilful intent to inflict injury. It was required by its contract with the wharf and warehouse company to expedite the work with all dispatch, and there is not a scintilla of evidence which tends to establish that, in the manner and method of the movement of the girder, the defendant did not adopt the usual means and take the usual precautions for the prosecution of such work. It is not contended but that it was proper to place it upon the rollers, to jack it up, to move it with the winch and to let it down so that it might slide on to the rails prepared for that purpose, in precisely the manner adopted by the defendant at the time the injury was inflicted. There was, therefore, no reasonable basis upon which the court was authorized to submit, and the jury to find, that the defendant was guilty of negligence in anything which it did. The plaintiff was perfectly well informed of the surroundings; he knew of the torn-up condition of the dock; he saw, or ought to have seen what was plainly visible and what his companions saw, and he knew, or was chargeable with knowledge, that the girder, when he passed it, was liable to be moved at any time." Likewise in De Boer v. Brooklyn Wharf, etc. Co. 51 App. Div. 289, 64 N. Y. S. 925, it was held that a wharf company operating a railroad over a part of its wharf which had been used by the public for at least twenty-eight years as a thoroughfare owed the duty to a child even if it was only a bare licensee to exercise reasonable care to prevent accidents in operating dangerous instrumentalities. The court said: "Assuming that this use is only by implied license, and that no duty of active vigilance is thereby imposed on the defendant to protect the licensees from injury, yet as the movement of the trains is necessarily attended with the danger to life unless reasonable care is exercised, the law does require that the defendant shall exercise such care, and holds it to liability for its absence. There is no difference in this respect between the case of the defendant and that of a public railroad company in either practice or principle, and the authorities on the subject are numerous and uniform. . . . It is needless to say that the counsel for the respondent cite no case in support of the proposition upon which this nonsuit rests, viz., that the defendant is under no legal obligation to exercise any care in the running of its trains so far as the traveling public is concerned. On the contrary, they appear to admit that on the theory that the plaintiff's intestate was a licensee "the measure and limit of the defendant's duty was reasonable care to avoid doing anything out of the ordinary and usual course of its business from which an accident or an injury might reasonably have been anticipated." The accident did not occur because of anything connected with the ordinary and usual course of the conduct of the defendant's business, but because of carelessness and negligence in the conduct of the train in question, which, we assume, has not been the ordinary and usual course of the defendant in the operation of its road."

3. DUTY TO TRESPASSER.

No duty is owed to a trespasser on a wharf, dock, or pier except to refrain from injuring him wilfully or wantonly, and for injuries to him arising from the mere failure to exercise ordinary care, he cannot recover. Grundel v. Union Iron Works, 141 Cal. 564, 75 Pac. 184; Malloy v. Staten Island Rapid Transit Co. 78 Hun 166, 28 N. Y. S. 979. See also Onderdonk v. Smith, 27 Fed. 874, 23 Blatchf. 562; Morgan v. Morley, 1 Wash. 464, 25 Pac. 333. Thus the owner of a wharf is not responsible for injuries caused by leaving a dangerous place unguarded, where the person injured is not on the premises by permission or on business or other lawful occasion and has no right to be there. See Onderdonk v. Smith, 27 Fed. 874, 23 Blatchf. 562. Similarly in Malloy v. Staten Island Rapid Transit R. Co. 78 Hun 166, 28 N. Y. S. 979, it appeared that a man while fishing on a private wharf was injured by a boat coming into the slip and striking his legs which were hanging over the edge of the wharf. It was held that he could not recover for his injuries, the court saying: "While originally the wharves and exterior streets which were constructed at the expense of or by riparian owners were made public and open to the commerce of the port and free access of the people, later legislation has modified the prohibitions and restraints of the earlier law. And now many of the piers and wharves on the river front are occupied by steamship and railroad companies and by private individuals by titles which are for the time being practically that of private ownership. Under the allegations and admissions of the pleadings, and in the absence of any evidence as to the source or character of the defendant's title, we must assume that the wharf in question was a private pier. It was inclosed from the street, and the plaintiff had no right there. The defendant had no notice that he was there and was under no duty or obligation to him in reference to the management of its boat. He went upon the wharf in a roundabout way, getting access from adjoining property, and must be treated as a trespasser. Under such circumstances there was no negligence upon the part of the defendant, and the complaint was properly dismissed." Likewise in Grundel v. Union Iron Works, 141 Cal. 564, 75 Pac. 184, it was held that an allegation that the plaintiff's intestate had "business to perform" on a vessel at a wharf did not show that he was not a trespasser on the wharf. The court said: "The allegations show that the Union Iron Works had caused a vessel in its possession to be tied to its private wharf, and had placed a gangplank between the wharf and the vessel. It is alleged that Grundel, 'having business to perform upon the vessel,' attempted to board it by means of the gangplank. There is no pretense that Grundel was in the employ of the Union Iron Works, that he had been invited by the Union Iron Works to enter upon its premises, or to go upon the vessel, or that his business was in any way connected with the defendant. It is not even pretended that he had permission of the Union Iron Works to be upon the premises. His business, for aught that appears, might have been wholly foreign to any of the interests of the Union Iron Works, or even in hostility to it. It is not shown, therefore, that he was not a trespasser, and, under the most favorable view which could be taken of the pleading, he was at the best a mere licensee. As such licensee, the defendant owed him no duty to keep its premises or its passageways in safe condition, and no duty being owed by defendant to plaintiff, no negligence can be imputed to the former."

4. DUTY TO INVITEE OR LICENSEE ON PUBLIC WHARF.

Public wharves or piers are required to be kept in a reasonable safe condition, and a person injured by reason of defects negligently permitted to exist therein, may recover damages. Jeffersonville v. Gray, 165 Ind. 26, 74 N. E. 611; Harris v. Bremerton, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 160; Belles v. Tacoma, 79 Wash. 200, 140 Pac. 324. See the reported case. See also Reynolds v. Starin, 50 App. Div. 535, 64 N. Y. S. 141. Thus the reported case holds that a county owning a dock is bound to exercise reasonable care for the safety of a child awaiting an incoming steamer for the purpose of receiving a newspaper, a public dock being analogous to a public highway. Similarly in Belles v. Tacoma, 79 Wash. 200, 140 Pac. 324, it was held that a municipality owning a dock at which passenger ships land is required to exercise only ordinary care to prevent injuries to persons lawfully there, and where it has no notice of a defect therein, it cannot be held liable for an injury to a person slipping on the floor. The court said: "The appellants argue that the evidence disclosed such a degree of negligence on the part of the respondent as to carry to the jury the question of its liability for the injury suffered by the appellant, and that, in consequence, the trial judge erred in granting a nonsuit. But without following the argument by which the proposition is sought to be maintained, we think it not supported by the record. In its care of the building, the city did not owe to the public that high degree of care imposed upon carriers of passengers. Its duty in this respect was performed if it exercised reasonable and ordinary care and diligence in keeping the building in repair; the same degree of care that is imposed upon a city with reference to its streets and other public places open to the use of the public. Plainly, it would be laying down a harsh rule to say that a city became guilty of negligence whenever it permitted a plank in a board walk, or a slab in a concrete walk, to remain in place whenever its center became worn down a quarter of an inch below the common level. Rules governing the imperative duties of cities with regard to keeping its streets and buildings in repair must be reasonable and practicable rules, else the burden of supporting the government therein will necessitate an abandonment of all government. Again, we think the judgment may rest on another ground. There was no evidence to show notice on the part of the city that the floor was defective, even conceding it so. True, the officers of the city could have discovered, by an examination of the floor, that the particular plank complained of had worn faster than other planks surrounding it, and that its center was, to a certain degree, lower than such surrounding planks. But they were not bound by this to assume that it was in such a defective condition as to be dangerous. The common observations of their every day life would tell them that it was not so; and, more than this, they knew that many persons passed over this particular floor daily with safety. If it had been shown that other persons had slipped thereon so as to lose their balance or fall, and this fact had been brought home to the officers of the city, a different question might have been presented. But the fall of a single person proves nothing. Persons have been known to slip and fall on the best constructed walks. Nor do we think the evidence to the effect that there were nail marks on the board of any moment on the question of the dangerous condition of the defect. They could have been made, and are usually made, by scuffing the heels and can be found on any floor generally used by the public where heel marks show." Likewise in Jeffersonville v. Gray, 165 Ind. 26, 74 N. E. 611, it was held that it is the duty of a municipal corporation to keep its public wharves in repair and that it is liable in damages to a person injured on account of a hole negligently allowed to remain in a wagonway although it is open to ordinary observation. In Harris v. Bremerton, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 160, it was held that in view of the implied invitation to the public to use a municipal wharf, the mere fact that a person has not paid the wharfage does not render him a trespasser to the extent that he thereby loses the right of protection against personal injuries through the failure of the city to exercise ordinary care.

In Reynolds v. Starin, 50 App. Div. 535, 64 N. Y. S. 141, it was held that the docks of the city of New York were subject to the same rule as highways and that a woman injured by the falling of the wall of a freight house could recover from the contractor whose lack of ordinary prudence caused the injury. In Degan v. Dunlap, 15 Phila. (Pa.) 69, 39 Leg. Int. 32, it was held that a wharf erected at the end of a highway is public in its nature so that a vessel has the right to a berth there, and that a stevedore who assists in moving the vessel and is injured by reason of a defect in the wharf is not a trespasser though the vessel has not express permission to dock at the wharf. The court said: "The whole history, therefore, of the construction of wharves, and the common and statute laws which regulate their erection and use, all show clearly that they are not in the ordinary sense to be considered the private property of the person who erects them. A person, therefore, who goes upon them, or who fastens his vessel to them, does not, by so doing, make himself a trespasser."

But as was held in Birch v. New York, 190 N. Y. 397, 83 N. E. 51, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 595, reversing 121 App. Div. 395, 106 N. Y. S. 104, a municipality which has purchased a pier for the purpose of making a park is under no duty to repair it and place it in a reasonably safe condition. The court said: "The issue is extremely narrow and not free from doubt, but we are inclined to the view that the court at Trial Term was right and that the judgment upon the nonsuit should be sustained. We think it would be imposing upon municipalities altogether too harsh a rule of liability to hold that private property acquired by them for public purposes must be treated as thrown open to the use of the public from the moment of its acquisition, without regard to the character of the changes or improvements that may be contemplated in fitting it for future public use. This was private property up to the moment that it was acquired by the city. Although it was to be devoted to public use in that it was embraced in the plans for the city park system, the precise character of its improvement and the exact nature and extent of its use do not appear to have been definitely determined at the time of the intestate's death. It is true that eight years had elapsed between the time of its acquisition by the city and the tragic ending of this young man's life, and that during this interval the pier might have been improved or removed. But these are considerations with which we have no concern in a case of this character, unless we are prepared to hold as a matter of law that a municipality which acquires property for public purposes is bound either to improve it at once, or to exercise a degree of care in its maintenance before its improvement, beyond that which is chargeable to a private owner of property similarly situated. It is too plain for discussion that neither individuals nor courts have any right or power to demand or direct how or when public improvements shall be made, except where such right or power are conferred by statute or other legal authority. It seems equally plain to us that there is no valid reason why a municipality should be held to a different rule of liability for its alleged negligence than an individual owner with respect to the care and maintenance of property which, although acquired for a definite public use, has not yet been improved for that purpose and is used, if at all, by mere sufferance. This is not a case where the pier was a part of the highways of the city, or one of its public places. . . . Neither was it a place which the city permitted to be used as a highway for public travel. . . . This was private property, although owned by the city and held for a public purpose, and that private character continued until it was actually devoted to the public use for which it was purchased, unless the city either invited or permitted a use of it that was public in its nature." In Holland v. New York, 16 Daly 124, 9 N. Y. S. 499, affirmed 129 N. Y. 674, 30 N. E. 66, it appeared that a gangplank for the egress of passengers from a steamboat to a public dock was not under the control of the municipality owning the dock, and that an open stairway was necessary in the landing of the passengers and its maintenance was not a nuisance. It did not appear that the dock was in need of repair. It was held that the city was not liable for personal injuries received by a woman in falling down the stairway, which was only partially covered by the unguarded gangplank, even though the dock was insufficiently lighted.

A person has the right to assume in the absence of knowledge or notice to the contrary that a wharf continues to be open to the public and in the absence of such knowledge or notice he cannot be regarded as a trespasser in an action to recover for personal injuries resulting from a defect therein. New Orleans, etc. R. Co. v. Hanning, 15 Wall. 649, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 220; Delaney v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 78 Hun 393, 29 N. Y. S. 226, affirmed 144 N. Y. 718, 39 N. E. 857. Thus the right of passage over a public wharf continues until some notice is given that the right has been terminated by the grant of the property to a railroad company and a person continuing to use it cannot be deemed a trespasser. New Orleans, etc. R. Co. v. Hanning, 15 Wall. 649, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 220, wherein the court said: "It would seem that, prior to the passage of the act authorizing the defendants to occupy and possess the wharf, it had been open to the public, free to the passage of all, at their pleasure to come and go. The judge charged, in substance, that this right of passage to the public continued until some notice should be given to those accustomed to use it that their rights had ended. This principle is one of quite general application. A railroad or steamboat company, by the departure and arrival of their conveyances, give an invitation to all who desire to approach their boats or cars to pass over their wharf or platform. One accustomed so to pass cannot be deemed a trespasser in repeating his act after a new station or landing has been adopted and the cars or boats have ceased to use the old one. To exclude the passer's right so as to make him in fault, and to prevent his recovery for an injury sustained by leaving the place in a bad condition, notice must have been given of its changed character, and that the rights of passers are terminated. This principle is so familiar, and exists in so many forms, that it is unnecessary to elaborate it." Similarly in Delaney v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 78 Hun 393, 29 N. Y. S. 226, affirmed 144 N. Y. 718, 39 N. E. 857, it was held that where the piers in a certain locality of a city had been generally used at pleasure as a matter of public right a person had the right to assume in the absence of notice that a particular wharf continued to be open to the public and if he was drowned by falling through an unguarded and unlighted hole therein his representatives might recover damages for his death. The court said: "The right to the possession of this particular wharf had become vested in the defendant, it is true, by contract entered into between it and the authorities of the city, but of that fact the public naturally could not have had knowledge. There was nothing to indicate to the people going upon it that they had not the same right to use it, and could not use it, with the same impunity as any of the other wharves in that vicinity and along that avenue. That being so, within the principle of the authorities already referred to, it was clearly the duty of the defendant to take some precautions to warn the public against coming upon the property. As the evidence tended to show that the defendant did not take any precautionary steps whatever in that direction the court properly denied the motion for a nonsuit."

III. Persons Liable.

1. GENERALLY.

A wharf owner retaining control over the repair of the wharf is liable for personal injuries sustained by a licensee due to the negligence of the contractor. New Orleans, etc. R. Co. v. Hanning, 15 Wall. 649, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 220, wherein the court said: "It is insisted that the wharf at the time of the accident was in the possession of Carvin; that the negligence if any, was his, not that of the company; and that the company is not responsible for any negligence by him or those employed by him. . . . The rule extracted from the cases is this: The principal is liable for the acts and negligence of the agent in the course of his employment, although he did not authorize or did not know of the acts complained of. So long as he stands in the relation of principal or master to the wrongdoer, the owner is responsible for his acts. When he ceases to be such and the actor is himself the principal and master, not a servant or agent, he alone is responsible. Difficult questions arise in the application of this rule. Nice shades of distinction exist, and many of the cases are hard to be reconciled. Here the general management and control of the work was reserved to the company. Its extent in many particulars was not prescribed. How and in what manner the wharf was to be built was not pointed out. That, rebuilt, was to be as good as new. The new was to be of the best workmanship. This is quite indefinite and authorizes not only, but requires a great amount of care and direction on the part of the company. The submission of the whole work to the direction of the company's engineer is evidence, although not conclusive, that the company retain the management and control. The reservation of authority is both comprehensive and minute. The company have the general control, and it may prescribe where each pile shall go, where each plank shall be laid, where each stringer shall be put down, where each nail shall be driven. All the details are to be completed under their orders and according to their direction. The contractor undertakes in general terms to do the work well. The company reserve the power not only to direct what shall be done, but how it shall be done. This is an important test of liability."

It has been held that an invitee on a dock had the right to assume, in the absence of explanation, that the whole dock was in the possession and under the control of the person who ostensibly had the license to use it in entirety without a longitudinal division, and that where he was injured by the unsafe condition of the dock, without his contributory negligence, it did not constitute a defense to show that the legal title to the part of the dock where the unsafe condition existed, was in a third person, or that in fact the defendant had no legal right to repair it. Thomas v. Henges, 131 N. Y. 453, 30 N. E. 238, affirming 62 Hun 620, 16 N. Y. S. 700. But it has been held that no liability attached to a ship owner for an injury to a person on a wharf by the permission or invitation of the owner arising from the breaking of a defective rope, since a rope is not a dangerous structure; but that had the masts, on account of being insecurely fastened, fallen and injured any one, that would have been a violation of a duty imposed by law on every one to have no dangerous structures on his property which might injure persons coming on the premises by the invitation or permission of the owner. See The Mary Stewart, 10 Fed. 137.

It seems that a person who piles lumber on a wharf under the license of the owner is liable to a teamster engaged in hauling coal for delivery at the wharf for injuries caused by the negligent manner in which the lumber is piled. See Murphy v. Stanley, 136 Mass. 133. Similarly in Dunn v. Ballantyne, 5 App. Div. 483, 38 N. Y. S. 1102, it was held that a man injured by the falling of a pipe, due to the negligent manner in which it was placed on a bulkhead used as a wharf, could recover damages from the master of the workman who unloaded the pipe, even though the pipe had been delivered to the consignee, where the bulkhead was a public place and the plaintiff was there engaged in the inspection of the lighters of an oil company. The court said: "Here the structure, if it may be so called, was put up in a public place, to which people generally have a right to resort, just as they have the right to use the streets of a city. While it is intended that the bulkhead shall be used for the temporary storage of goods in transit, no one has a right to store them there in such a manner as to endanger the persons of those who rightly resort to the wharf any more than a person who is engaged in the construction of a house in a city has the right to pile bricks or building material upon the sidewalk or in the streets in such a manner as to imperil passers-by. . . . It would seem that under such circumstances the person who erects a dangerous structure in a highway or public place, as well as the person who acquires ownership and subsequently assumes control thereof with knowledge or notice of its true condition, is responsible for injuries which may result from its presence."

Of course a municipality or county operating wharves, docks, or piers is liable in damages for injuries to persons consequent on the failure to exercise due care in their construction and maintenance. Jeffersonville v. Gray, 165 Ind. 26, 74 N. E. 611; Harris v. Bremer-ton, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 160; Belles v. Tacoma, 79 Wash. 200, 140 Pac. 324. And see the reported case.

2. LIABILITY OF LESSOR.

The lessor of a wharf, dock, or pier remains liable for the injuries caused by a neglect to repair the premises if he leases them in their defective condition or if binds himself to keep them in repair. Campbell v. Portland Sugar Co. 62 Me. 552, 16 Am. Rep. 503; Albert v. State, 66 Md. 325, 7 Atl. 697, 59 Am. Rep. 159; Joyce v. Martin, 15 R. I. 558, 10 Atl. 620. See also State v. Boyce, 73 Md. 469, 21 Atl. 322; Swords v. Edgar, 44 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 139; Swords v. Edgar, 59 N. Y. 28, 17 Am. Rep. 205, affirming 1 Thomp. & C. 23, Addenda; Edwards v. New York, etc. R. Co. 98 N. Y. 245, 50 Am. Rep. 659. Thus in Campbell v. Portland Sugar Co. supra, it was held that the owner of a wharf who had let a part of it through his agents to another was liable for injuries suffered by a person by reason of its defective condition even at a place within the exclusive possession of the lessee, the owner being under contract to keep the premises in repair. The court said: "This is not a question of privity of contract, but of obligation under which the owners of real estate lie to all who are induced by the use which such owners make of their property to enter upon it for the transaction of business. And we fail to find any case where the owner has been exonerated from the consequences of neglect to make and keep the access to a place of business reasonably safe, because the property may be in possession of his tenant.

Certainly there can be no ground for claiming such exemption, where, as here, by express stipulation between the lessors and lessees, the former were to make all necessary repairs. To suffer such an exemption, even in the absence of such evidence as this case affords, we think would be contrary to public policy and substantial justice, for it would not unfrequently operate to deprive the injured party of all remedy except against an irresponsible tenant through whom a negligent landlord would reap the profits, without bearing the responsibilities, of his proprietorship. Like all who are engaged in business which involves the personal safety of large numbers, proprietors of wharves should be held to the exercise of the strictest care." Similarly in Albert v. State, 66 Md. 325, 7 Atl. 697, 59 Am. Rep. 159, it was held that the lessor of a wharf was liable in damages for the death of a person suffered by reason of a defective condition existing at the time of the renting, which was known or should have been known by him, the court saying: "That instruction substantially laid down the law to be, and so instructed the jury, that if they found that the defendant was the owner of the wharf, and that he rented it out to a tenant, and that at the time of the renting, the wharf was unsafe, and defendant knew, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence could have known, of its unsafe condition, and that the accident happened in consequence of such condition, the plaintiff was entitled to recover. Of the correctness of the rule so laid down, provided the jury found the facts, we think there can be no reasonable doubt. . . . A wharf, furnishing the only mode of ingress and egress to a summer resort, where crowds were invited to come, if in an unsafe and dangerous condition is certainly a nuisance of the worst character. It will not do for the owner, knowing its condition, or having by the exercise of any reasonable care the means of knowing it, to rent it out and receive rent for it, but escape all liability when the crash comes. He who solicits and invites the public to his resorts, must have them in a reasonably safe condition, and not in a condition to risk the lives and limbs of his visitors." Likewise in Joyce v. Martin, 15 R. I. 558, 10 Atl. 620, it was held that the father of a boy injured by a defect in a wharf at a public pleasure resort had a right of action for the loss of his services against the lessor and the lessee jointly, where the defect existed at the time of the lease, and the lessee subsequently acquired knowledge of it, the boy being there at the invitation of the lessee. So in Cristadore v. Von Behren, 119 La. 1025, 44 So. 852, disapproving McConnell v. Lemley, 48 La. Ann. 1433, 20 So. 887, 55 Am. St. Rep. 319, 34 L.R.A. 609, it was held that the owner of a "camp," consisting mainly of a platform and a house built over the waters of a lake and intended to be used as a place of resort and recreation and to be leased to all persons desiring to rent it, was liable to a guest of his lessee for personal injuries occasioned by the collapse of the pier due to the neglect to keep it in repair. The court said: "The reason, then, why Mrs. Cristadoro was rightfully on the wharf is that she was a guest of her mother, Mrs. Schmitt, and that Mrs. Schmitt had secured by contract with Von Behren the right to receive visitors; and the reason why, she being rightfully on the wharf, the owner of the wharf is responsible to her for the injury she suffered, is that "the owner of a building is answerable for the damages occasioned by its ruin, when this is caused by neglect to repair it, or when it is the result of a vice in its original construction" (Civ. Code, art. 2322)—this provision of the Code being nothing more than an application of the principle that "every person is responsible for the damage he occasions, not merely by his act, but by his negligence, his imprudence, or his want of skill" (article 2316, Civ. Code). The learned counsel for defendants very properly say that there must be a duty before there can be negligence; but, when they say that Von Behren did not owe Mrs. Cristadoro the duty to see to it that this wharf was maintained in proper condition for its ordinary use, they fail to take the foregoing articles of the Code into consideration. . . . The court seems to have thought that the recourse of the guest was against the lessee; but what if the lessee has not been in fault? Nay, what if, injured by the same accident, he himself has a cause of action? Would the legal situation be that he would have to respond in damages to the guest, and the owner to him? If so, the absurd result would be that he would have to turn over to his guest whatever he might have recovered from the owner. Under the doctrine of this Lemley Case, if, through gross vice of construction or the gross negligence of the owner, one of the so-called "skyscrapers" of this city were to collapse, the heirs of a person who had been visiting one of the tenants at the time of the disaster and had perished therein could have no recourse against the culpable owner, but only, if any at all, against the heirs of the innocent and unfortunate tenant. It may be that, with regard to all those who derive through the lessee the right to be on the leased premises, the lessor may by contract shift from himself to the lessee the duty of seeing to the safety of the building, and may in that way absolve himself from all duty towards the guests of the lessee but so long as he does not do this, but retains to himself the duty of seeing to the safety of the house, he plainly and manifestly owes that duty as much to those who are rightfully in the house as to those who may happen to be passing by it." In Swords v. Edgar, 59 N. Y. 28, 17 Am. Rep. 295, affirming 1 Thomp. & C. 23, Addenda, it was held that even though the lessee of a pier is under a covenant to keep it in repair the lessor remains liable for injuries to a person rightfully on the pier caused by the failure to exercise ordinary care to maintain it in a reasonably safe condition. The court said: "The defendants were not in possession of the premises at the time of the accident. It is claimed that thereby the defendants are under no liability to the plaintiff. We have shown that this pier, so far as the intestate was concerned, was in the nature of a public place, whereon he was lawfully engaged. We have shown that it was of such nature that there was as to him a duty resting somewhere, to keep this pier in a reasonably sound and secure condition. Primarily, this duty is upon the occupants of the pier, and, in the absence of any covenant from their lessors to keep the same in repair, that duty, as to all defects arising after their tenancy began, would altogether rest upon them, and there would be no liability upon the lessors. But there may be a state of facts which will cast a liability upon the lessors also. The neglect of this duty, the suffering the pier to fall into such a state of decay, as to become dangerous to those lawfully coming upon it, is the creation of a nuisance. For a private nuisance is any thing unlawfully or tortiously done to the hurt or annoyance of the person, as well as the lands, tenements and hereditaments of another. . . . Where there has been a nuisance of continued existence upon demised premises, the lessor and the lessee may both be liable for damages resulting therefrom. The lessee in the actual occupation of the premises, if he continues the nuisance after notice of its existence and request to abate it, and the lessor, if he at first created it, and then demised the premises with the nuisance upon them, and at the time of the damage resulting therefrom, is receiving a benefit therefrom by way of rent or otherwise. . . . A pier so defective and insecure when it is leased, as that a subsequent injury, received in the proper use of it as if sound, is consequent upon its original condition, is, for the purposes of such an action as this, per se a nuisance. Its effect upon the third parties is not the result of the manner of the use of it by the lessee. There is but one use to be made of it—as a place at which vessels may lay, and put off and take on their cargoes. For that use it is rented; and used therefor, it is the original insecure condition of it which is the cause of an injury, though it should be, that in the first construction of it, it was well and substantially built; yet the suffering it, by continued use, to become decayed, and the neglecting of needful repairs, is the same as if it was placed, on the day before the lease, in the unsafe condition of it. Moreover, there was testimony tending to show an original faulty mode of construction. When leased in that condition, for a rent reserved to the defendants, they became liable from injuries resulting to an innocent person, unless there be something else in the case which will relieve them. It is urged that, by taking from the lessees a covenant to keep the premises in good order and repair, the defendants have protected themselves from liability to the plaintiff. As to this, it is first to be observed that by giving this covenant, the lessees did not increase nor change their liability to the plaintiff's intestate, nor to that portion of the public which might lawfully use their pier. As tenants and occupants of the pier they were liable, though no covenant had been given. Their relation to strangers is in no wise changed by the existence of the covenant, so that the question is, whether the lessor of premises, demised in a ruinous state, may shield himself from liability to strangers, for damage resulting from their defective condition, by taking to himself a covenant like that here found. It is plain from what we have before said, that there was once a duty upon the defendants, as owners of the pier, to maintain it in a safe condition. They did not do this. They leased it in its unsafe state, and took a rent for the use of it. Thereby they became liable to any one lawfully upon it, who suffered damage in consequence of its state of insecurity. The pier was unsafe on and before the day of the lease. The defendants were certainly, at that time, charged with the duty of putting and keeping it in a safe condition. . . . Can the fact that the granting over, is upon the taking back a covenant to keep in repair, work a discharge of that liability? The person injuriously affected by the ruinous state of the premises demised has no right nor privity in the covenant. He is not given thereby a right of action against the lessee greater nor more sure than he had before. He has the right without the covenant. The covenant is a means by which the lessor may reimburse himself for any damages in which he is cast by reason of his liability. But it is an act and obligation between himself and another, which does not remove nor suspend that liability. It is not so, that a person upon whom there rests a duty to others may, by an agreement solely between himself and a third person, relieve himself from the fulfilment of his duty. Surely an ineffectual attempt to fulfil it would not; as if in this case insufficient repair of the pier had been made by a builder who had contracted with the lessor to do all that was needful to make the pier secure for all comers. A covenant taken from a lessee, to keep in order and repair, is no more effectual than a contract with a builder to the same end. Both may afford an indemnity to the lessor, but neither can shield him from liability."

But if the owner of a wharf does not know, or in the exercise of reasonable diligence could not know, of a defect at the time of leasing it, he will not be held liable in damages for the death of an employee of the lessee occasioned by his fall through a rotten plank. State v. Boyce, 73 Md. 469, 21 Atl. 322. And in Ahern v. Steele, 115 N. Y. 203, 22 N. E. 193, 12 Am. St. Rep. 778, 5 L.R.A. 449, reversing 48 Hun 517, 1 N. Y. S. 259, it was held that heirs who became full owners of a pier at the death of their ancestor, subject to a valid outstanding lease which provided that the lessor was not bound to repair but retained the privilege of entry for that purpose, were not responsible for a nuisance created thereon during the existence of the lease and before the title passed to them, they having no notice of the defective condition. The court said: "It is not the general rule that an owner of land is, as such, responsible for any nuisance thereon. It is the occupier, and he alone, to whom such responsibility generally and prima facie attaches. . . . The owner is responsible if he creates a nuisance and maintains it; if he creates a nuisance and then demises the land with the nuisance thereon, although he is out of occupation; if the nuisance was erected on the land by a prior owner, or by a stranger, and he knowingly maintains it; if he has demised premises and covenanted to keep them in repair, and omits to repair, and thus they become a nuisance; if he demises premises to be used as a nuisance, or for a business, or in a way so that they will necessarily become a nuisance. In all such cases I believe there is now no dispute that the owner would be liable. But an owner who has demised premises for a term during which they become ruinous, and thus a nuisance, is not responsible for the nuisance unless he has covenanted to repair. It has even been held in some cases that an owner may demise premises so defective and out of repair as to be a nuisance, and if he binds his tenant to make the repairs he is not responsible for the nuisance during the term. . . . But these cases are not in entire harmony with the decisions in our own state, and probably would not now be generally received as authority in this country or in England. A grantee or devisee of premises, upon which there is a nuisance at the time the title passes, is not responsible for the nuisance until he has had notice thereof, and in some cases until he has been requested to abate the same. . . . But the position of these defendants is stronger than the one we have just been dealing with. This pier came to them, not only with this nuisance existing thereon, but subject to an outstanding lease for some years which they had no power to terminate. The lessee who occupied and used the pier was under obligation to the public to see that it did not become a nuisance, and it was his duty to respond for any damage sustained by any person from the nuisance. The owners of the reversion had the right, in the absence of notice, to suppose that he would discharge such duty and protect the public, and they were under no obligations to see by watchful vigilance that he performed such duty. And so it has been held in all the analogous cases, that the landlord, in the absence of notice, is liable only in case he demised the premises with the nuisance thereon. . . . Now, within these authorities, what ground is there for imposing liability upon these defendants for this nuisance? They did not create it, and had no connection whatever with those who did create it. They were not bound by the lease to repair the pier. They did not demise the pier with the nuisance thereon, and they had no notice, actual or presumptive, of the existence of the nuisance."

The sublessors of a wharf in surrendering it to the owners of a steamship for their temporary use remain liable for injuries sustained by reason of the negligence of their sublessee in maintaining the wharf. Newall v. Bartlett, 114 N. Y. 399, 21 N. E. 990, affirming 1 N. Y. St. Rep. 718. The sublessor of a pier, however, who has paid a judgment secured against him for personal injuries to an invitee on the pier may recover indemnity from the sublessee whose neglect is the cause of the accident and who has possession of the part of the pier where the accident occurs. See Oceanic Steam Nav. Co. v. Compania Transatlantica Espanola, 134 N. Y. 461, 31 N. E. 987, 30 Am. St. Rep. 685.

3. LIABILITY OF LESSEE.

The lessee in possession of a wharf, dock, or pier is liable in damages to a person who suffers an injury by reason of a neglect to keep the premises in a safe condition. King v. Cooney-Eckstein Co. reported, in full, post, this volume, at page 163; Cooney-Eckstein Co. v. King, 67 So. 918; Gluck v. Ridgewood Ice Co. 56 Hun 642, 9 N. Y. S.

254, affirmed 125 N. Y. 728, 26 N. E. 757; Joyce v. Martin, 15 R. I. 558, 10 Atl. 620. See also Buchingham v. Fischer, 70 Ill. 121; DeGruy v. Aiken, 43 La. Ann. 798, 9 So. 747; Campbell v. Portland Sugar Co. 62 Me. 552, 16 Am. Rep. 503; Swords v. Edgar, 59 N. Y. 28, 17 Am. Rep. 295, affirming 1 Thomp. & C. 23. Thus in Gluck v. Ridgewood Ice Co. supra, the court said: "It would be, undoubtedly, true, were the pier in question to be considered as the private property of the defendant, no recovery could be had, because the deceased was not upon the pier at the invitation or request of the defendant. But it seems to be reasonably well settled that a public pier in the city of New York is a part and parcel of its public streets, and that the defendant has not the right to the exclusive use thereof, but that the public have also the right to enter upon such pier, in the same manner as they have a right to enter upon and pass over the public streets of the city. A large number of cases has been cited by the counsel for the appellant tending to show that the owner of land owes no duty to a person who comes upon it without his permission, and who is thereby a trespasser. But in the case at bar the deceased was not a trespasser in coming upon this pier, because, as already stated, it is part and parcel of the public street. He was entitled to pass over the same, and to assume that it was in such condition that he could safely do so. If, therefore, this accident happened in the manner in which it was claimed upon the part of the plaintiff, namely, because of a hole existing in this pier which remained there for a long period of time, and which the defendant, the lessee of the pier, had failed to render safe, a recovery could certainly be had." In De Gruy v. Aiken, 43 La. Ann. 798, 9 So. 747, it was said that the lessees of the wharves of a city were liable in damages to a person injured by reason of the failure to repair holes in the flooring, to mend the bulkheads and incline heads immediately after the need of the repairs, no notice to the corporation of patent defects being essential to liability especially where the lessees were under contract to keep the wharf in repair. In Cooney-Eckstein Co. v. King (Fla.) 67 So. 918, it was held that an averment in the declaration that the defendant "had exclusive control and management" of a wharf was sufficient to make it liable for personal injuries occasioned by the defective condition of the wharf.

IV. Contributory Negligence of Person Injured.

Of course the contributory negligence of a person injured on or about a wharf, dock, or pier precludes him from recovering damages for the injury. Grand Tower Mfg. etc. Co. v. Hawkins, 72 Ill. 386; DeGruy v. Aiken, 43 La. Ann. 798, 9 So. 747; Stewart v. Newport News, etc. R. Co. 86 Va. 988, 11 S. E. 885. See also York v. Canada Atlantic Steamship Co. 22 Can. Sup. Ct. 167; Anderson v. The E. B. Ward, 38 Fed. 44; Plant Inv. Co. v. Cook, 74 Fed. 503, 41 U. S. App. 109, 20 C. C. A. 625; Cooney-Eckstein Co. v. King (Fla.) 67 So. 918; Jeffersonville v. Gray, 165 Ind. 26, 74 N. E. 611; Cristadoro v. Von Behren, 119 La. 1025, 44 So. 852; Campbell v. Portland Sugar Co. 62 Me. 552, 16 Am. Rep. 503; Low v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 72 Me. 313, 39 Am. Rep. 381; Burke v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. 120 Mo. App. 683, 97 S. W. 981; Swords v. Edgar, 59 N. Y. 28, 17 Am. Rep. 295, affirming 1 Thomp. & C. 23, Addenda; Downes v. Elmira Bridge Co. 179 N. Y. 136, 71 N. E. 743, affirming 41 App. Div. 339, 58 N. Y. S. 628; Hart v. Delaware, etc. R. Co. 76 Hun 296, 27 N. Y. S. 767; Harris v. Bremerton, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 160. Thus in Grand Tower Mfg. etc. Co. v. Hawkins, supra, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff used an unusual mode of access to a wharf boat without a light to guide him, it was held that his gross contributory negligence barred him from a recovery, the court saying: "The law, as declared by this court through a long series of decisions, is, that, although the mere fact that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, will not, of itself, prevent him from recovering for injuries caused by the negligence of others, yet he cannot recover in such case unless his negligence, as compared with the defendant's, was slight, and that of the defendant was gross. There must be fault on the part of the defendant, and no want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff, to entitle him to recover. . . . We are unable to conceive upon what principle appellant can be held liable. We are aware of no duty which it owed the public that was not discharged. It was not a common carrier of passengers, or in the exercise of functions from which the law would imply a duty to have a passway open to the public at all hours of day and night across its wharf boat. It received no compensation from passengers for the use of its boat, and, while it was its duty to have the passway safe which it permitted the public to use, the rights of the public were limited to that passway, and its use, when kept open for that purpose. They cannot compel appellant to maintain passways for passengers over and around every part of its wharf boat. Appellee was guilty of a high degree of negligence. A man of ordinary prudence would surely have restrained his anxiety until the steamboat had landed, and would then scarcely have been trying to reach it by an unusual mode of access, without even a light to guide him. We think it clear, from the evidence, that the plaintiff's own reckless imprudence was the efficient cause of his injury, and he alone must therefore bear the consequences." Similarly in DeGruy v. Aiken, 43 La. Ann. 798, 9 So. 747, it was held that it was contributory negligence for a man while waiting at night for the arrival of a steamer on which his daughter was a passenger to leave the wharf proper and to walk down the incline of the apron merely for the sake of the pleasure of standing in the breeze; and that he could not recover for injuries sustained by a fall due to a missing plank. The court said: "The wharf, proper, was safe enough, but it was highly imprudent to leave it and walk on the incline in the nighttime. This incline measures thirty-five feet in width and has a fall of nine feet. It is not a moderate incline. After a rain it is dangerous to walk on it. It had rained on the day of the accident. This apron is built, and has this fall, with unquestioned approval. Granted that there was a missing plank, as alleged, the plaintiff increased the risk of an accident by venturing on it in the nighttime. If in the discharge of a duty, in the performance of any work or service, an accident were to happen, because of a missing plank on this incline, those having it in charge would be exposed to the payment of damages, but the one hazarding himself to gratify a pleasure assumes certain risks; to recover, it must be shown that the defendants were guilty of negligence; that a dangerous open space was left for some time, prior to the accident, without repair." Likewise in Stewart v. Newport News, etc. R. Co. 86 Va. 988, 11 S. E. 885, it was held that an engineer on a boat lying at a pier waiting to be loaded with coal who was familiar with the construction of the premises was guilty of contributory negligence in selecting a dangerous passageway in preference to the way provided. The court said: "That the deceased contributed to his death by his own negligence in this case is clear. (1) He was the chief engineer of a steamship which was constantly taking in coal, and as it was his business and custom to go on these piers to see to the weighing of the necessary coal for the ship, it is not unreasonable to suppose that he knew that these chutes were uncovered, as they were always uncovered, as are all coal piers, as is proved by the evidence in this case. (2.) He has before coaled at this pier, perhaps more than once. His face was familiar to the health officer. He therefore knew that these chutes at this pier were uncovered generally, and always before this.

(3.) He certainly knew that they were uncovered on this pier at this time, because he was distinctly so informed by the health officer. (4.) He was warned to wait for a guide, that his trip would not only be dangerous, but probably useless, unless he waited for the messenger, who would be sent for him to give him notice that his coal was ready, and to perform the very important part of guiding him to the office in safety over these dangerous ways. He chose to disregard this caution, and so neglected wholesome safeguards. (5.) When leaving the office, where he really had none but a pretended mission, he saw safe planked-ways, one on each side of the track, which he declined to use, and walked upon the track, which he knew to be honeycombed with open chutes. (6.) When he reached the chute in question, which was wide open and under the full blaze of an electric light, which plainly showed it to all who chose to look, he neglected to use his eyes, and walked into it, and to his death; when, by the simple precaution of looking where he stepped, he would have been saved from all harm. This negligence on his part was of the grossest character. Why he did not look where he was walking, and where he was looking, will forever be unexplained; but that his own negligence was the proximate cause of the injury which he received, without which, the injury would not have happened to him is clear, and he is not entitled to recover damages from another for an injury caused by himself."

However, a person unlawfully on a pier has the right to assume, as against those bound to maintain the pier in good condition, that it is in a fair and ordinary state of security and strength, and able to sustain all the weights to which such a structure is usually subjected, and before contributory negligence can be imputed to him the contrary must come to his knowledge. Swords v. Edgar, 59 N. Y. 28, 17 Am. Rep. 295, affirming 1 Thomp. & C. 23, Addenda. And it is not contributory negligence for the driver of a loaded wagon in the waning twilight to fail to observe a small hole in a place where he has the right to expect secure footing and where, but for the dereliction of the defendants, he would find it. Campbell v. Portland Sugar Co. 62 Me. 552, 16 Am. Rep. 503. It has been held that where the open space between two floats used as a wharf was so apparent at the time that one could readily see it and thus be reminded of the danger, contributory negligence could be imputed to a person familiar with the construction; but that momentary forgetfulness might absolve one from the charge of contributory negligence when the danger was so hidden as not of itself to be a reminder of its existence to one coming within its presence, since mere forgetfulness of hidden danger with which one may be acquainted does not necessarily, as a matter of law, constitute contributory negligence. Harris v. Bremerton, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 160. In Jeffersonville v. Gray, 165 Ind. 26, 74 N. E. 611, wherein it appeared that the defective condition of a wagonway on a wharf was open to ordinary observation but was not in fact seen by the plaintiff who was injured by the overturning of his wagon loaded with hay, it was held that he was not guilty of such contributory negligence as to bar a recovery. The court said: "It is true the answers to the interrogatories show that the jury found that the condition of said wagonway was open to ordinary observation by persons on vehicles passing over the same, and that vehicles could not by the exercise of care be safely hauled over said wagonway, but it was also found that appellee did not see the condition of said wagonway, nor did he see his horse step into the hole in said way, and could not see the same because he was sitting three or four feet back on his load. There are no answers showing that the position occupied by appellee on the load of hay was not a proper one, nor that there was any place on either side of said hole that he could have driven, nor that he was not exercising ordinary care in so driving. The further point is made that appellee could have driven his wagon along said wagonway without going upon the cinder footway, because there was a space of six feet between said cinder footway and the end of said west apron of the ferry dock, and the wheels of appellee's wagon were only five feet apart. Said answers of the jury do not show what the conditions were in the space mentioned, nor that the roadway ran in this space, nor is there anything in said answers to indicate which end of the apron is referred to, nor the direction the measurement refers to, whether up or down the river, nor that appellee could have driven through said space. It is clear, under the rule heretofore stated, that said facts are not in irreconcilable conflict with the general verdict, which found that appellee was not guilty of contributory negligence." And in Low v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 72 Me. 313, 39 Am. Rep. 331, it was held that a customs officer who was on a wharf in search of a smuggler and who was injured by falling into a gangway was not precluded from recovering. For the defendant it was argued that "if the night is light enough to see the gangway, no railing or light is necessary to enable a person to avoid it, and if the night is too dark to allow of its being seen, then a person groping around in the dark and unconsciously walking into it is guilty of such negligence as to preclude him from recovering." The court said: "The idea seems to be that there is no necessity for any precaution on the part of the wharf owners, because constant vigilance on the part of those who come there when it is light enough to see the danger will enable them to avoid it; and, duty or no duty, they must not come without a light in the nighttime, or they will be set down as wanting in ordinary care, and so forfeit their right to protection or compensation. The argument establishes, if anything, too much. The questions are not of a character to be disposed of by a little neat logic. . . . His duty carried him there in consequence of, and in connection with the business which defendants had established there. The jury probably thought that if he went as a section of a torchlight procession he might as well have stayed at home; that he was not in search of an honest man, and had no need of a lantern; that it would take a cordon of custom house officers, exhibiting themselves with lanterns, numerous enough to surround the vessel constantly from the time she hauled into the wharf till she was unloaded, to prevent the mischief, while prudently conducted observation by one or two watching at the right times and seasons without making their presence known, would answer the same purpose. Seeing that the defendants did owe a duty to the public officer, and seeing too how easily they might, to all appearance, by a little precaution, have prevented his being made a cripple, if the 'practical men' before whom the case was tried made allowances for the liability of the human senses to deception in a dim light, and acquitted him of a want of ordinary care in the premises, we are not satisfied that the conclusion they reached on this question of contributory negligence, is so plainly unjustifiable as to require us to send the case to a new trial."

CITY OF BREMERTON.

Washington Supreme Court—April 12, 1915.

85 Wash. 64; 147 Pac. 638.

Wharves — Personal Injury from Defect — Liability.

In an action for personal injury from falling into the open space between the two floats constituting a public municipal dock, it is held that the city's negligence was for the jury.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Evidence, in an action for falling into opening in municipal dock, held to make the plaintiff's contributory negligence a question for the jury.

[See note at end of this case.]

Contributory Negligence — Forgetfulness of Known Danger.

Momentary forgetfulness of a danger so hidden as not of itself to be a reminder of its existence to one coming within its presence does not, as a matter of law, constitute contributory negligence.

[See Ann. Cas. 1913D 36.]

Wharves — Personal Injury from Defect — Liability.

Where a city maintained a floating public dock for the landing of launches and small water craft by day and night, and extended an implied invitation to the public to use it, plaintiff's failure to pay the required wharfage for landing his launch does not make him a trespasser, so as to affect his right of action against the city for personal injury from alleged negligent maintenance of the dock.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kitsap county: FRENCH, Judge.

Action for damages. E. T. Harris, plaintiff, and City of Bremerton, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Jas. W. Carr for appellant.

Vince H. Faben and C. D. Sutton for respondent.

[65] PARKER, J.—The plaintiff, E. T. Harris, commenced this action in the superior court for Kitsap county, seeking recovery of damages which he alleged resulted to him from the negligence of the defendant city in the maintenance of a floating public wharf used for the landing of launches and other small water craft. Trial before the court and a jury resulted in a verdict and judgment against the city, from which it has appealed to this court.

The city maintains a floating wharf for the use of the public at which small water craft land to receive and discharge passengers. The wharf consists of two floats, each being sixteen feet wide and approximately forty feet long. They lie end to end and project from the shore into deep water. They are held in place by piles so as to permit their rising and falling with the tide. Between the two floats there is a space of about eighteen inches. In this space there are two piles, each near the outer edges of the floats. The floats are held in place by these piles and two chains, fastening the floats together near their outer edges just outside the piles. There was at the time here involved an apron about five feet wide covering a portion of this open space between the floats and the piles, so that on each side between the apron and the piles there was an open space of water of about one and one-half by four feet. These spaces were not protected by railing or otherwise. There was an electric light some twenty-five feet distant from the wharf at right angles thereto, opposite this open space and the piles, so situated that it threw the shadow of one of the piles over the open spaces between the floats, rendering them not readily discernible at night to one passing over the wharf. The [66] wharf was evidently contemplated to be used by the public in the night as well as in the day, and the light was evidently for the purpose of lighting this wharf as well as another municipal wharf on and near the edge of which it was placed. The maintenance of the floating wharf in this manner, rendering the open space dangerous at night, is the alleged negligence of the city complained of.

At the time respondent was injured, he was operating a launch for hire, being engaged in ferrying passengers between Port Orchard and Bremerton and other points in that neighborhood. He had landed his launch at the wharf to receive and discharge passengers some five or six times only, the wharf being open to the public only a short time. He had never actually been upon the wharf, though he knew in a general way of the manner of its construction and of the open spaces and apron between the two floats of the wharf. On the night of April 5, 1913, about ten-thirty o'clock, he landed at the wharf with his launch. He stepped from the launch upon the wharf and, evidently with the view of reaching the bow of his launch and tying it to the wharf, walked along the wharf and fell into one of the open spaces between the floats, breaking one of his legs and receiving other severe injuries of which he now complains. He apparently momentarily forgot the open space between the floats, and, it then being in the shadow of the pile, he did not see it and was not reminded of it. There is some evidence tending to show that the city knew of the danger of these open spaces in the shadow of the pile at night, and, also, that it knew of other persons having been injured by falling into them.

Some contention is made that the evidence was not sufficient to support the conclusion that the city was negligent in the maintenance of the wharf with the open space therein. We think this contention cannot be sustained as a matter of law, in view of the hidden danger which existed because of the open spaces, and their not being readily observable at night by reason of the shadow of the pile being thrown upon [67] them, and the fact that people would necessarily have to walk so close to them in passing along the wharf. These facts, we think, made the question of the city's negligence one for the jury to determine. Gregg v. King County, 80 Wash. 196, 141 Pac. 340.

It is also contended that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence, in the light of his knowledge of the manner of the construction of the wharf. We are unable to so decide as a matter of law. If the open space had been so apparent at the time that one could have readily seen it and thus been reminded of the danger, there would possibly be merit to this contention, but momentary forgetfulness may absolve one from the charge of contributory negligence when the danger is so hidden as not of itself to be a reminder of its existence to one coming within its presence. We have repeatedly held that mere forgetfulness of hidden danger with which one may be acquainted does not necessarily, as a matter of law, constitute contributory negligence. Jordan v. Seattle, 26 Wash. 61, 66 Pac. 114; Williams v. Ballard Lumber Co. 41 Wash. 338, 83 Pac. 323; Blankenship v. King County, 68 Wash. 84, 122 Pac. 616, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 182.

It is contended that the trial court erred in rulings made upon the pleadings and in excluding evidence which in effect eliminated from the case the question of respondent's being a trespasser upon the wharf at the time he was injured, which question counsel for the city sought to bring into the case with the view of defeating respondent's right of recovery. The fact thus sought to be proven was, in substance, that the city required all persons operating launches or boats for hire to pay wharfage for the privilege of landing at the wharf, and that respondent had failed to make such payment and therefore had no right to land his launch there. The law which regards the maintenance of a wharf for the use of the public as an invitation to all persons to go upon it who may have use for it is stated in 40 Cyc. 917, as follows:

of loading and unloading vessels, gives a general license to all persons to go upon and use it in the manner and for the purposes contemplated; and so long as it is kept open, the duty rests upon the occupant or owner of keeping it in a safe condition so that those having a lawful right can go upon it without incurring risk of injury. Consequently if a person, when properly on the wharf, in the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, sustains injury through a defect in the wharf, he is entitled to recover, unless the defect was so hidden and concealed that it could not be discovered by such examination and inspection as the construction, uses, and exposures of the wharf reasonably required. Plaintiff's right of action in such a case arises from the duty which the law imposes on the owner or occupant to keep the wharf safe, so long as he should permit it to be open and used, and not from any contract between them."

In view of the public use to which the wharf was admittedly intended by the city, and the implied invitation to the public to go upon it and use it, we think that the mere fact that the respondent had not paid the wharfage did not render him a trespasser to the extent that thereby he lost such right of protection against personal injuries received through the city's negligence when he was upon the wharf as other members of the public had. It may be that the city could have prevented him from landing his launch at the wharf without first paying the wharfage, but the city did not do so. We think that whatever failure there may have been on the part of the respondent to pay for this privilege, it did not affect his rights sought to be enforced in this action. Petersburg v. Applegarth, 28 Grat. (Va.) 321, 26 Am. Rep. 357; Swords v. Edgar, 59 N. Y. 28, 17 Am. Rep. 295; Lowe v. Salt Lake City, 13 Utah 91, 44 Pac. 1050, 57 Am. St. Rep. 708.

Counsel for the city contends that the trial court erred in giving instructions to the jury. We do not find in the statement of facts any exception to the instructions complained of. Under our decisions in Coffey v. Seattle Electric Co. 59 [69] Wash. 686, 109 Pac. 202, and State v. Peeples, 71 Wash. 451, 129 Pac. 108, this would seem to preclude inquiry upon our part touching such claimed errors, since under those decisions there seems to be no way of proper preservation of such question for our review except by bill of exceptions or statement of facts. We find among the clerk's files certified here a paper purporting to be the city's exceptions to the instructions complained of, and by indorsement of the trial judge thereon these exceptions appear to have been allowed by him before the return of the jury to render their verdict. It could be well argued that this is not a bill of exceptions binding upon the respondent properly preserving these questions for review here, in the light of Rem. & Bal. Code, §§ 389, 391 (P. C. 81, §§ 685, 689), prescribing the notice, time and manner of certifying a bill of exceptions or statement of facts. However this may be, these purported exceptions refer to supposed instructions by number only, and there are no numbered instructions in the record before us given by the court. It seems, therefore, quite clear to us that these claimed errors in the giving of instructions do not refer to instructions sought to be reviewed, with such certainty as to enable us to notice them, aside from the question of the exceptions not being otherwise properly preserved by bill of exceptions or statement of facts in the record. The exceptions do not tell us what instructions were called to the trial court's attention and claimed to be erroneous.

By this same method of identification, appellant's counsel had, in the same paper only, attempted to except to the refusal of the court to give certain instructions requested by him to be given. Of these claimed errors we think it is sufficient to say that we have carefully read all these requested instructions and are clearly of the opinion that they were given in substance in so far as the facts of the case call for instructions upon matters therein requested. In connection with these claimed errors, we also pass the question of the proper preservation of exceptions to the refusal of the court [70] to give these instructions, because of the failure to have such exceptions included in a bill of exceptions or the statement of facts.

Contention is made that the verdict of the jury is excessive to the extent that it evidences prejudice and passion on the part of the jury. We deem it sufficient to say that careful review of the evidence convinces us that the verdict of the jury should not be disturbed upon this ground.

The judgment is affirmed.

Morris, C. J., Holcomb, Mount, and Chadwick, JJ., concur.

NOTE.

It is well settled that a municipality, as is held in the reported case, is liable in damages to a person injured on account of its negligence in the maintenance of a wharf, to the use of which he is entitled by virtue of the implied invitation of the public. For a full treatment of the subject of injuries to persons on or about wharves, docks, or piers, see the note to Gregg v. King County, reported ante, this volume, at page 185.

KING

v.

COONEY-ECKSTEIN COMPANY.

Florida Supreme Court—November 4, 1913.

66 Fla. 246; 63 So. 659.

Wharves — Personal Injury from Defect — Liability of Lessee.

At common law the tenant and occupier of a wharf is bound, as between himself and the public, to keep the premises in such condition that they will be reasonably safe for persons who go lawfully upon the premises, by express or implied invitation; and such tenant or occupier is prima facie liable for damages caused by defects in or dangers on the premises that reasonably could have been avoided by appropriate care taken by the tenant or occupier. This is the law even though the lessor covenanted to keep the premises in repair.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The liability of the lessee in damages for injuries to others caused by unsafe premises is grounded upon his duty in being the occupant to keep the wharf in reasonably safe condition for those who go thereon by express or implied invitation.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The common-law rule of liability of lessees who have control or occupancy of a wharf, for injuries caused by the defective or dangerous condition of the premises where such defective or dangerous condition reasonably should have been known to and remedied by the occupying tenant, is in force in this state.

[See note at end of this case.]

Trial — Direction of Verdict — Insufficiency of Evidence.

A verdict for the defendant should never be directed by the court, unless it is clear that there is no evidence whatever adduced that could in law support a verdict for the plaintiff. If there is evidence tending to prove the issue, and sufficient to show liability, it should be submitted to the jury as a question of fact to be determined by them, and not taken from the jury and passed upon by the court as matter of law.

Damages — Personal Injury — Measure of Damages.

The damages recoverable in actions for personal injuries are for all the legal and natural consequences proximately resulting from the negligence alleged, though the particular form or nature of the results were not contemplated or foreseen.

Negligence — Affirmative Defenses.

Assumption of risk and contributory negligence when available are affirmative defenses.

Error to Circuit Court, Duval county:
CALL, Judge.

Action for damages. Ed King, plaintiff, and Cooney-Eckstein Company, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion.
REVERSED.

Bryan & Carson for plaintiff in error.

John E. & Julian Hartridge for defendant in error.

[248] WHITFIELD, J.—In an action to recover compensatory damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant corporation, the court directed a verdict for the defendant; and to a judgment rendered on the verdict, the plaintiff took writ of error.

It appears that the defendant was the lessee of a wharf or dock, which the lessor covenanted "to keep in usual repair;" that the lessor reserved "the right to discharge at said dock one or more vessels each year" and also the privilege of "loading or unloading its lighter over said leased premises without charge;" that more than two years after the lease began a decayed plank in the dock gave way under a truck containing lumber, thereby injuring the plaintiff who was carrying the lumber to a ship being loaded at the dock; that the defect in the plank was not patent to casual observation, but could have been seen by a reasonably careful inspection.

It does not appear that any one other than the lessee was in control of or occupied the wharf or dock at the time of the injury, even though the loading of the vessel may not have been under the direction of the defendant lessee. The occupancy and control of the dock and the [249] liabilities incident thereto were apparently that of the lessee in possession under the lease.

For the defendant in error it is contended that the lessor and not the lessee is liable for injuries caused by the defective condition of the wharf or dock. This contention ignores the fact that both the lessor and the lessee may be liable under certain circumstances and that prima facie the liability rests primarily upon the one in actual occupancy and control of the premises.

At common law the tenant and occupier of premises is bound, as between himself and the public, to keep the premises in such condition that they will be reasonably safe for persons who go lawfully upon the premises by express or implied invitation; and such tenant or occupier is prima facie liable for damages caused by defects in or dangers on the premises that reasonably could have been avoided by appropriate care taken by the tenant or occupier. This is the law even though the lessor covenanted to keep the premises in repair.

The liability of the lessee is grounded upon his duty in being the occupant to keep the premises in reasonably safe condition for those who go thereon by express or implied invitation. See 1 Thompson on Neg. Sec. 1154 et seq.; Keeler v. Lederer Realty Corp. 26 R. I. 524, 59 Atl. 855; Hussey v. Ryan, 64 Md. 426, 2 Atl. 729, 54 Am. Rep. 772; Abbott v. Jackson, 84 Me. 449, 24 Atl. 900; 24 Cyc. 1125.

The common law rule of liability of lessees who have control or occupancy of premises, for injuries caused by the defective or dangerous condition of the premises where such defective or dangerous condition reasonably should have been known to and remedied by the occupying tenant, is in force in this State.

A verdict for the defendant should never be directed by the court, unless it is clear that there is no evidence whatever [250] adduced that could in law support a verdict for the plaintiff. If there is evidence tending to prove the issue, and sufficient to show liability, it should be submitted to the jury as a question of fact to be determined by them, and not taken from the jury and passed upon by the court as matter of law. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Pelot, 62 Fla. 121, 56 So. 496; Southern Express Co. v. Williamson, 66 Fla. 286, 63 So. 433, decided this term.

The damages recoverable in actions for personal injuries are for all the legal and natural consequences proximately resulting from the negligence alleged, though the particular form or nature of the results were not contemplated or foreseen. Hussey v. Ryan, 64 Md. 426, 2 Atl. 729, 54 Am. Rep. 772.

Evidence was adduced showing that the defendant was a lessee of the wharf or dock; that the plaintiff was lawfully upon the dock, and apparently without his fault, was injured because of the defective condition of the wharf or dock owing to a decayed plank in the floor thereof over which plaintiff rightly passed with lumber in loading a vessel, when the defendant by ordinary care could have known of and remedied the defect, and there was apparently no reason for the plaintiff to apprehend danger to himself.

The plaintiff did not assume the risks incident to the negligence of the lessee in not having the dock in safe condition, when the danger was not obvious and was unknown to the plaintiff. Assumption of risk and contributory negligence when available are affirmative defenses; and neither appears in the evidence.

The injuries sustained by the plaintiff are apparently a natural and proximate result of the defendant's negligence in not exercising due care to keep the dock in a reasonably safe condition.

A verdict for the plaintiff on the evidence would not [251] have been unlawful; and for the error in directing a verdict for the defendant the judgment is reversed.

ON REHEARING.

(December 10, 1913.)

PER CURIAM.—In a petition for rehearing it is suggested that the defendant corporation leased the dock and placed thereon certain lumber to be transported by ship; that the placing of the lumber on the dock constituted a delivery by the defendant to the ship and defendant did nothing toward the loading of the lumber on the ship, but a contractor was employed by the ship to place the lumber on the ship, and this contractor employed the plaintiff to assist in loading the lumber on the ship, therefore the ship assumed the duty of providing a safe place for its agents or servants to work, and the defendant lessee of the dock is not liable in damages for the injury to the plaintiff caused by a defect in the floor of the dock which might have been seen by a reasonably careful inspection.

The liability of the defendant is based upon the fact that it was the lessee of the dock having the use thereof and did use it in placing the lumber thereon for delivery to the ship, which facts, under the law, imposed upon the lessee a duty to maintain the dock in a reasonably safe condition for those properly thereon, and this liability is not affected by the liability, or non-liability, of the owner of the dock and the ship jointly or severally for any negligence chargeable to them that was a proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury.

A rehearing is denied.

Shackleford, C. J., and Taylor, Cockrell, Hocker and Whitfield, JJ., concur.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that a person who is injured while lawfully on a dock and without his fault may recover from the lessee of the dock the damage he sustains by reason of the negligence of the lessee in not having the premises in a reasonably safe condition. The cases on this question are collated in the note to Gregg v. King County, reported ante, this volume, at page 135.

v.

Grey & Archer for appellant.

Albert S. Woodruff for respondent.

DELAWARE RIVER TRANSPORTATION COMPANY.New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals—March 16, 1914.

85 N. J. L. 700; 90 Atl. 288.

Wharves — Personal Injury from Defect — Liability.

In an action for injuries by falling into a hole in the wharf of defendant transportation company, to which plaintiff had gone to receive an expected shipment on defendant's vessel, the evidence is held to sustain a finding that plaintiff was impliedly invited by defendant, on the particular occasion, to go to the river end of the wharf, where he was injured.

Trial — Instruction Given in Substance.

The court is not bound to grant a requested instruction in the very language of the request.

Objection to Refusal of Instruction.

Notwithstanding the new practice act, the appellate court will not review error in refusing requested instructions, unless appellant, at the time of presentation, objected to the refusal to charge each specific request.

Same.

In order to object on appeal to the giving of a requested instruction in language different from the request, an objection should be taken to the request as charged and to the refusal to charge as requested.

Damages — Personal Injury — Loss of Earning Capacity.

One receiving personal injuries because of another's negligence is entitled to damages for any disability he has sustained, including loss of earning capacity.

[See 8 R. C. L. tit. Damages, p. 477.]Same.

Where disability to labor, etc., is clearly proved in a personal injury action, the jury may award a reasonable sum therefor, irrespective of whether the injured person is shown to have any definite income.

Same.

The value of evidence, in a personal injury action, that plaintiff is unable to do as much and as hard work since as before the injury is for the jury, though plaintiff is also shown to have a pulmonary disease.

Appeal from Supreme Court.

Action for damages. Isaac Miller, plaintiff, and Delaware River Transportation Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

[701] KALISCH, J.—The appellant appeals from a judgment obtained against it by the plaintiff for damages sustained by him as a result of falling into a hole made by the temporary removal of a plank, in the appellant's wharf at Burlington. The plaintiff was a huckster, and on the day he received his injuries was expecting a consignment of fruit shipped on one of the defendant's steamboats from Philadelphia to Burlington. It was in the month of February and the weather was very cold and the plaintiff drove his horse and wagon to the wharf to receive the shipment. The boat was late in arriving. On the land end of the wharf was defendant's freight house with a covered platform adopted for and from which wagons were loaded. The boat did not arrive until eight-thirty that evening. The plaintiff left his horse and wagon at the land end of the wharf and went to the river to see if the boat was about to dock, and if so, to return and back his wagon on to the wharf and close to the boat, to load his wagon, because of the freezing weather and perishable quality of the consignment. He was returning to his wagon when he fell into a hole in the wharf which he claims he did not observe on account of the darkness. The appellant, at the close of the case, asked the court to direct a verdict for the appellant which was denied. It is the refusal of this request which is made a basis of one of the grounds of appeal.

The appellant's argument on this point is that it was not shown that the plaintiff had been legally invited to be in the place where he was at the time of the accident, but, on the contrary, the regular practice was for him to back up his wagon to the covered platform and receive the fruit delivered under the appellant's shed instead of going on the open part of the wharf where he was. But there was testimony on the part of the plaintiff that tended to establish that he had been accustomed for a long period of time both in the day and nighttime, of receiving the shipments made to him on the river end of the wharf directly from the boat, and this was especially so when the boat was late and the weather cold. This testimony was sufficient, if accepted by the jury to have warranted [702] a finding that there was an implied invitation, by the appellant, to the plaintiff to go to the river end of the wharf, at least, on the occasions stated.

But it is argued, by appellant's counsel, even though there was an implied invitation to the plaintiff to go out upon the wharf on foot on this occasion, he had no invitation to pass under a crane, the place where he met with his injury, for the reason that at the time the plaintiff went thereunder, there was a heavy chain hanging down from the middle beam of the structure which operated as notice to him that the passageway was not to be used.

From the exhibit and uncontroverted proof in the case it appears that the entire wharf was open for foot passengers and vehicles with the exception that near the river end was an open structure consisting of three upright posts standing in direct line at short intervals of each other which served to divide that space for a short distance into two passageways. The upright posts supported the ends of beams extending from the side of the freight house over the abutting drive and passageway, which structure, called a crane, was used to support an endless chain for loading and unloading wagons carrying articles of great weight. The appellant's contention, however, cannot prevail, for the reason that the plaintiff and his witnesses denied that there was any chain hanging there at the time or anything else tending to indicate that the passageway of this part of the wharf was not intended for use. Besides, there was testimony tending to establish that it was the custom of the plaintiff to go where he was, in looking after the fruit consigned to him. The circumstances presented purely a jury question which appears to have been properly submitted to them by the court.

An exception was taken to the refusal of the court to charge the third, fourth and sixth requests, respectively. The third request was as follows: "If you find that the plaintiff was negligent in passing at night under the crane or in not seeing the hole, when he did so pass, he cannot recover." An examination of the judge's charge that he substantially charged the request, though not in the collocation of words of the request, [703] and this he was not bound to do. Consolidated Traction Co. v. Chenoweth, 58 N. J. L. 416, 34 Atl. 817, 61 N. J. L. 554, 35 Atl. 1067.

The same answer also applies to the exception to the refusal of the court to charge the fourth request.

Although the appellant argued in the brief a refusal to charge a seventh request, and while the record shows that such a request was made, it does not appear that any objection was made to the refusal of the court to charge it; nor was there any objection made to what the court said on the subject of the request.

The fact that requests to charge were presented to the court, which the court failed or refused to charge, will not make such failure or refusal the basis of an appeal, unless it further appears that the party presenting the requests to charge made, at the time, objection to the failure or refusal of the court to charge each specific request. And where the court charges a request in other terms than those embodied in it, if counsel desire to take advantage of this, an objection should be taken to the request as charged and to the refusal to charge as requested. The new Practice act does not relieve a party from pointing out at the trial to the judge the portions of the charge to which he objects as heretofore, nor from making objection to a refusal to charge a request, if it is intended to make the same the basis of an appeal. The new Practice act has made no change in that regard, only in that bills of exception are no longer necessary.

The remaining question to be considered is the one relating to damages. The court was requested to charge: "There is no proof of loss due to lessening of earning capacity, payment of expenses for medicine or physicians except one dollar. No other damages could be awarded except for pain and suffering." The court charged the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to damages for any disability that he had sustained. This was a correct statement of the legal rule. The appellant's assumption is that New Jersey Express Co. v. Nichols, 33 N. J. L. 434, 97 Am. Dec. 722, holds that unless some proof is made of the plaintiff's income or of his earning capacity, nothing can be awarded on that account. This is a false conception of what was decided by [704] the court. The question there was whether testimony of the plaintiff's average income was admissible as guiding the jury on the question of damages for disability. It was held that such testimony was admissible; but where there is a clear disability the jury may, undoubtedly, award what in their best judgment, as reasonable men, should be awarded, irrespective of whether any definite income is proved or not. The evidence, as is said by Mr. Justice Depue in New Jersey Express Co. v. Nichols, supra (at p. 437), is "to guide them in their exercise of that discretion which to a certain extent is always vested in the jury." There was testimony which tended to show that the plaintiff was unable to do as much and as hard work as he had been able to do before the accident, and though he was afflicted with a pulmonary disease, the value of the evidence was for the jury.

The judgment will be affirmed.

For affirmance—The Chancellor, Chief Justice, Swayze, Parker, Bergen, Minturn, Kalisch, Bogert, Vredenburg, White, Heppheimer, JJ.—11.

For reversal—None.

NOTE.

It is held in the reported case that a person going on a wharf to receive a consignment expected to arrive by a steamboat is an invitee to whom is owed the duty of maintaining the premises in a reasonable safe condition. For a full discussion of the liability for injuries to persons on or about wharves, docks, or piers, see the note to Gregg v. King County, reported ante, this volume, at page 135.

TAYLOR

v.

NORTHERN COAL AND DOCK COMPANY.

Wisconsin Supreme Court—May 4, 1915.

161 Wis. 223; 153 N. W. 465.

Wharves — Personal Injury from Negligence — Liability.

Decedent, the employee of a shipbuilding company, engaged in repairing a coal-laden steamer which defendant company is discharging at its dock, who is authorized to be there, and whose presence is known to defendant, which makes no objection, is not a trespasser, but is entitled to the privileges and protection of a licensee.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In such case the defendant company is bound to refrain from acts of affirmative negligence unnecessarily increasing the danger to decedent or rendering the premises more dangerous, at least without notifying him of such increased danger.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Defendant dock company, knowing that the employee of a shipbuilding company, a licensee, was engaged in repair work on the side of the steamer under its discharging rig, and that coal often dropped when the rig was in operation, and which did not notify decedent when the rig was started, is guilty of actionable negligence.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In such action evidence was held to sustain a finding that decedent was not guilty of contributory negligence.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In such action the refusal to submit to the jury the question whether ordinary care or the precaution usually exercised upon the dock, was exercised, and whether decedent knew that the rig had started, and that coal was being hoisted before the hoisting of the particular bucket from which coal fell and killed him is not erroneous, where they do not cover any facts put in issue by the pleadings.

[See note at end of this case.]

Trial — Instructions Given in Substantance.

The refusal of requested instructions is not prejudicial error, where the subject thereof is sufficiently covered by the general charge.

Instruction Not Based on Evidence — Action for Personal Injury.

In an action for the death of a licensee engaged in repairing a coal-laden steamer at defendant's discharging dock, killed by coal which dropped from the buckets, an instruction as to decedent's dullness of hearing is properly refused, where it does not appear that it had anything to do with the injury, and where, others present of sound hearing and in a position to hear did not hear defendant's alleged warnings.

Refusal of Instruction Harmless.

In an action for the death of plaintiff's decedent, a licensee, while repairing a coal-laden steamer at defendant's discharging dock, from coal dropping from the discharging buckets, where the questions whether decedent was warned not to be on the dock between the hoisting rig and the boat while the hoisting apparatus was in operation were immaterial, and, if eliminated, would have left findings sufficient to support the verdict, a charge putting the burden of proof upon the defendant on the issues made on such questions is not reversible error.

Same.

In such action an instruction that, if defendant's employees knew, or ought to have known, that decedent was in a place of danger, it was their duty to have given warning, is not prejudicial error.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Douglas county: LUECK, Judge.

Action for death by wrongful act. Margaret Taylor, administratrix, plaintiff, and Northern Coal and Dock Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. AFFIRMED.

[224] The appeal is from a judgment entered November 16, 1914, for the sum of $4,510.54 damages and costs in an action brought for the death of one George Taylor.

The complaint contained four causes of action: the first, for injuries to and pain and suffering of deceased caused by the wanton and wilful negligence of the defendant; second, for the death of deceased caused by the wanton and wilful negligence of the defendant; third, for injuries and suffering caused by the negligence of the defendant; and fourth, for death caused by the negligence of the defendant.

The court below held that there was no wanton or wilful negligence shown and submitted the case to the jury on the causes of action for ordinary negligence. The jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Was George Taylor warned not to be on the dock between the hoisting rigs and the boat? A. No.

"(2) Was said George Taylor sufficiently warned prior to the injury that he was not to work between the hoisting rig and the edge of the dock while the hoisting apparatus was in operation? A. No.

"(3) Did the defendant negligently fail to warn said [225] George Taylor of the starting of said hoisting apparatus after the repairs to the steering line had been completed? A. Yes.

"(4) If you answer the third question 'Yes,' then answer this question: Was such negligence the proximate cause of the injury and death of said George Taylor? A. Yes.

"(5) Did any want of ordinary care on the part of George Taylor contribute proximately to produce his injury? A. No.

"(6) What sum of money will compensate the widow for the pecuniary loss sustained by her in consequence of the death of said George Taylor? A. 4,000.

"(7) What sum of money will make compensation for the damages sustained by George Taylor in his lifetime in consequence of the injury received by him? A. $350."

Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff thereon and defendant appealed.

Luse, Powell & Luse and A. E. Boyesen for appellant.

Grace, Hudnall & Fridley for respondent.

[227] KERWIN, J.—At the time of the injury complained of the defendant was the owner of a coal dock on the bay in the city of Superior and engaged in unloading coal from boats onto said dock. In carrying on the business boats loaded with coal are tied up at the end of said dock. The floor of the dock is a few feet above the water of the bay. A trestle rests on the dock six or eight feet from the end of the dock and extends above the floor of the dock about sixty feet. There are appliances used for hoisting buckets of coal from boats tied up beside the dock, and a chute or hopper into which is dumped the coal raised from the boats in said buckets. On top of the trestle is a shanty which is occupied by the person who operates the machinery. The buckets in passing from the boat to the chute pass over and sixty or seventy feet above the portion of the floor or dock which is at the bottom of the superstructure and between it and the outer or channel edge of the dock. In the usual operation of unloading coal from the boats onto the dock lumps of coal fall from the buckets onto the dock and near the outer edge of the dock.

On the 4th and 5th of December, 1912, the steamer Charles Hebbard was moored at the edge of the dock of defendant for [228] the purpose of having its cargo of coal unloaded on defendant's dock and the defendant was on said days engaged in unloading the cargo. On and prior to December 5, 1912, one George Taylor was in the employ of the Superior Shipbuilding Company as mechanic and ship carpenter. Said Shipbuilding Company was at said time engaged in repairing boats when moored at the docks. Said Shipbuilding Company received an order to repair the Charles Hebbard, and in pursuance of such order directed Taylor and others of its employees to make the repairs. On the 5th of December, 1912, said Taylor was engaged in making the repairs, when a lump of coal fell from a bucket while being hoisted by defendant and struck him upon the head, from the effects of which he died.

Counsel for defendant insists that the plaintiff failed to make a case and that a verdict should have been directed for defendant on the ground that there was no proof of negligence on the part of defendant and that the evidence showed that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence.

1. It is contended by counsel for appellant that deceased was a trespasser, or at most a bare licensee to whom the defendant owed no duty of active care. It is clear from the evidence that deceased was not a trespasser. He was lawfully at work repairing the boat at the time of the injury. He was authorized to be there and the defendant knew that he was at work repairing the boat and made no objection, so deceased at the time of injury was entitled, at least, to all the privileges and protection of a licensee. This court has often spoken upon the subject. Davis v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 58 Wis. 646, 17 N. W. 406, 46 Am. Rep. 667; Dowd v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 84 Wis. 105, 54 N. W. 24, 36 Am. St. Rep. 917, 20 L.R.A. 527; Hupfer v. National Distilling Co. 114 Wis. 279, 90 N. W. 191; Muench v. Heinemann, 119 Wis. 441, 96 N. W. 800; Rowley v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 135 Wis. 208, 115 N. W. 865; Haabrouck v. Armour, 139 Wis. 357, 121 N. W. 157, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 876; Brinilson v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 144 Wis. 614, [229] 129 N. W. 664, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 359; Haley v. Swift, 152 Wis. 570, 573, 140 N. W. 292, 293; Lewandowski v. McClintic-Marshall Constr. Co. 155 Wis. 322, 143 N. W. 1063.

The defendant was lawfully engaged in unloading the cargo. The deceased was lawfully on the boat repairing it. Under the decisions of this court the defendant was bound to refrain from acts of affirmative negligence. It was bound to so act as not to unnecessarily increase the danger to deceased or render the premises more dangerous, at least without notifying deceased of such increased danger. The rule is that one cannot be actively negligent toward a mere licensee. Hupfer v. National Distilling Co. 114 Wis. 279, 90 N. W. 191, at p. 290.

The licensor owes to the licensee the duty to refrain from acts of active negligence rendering the premises dangerous. Brinilson v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 144 Wis. 614, 129 N. W. 664, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 359.

The evidence shows that deceased had repairs to make on both sides of the boat. He had worked some on the port side and had started to do work on the starboard side under the unloading rig while the defendant was making some repairs on the unloading rig, which took over an hour to make, during which time the unloading rig was not running and it was safe for deceased and his crew to do the work. There is credible evidence that the defendant knew that deceased and his crew were at work on the starboard side of the boat and under the unloading rig where the coal dropped when the unloading rig was in operation and that deceased was not notified when the rig was started immediately before the coal fell upon him. The jury found that deceased was not warned and we think the findings are supported by the evidence.

We think the evidence was sufficient to show negligence on the part of defendant. Deceased and his crew were repairing the boat under the hoisting rig while the hoisting crew was repairing the steering line. Deceased was entitled to be [280] warned before the rig was again started, and the jury found upon sufficient evidence that he was not and that such failure to warn was the proximate cause of the injury.

It is further contended that the evidence establishes that deceased was guilty of contributory negligence. The jury acquitted him of contributory negligence, and we think there is ample evidence to support the finding. Had it been established that deceased continued to work at the place where injured after being warned and knew the danger, the situation would be different. There is evidence that only a few buckets had been hoisted after the steering line had been repaired, and that about two buckets a minute were hoisted; that after the steering line had been repaired the rig started, and after three or four buckets had been hoisted the rig was again stopped to allow the "bleeders" to be fixed, and deceased was injured by coal falling from the first bucket that was hoisted after the "bleeders" were fixed and the rig started.

We are convinced that there was no error in refusing to direct a verdict for defendant.

2. Counsel assigns thirty errors. We shall not attempt to discuss them at length. Perhaps they might be disposed of properly by the statement that we find no prejudicial error in the record. Northern Land Co. v. Wisconsin Live Stock Assoc. 160 Wis. 203, 151 N. W. 256.

The first assignment of error is the refusal to direct a verdict, which has been already disposed of.

The second and third assignments are to the effect that the court erred in refusing to submit to the jury whether Anderson [the hoister] exercised ordinary care or the precaution usually exercised upon the dock. There was no error in refusing these requests. They asked for a finding evidentiary and did not cover any fact put in issue by the pleadings, and moreover the matter involved was sufficiently covered by the verdict submitted and the charge.

The fourth assignment of error is the refusal of the court [231] to submit the question whether the deceased, Taylor, knew the rig had started and coal was being hoisted before the hoisting of the particular bucket from which coal fell which caused his injury. There was no error in refusing to submit this question for the reasons stated under the second and third assignments. Steber v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 139 Wis. 10, 120 N. W. 502; Wawrzyniakowski v. Hoffman, etc. Mfg. Co. 146 Wis. 153, 131 N. W. 429; Anderson v. Sparks, 142 Wis. 398, 125 N. W. 925; Lomoe v. Superior, Water, etc. Co. 147 Wis. 5, 132 N. W. 623; Vogel v. Herzfeld-Phillipson Co. 148 Wis. 573, 134 N. W. 141.

The fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth assignments may be considered together and relate to the refusal of the court to instruct the jury as requested by counsel for defendant. These requests were to the effect (a) that defendant was under no obligation to warn deceased; (b) that deceased was a man of experience and presumed to know the dangers; (c) that defendant was in no way interested in deceased being upon the dock and under no obligation to take active measures for his safety; (d) that deceased was bound to look after his own safety; (e) that there is no evidence that defendant's employees knew deceased's hearing was not acute; (f) that if deceased was hard of hearing it was his duty to govern himself accordingly; (g) that positive testimony is ordinarily entitled to more weight than negative. There was no error in the refusal to give these requests—at least no prejudicial error. So far as the requests touching deceased's familiarity with the business is concerned the matter was sufficiently covered by the charge given. On the requests as to dullness of hearing it does not appear that dullness of hearing had anything to do with the injury, because others present who were not dull of hearing and who were in position to hear did not hear the alleged warnings. Moreover the question was covered by the charge given. The request under (g) was sufficiently [232] covered by the general charge, which was substantially correct. Van Salvellergh v. Green Bay Traction Co. 132 Wis. 166, 111 N. W. 1120; Coel v. Green Bay Traction Co. 147 Wis. 229, 133 N. W. 23; Brown v. Milwaukee Electric Ry. etc. Co. 148 Wis. 98, 133 N. W. 589; Mariquette v. Goodrich Transit Co. 153 Wis. 92, 100, 140 N. W. 1094.

Assignments 12 and 13 refer to instructions of the court which it is claimed put the burden of proof upon the defendant as to questions 1 and 2 of the special verdict. The charge does not specifically put the burden of proof upon the defendant. It does not state upon whom the burden rests, but even if it did there was no reversible error, since questions 1 and 2 might be eliminated from the verdict and the balance of the verdict would support the judgment. In fact it is practically conceded on both sides that questions 1 and 2 are immaterial. They may therefore be regarded as surplusage. Milwaukee Trust Co. v. Milwaukee, 151 Wis. 224, 138 N. W. 707.

Error is assigned because the court instructed the jury in effect that if the employees of the defendant knew deceased was in a place of danger, or ought to have so known, it was their duty to give warning. There was no prejudicial error in this part of the charge. Rowley v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 135 Wis. 208, 115 N. W. 865; Hogan v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 59 Wis. 139, 17 N. W. 632.

Other errors assigned we do not regard of sufficient importance to require treatment. We have carefully examined the record and all the errors assigned and are convinced that no prejudicial error was committed.

By THE COURT.—Judgment is affirmed.

A motion for a rehearing was denied, with $25 costs, on October 5, 1915.

NOTE.

The rule that the owner of premises owes to a licensee the duty to refrain from acts of active negligence rendering the premises dangerous is applied in the reported case to the owner of a coal dock whose breach of duty caused the death of the plaintiff's intestate. The cases on this topic are collected in the note to Gregg v. King County, reported, ante, this volume, at page 135.

HUNT

v.

LEWIS.

Vermont Supreme Court—May 9, 1914.

87 Vt. 528; 90 Atl. 578.

Fraud — Action for Deceit — Procuring Personal Property.

The rules and principles governing actions for deceit in the sale of real or personal property apply to actions for procuring personal services by fraud.

Representations as to Future.

To constitute actionable fraud in the sale of property, the representations must be of existing facts relating to the subject matter of the contract, made by the vendor as inducements, which are false and known by the vendor to be false, or made by him as of his own knowledge without knowledge as to the facts, which are not open to knowledge of or known by the other party, and are relied on by him in making the purchase to his damage; representations as to future facts or promises, or matters of opinion, not constituting actionable fraud.

[See 18 Am. St. Rep. 556.]

Inducing Performance of Personal Services.

A declaration for fraud in procuring the services of an attorney, which alleged in the first count that the defendant represented that he would pay for the services, knowing that he would not have the money with which to pay and intending to deceive the plaintiff, and in the second count that the defendant falsely and maliciously represented that he would and could pay for the services, not knowing that he could or would have the money with which to pay, charges representations or promises as to future and not as to existing facts, and therefore does not state a cause of action.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

An amended count in the same declaration, which alleged that defendant had the money with which to pay for the services and he so informed the plaintiff and promised to pay for them, but did not intend to do so, merely alleges a promise, and not a misrepresentation as to an existing fact, and is insufficient.

B. A. Hunt pro se.
M. P. Maurice for defendant.

[529] TAYLOR, J.—This is an action on the case for fraud in procuring the services of the plaintiff, an attorney at law, not intending to pay therefor. The case was heard at the December Term, 1908, of Lamoille County Court on demurrer to the declaration. The demurrer was sustained and the declaration adjudged insufficient to which the plaintiff was allowed an exception. The cause was passed to this Court before trial.

The demurrer is general and no grounds of demurrer were specified in the court below, the case having arisen before the adoption of the rule requiring specification of grounds of demurrer. The bill of exceptions throws no light upon the question and the plaintiff's brief affords very little assistance in understanding his position either here or in the court below. The defendant says that the declaration does not state a cause of action; that neither count contains sufficient allegations of fraud.

The first count alleges in substance that the defendant was in need of counsel for a certain case in which he was interested; that he employed the plaintiff as attorney to attend to the case for him at a certain compensation to be paid in money as soon as the service was performed; that the plaintiff performed the service relying upon the representation of the defendant that he would pay as soon as the service was performed; that the defendant "neglected and refused to pay the plaintiff after he received the said services knowing all the time when he had engaged the plaintiff as aforesaid that he had not the money to pay for said services . . . and intending thereby to deceive and defraud the plaintiff, whereby the plaintiff hath been deceived and damaged as aforesaid." The second count is much the same except that therein the plaintiff alleges that the defendant employed him representing that he would and could pay for the services as soon as they were performed; that the plaintiff relied upon the representations of the defendant "then and there falsely and maliciously made for the purpose of procuring the services of the plaintiff;" that the defendant did not know at the [530] time of said arrangement that he "could and would have the money and pay the plaintiff as aforesaid . . . and he did not have the money and did not pay the plaintiff as aforesaid, whereby the plaintiff hath been defrauded," etc.

In the amended count filed in county court the plaintiff alleges in substance that the defendant was possessed of thirteen dollars and not intending to pay the plaintiff hired him to perform certain services for an agreed compensation; that when the agreement was made defendant informed the plaintiff that he (defendant) had the money to pay him (plaintiff) and that his money was ready for him as soon as the service was performed, the defendant thereby intending to get the service of the plaintiff and avoid paying therefor and defraud the plaintiff thereby; that plaintiff relied upon the information and representations of the defendant so made and performed the service; that the defendant received the benefits of the service and refused to pay therefor, whereby the plaintiff has been defrauded, etc.

The principal point made in the plaintiff's brief is that fraud in procuring the service of a person on credit, like fraud in the purchase of goods, is actionable. The defendant does not controvert this position nor advance the claim that actionable fraud may not enter into a contract for personal service. While our attention has not been called to any such case, we fail to discover any inherent peculiarity in a contract for service on credit that takes it out of the ordinary rules concerning fraudulent representations. The sufficiency of the declaration may therefore be tested by the principles governing actions for deceit in the sale and purchase of real estate or personal property.

To constitute actionable fraud or deceit in the sale of property the representations must be of existing facts relating to the subject matter of the contract and affecting its essence and substance, made by the vendor as inducements to the contract, such representations being false and at the time known by him to be false, or made as of his own knowledge without in fact knowing them to be true, not open to knowledge of or known by the other party and relied upon by him in making the purchase to his damage. Representations of facts that will exist in the future, or promises, or matters of judgment or opinion, though false and intended to deceive, do not afford the basis of actionable fraud. Shanks v. Whitney, 66 Vt. 405, 29 Atl. 367; Corey v. Boynton, 82 Vt. 257, 72 Atl. 987; Belka v. Allen, 82 Vt. [531] 456, 74 Atl. 91; Cabot v. Christie, 42 Vt. 121, 1 Am. Rep. 313.

An actionable misrepresentation must relate to a present or past state of facts. Belka et al. v. Adams, supra. Representations of intention, or promises, having reference merely to the future, constitute no ground of action. An action of deceit does not lie for failure on the part of a promisor to perform a promise made by him to do something in the future, which he does not intend to do and subsequently refuses to do, although the promisee has acted in reliance on such promise to his damage. 1 Jaggard on Torts, 583, 584; Bigelow on Frauds, 11, 12; Robertson v. Parks, 76 Md. 118, 24 Atl. 411; Patterson v. Wright, 64 Wis. 289, 25 N. W. 11;

Dawe v. Morris, 149 Mass. 188, 21 N. E. 313, 4 L.R.A. 158, 14 Am. St. Rep. 404. The distinction between a representation that something exists which does not, and a representation, or more properly a promise, that something shall be done thereafter, is obvious.

Tested by these rules neither count of the declaration is sufficient. Neither count alleges a misrepresentation of an existing fact. The first count merely alleges a promise by the defendant to pay for the services as soon as rendered knowing that he did not have the money with which to pay. While it discloses the defendant's "moral obliquity" and his capacity to disappoint the plaintiff, if he chose to break his promise, it does not charge actionable deceit. Best v. Smith, 54 Vt. 617. The second count differs from the first only in that it alleges in addition that the defendant represented that he would have the money with which to pay for the services as soon as rendered, not knowing at the time that he could and would have it. This was not a false representation of an existing fact but instead a promise coupled with a boast as to his ability to pay in the future. It was a mere matter of opinion and an action of fraud cannot be predicated upon such a representation. Jude v. Woodburn, 27 Vt. 415. The comment in Fisher v. Brown, 1 Tyler (Vt.) 387, 4 Am. Dec. 726, is pertinent: "When a man seeks to obtain credit and boasts his ability to pay, here is a proper occasion for the exercise of discretion and vigilance." Such statements ordinarily could not be classed as false, as they relate to future events, though with some the failure of realization might be so far certain as to make them fraudulent; but in no case would they sustain an action for deceit. Dyer v. Tilton, 23 Vt. 313; Best v. Smith, supra.

[532] The amended count is subject to the same obligations. It differs mainly in that it alleges that the defendant had the money with which to pay and so informed the plaintiff. Here, then, there was no false representation of an existing fact to secure the credit. When shorn of non-essentials it amounts to a charge that the defendant promised to pay for the services not intending to do so, which, as we have already seen, will not support the action. The demurrer was properly sustained.

Affirmed and remanded.

NOTE.

Right of Action for Fraud in Inducing Performance of Personal Services without Intent to Pay Therefor.

There seems to be no decision, other than the reported case, on the right of action for fraud in inducing the performance of personal services without the intention to pay therefor. Closely analogous, however, is another Vermont case, Carrigan v. Hull, 5 Vt. 22, which was an action of assumpsit for work and labor performed by the plaintiff on the defendant's farm. The testimony tended to show that the contract of employment was made with the defendant's son although the defendant was present at the time. It was also shown that the son was a bankrupt and that the defendant knew of this fact; that the plaintiff at the time of the making of the contract had but lately arrived from abroad, was a stranger to the defendant and his son and did not know of the latter's inability to pay the plaintiff's wages. The court in affirming a judgment in favor of the plaintiff said: "The instructions given to the jury in this case, do not treat the case as involving fraud per se; but as a case of evidence, tending to prove facts, from which the jury might infer the further fact of a fraudulent intention in the defendant and his son Sewall, to procure the plaintiff to labor for the defendant, with no prospect of ever getting any pay for his labor. The question now presented, is, whether the testimony, if believed, proved facts, from which this fraud might legally be inferred. It seems, that the plaintiff had but lately arrived at Plattsburgh from Ireland, when this contract was made; and that the said Sewall Hull had then lately come there from Peru, with expectation of being committed to prison for debt. The testimony is, that Sewall was then a bankrupt, and this well known to him and to the defendant.—There is no intimation that the plaintiff knew it. It is said the plaintiff had the means of knowledge. What these means were, or could have been, does not appear.—It is very improbable that the circumstances of Sewall were much known at Plattsburgh at that time. It does not appear, that they were known at all. Hence any inquiry by the plaintiff, in the neighborhood, might have been of no use. It is pretty certain, that the plaintiff would not thus have gone to Danville and performed this labor, if he had not believed, he should receive his pay.—All these considerations presented themselves as fully to the defendant then, as they have since been presented to the court and jury. If the defendant stood by, as was testified, and refused to become holden himself to pay for the plaintiff's labor, and heard Sewall, the bankrupt, make this contract with the plaintiff for his the defendant's benefit, and took the plaintiff home with him and received his labor, the defendant all this time knowing of Sewall's total inability to pay the plaintiff, and yet did not undeceive the plaintiff by informing him of Sewall's bankruptcy, from all this the jury might well infer the fraudulent intent of Sewall and the defendant to obtain this labor of the plaintiff, and he be left with no prospect of any compensation for it."

The general proposition laid down in the reported case that a mere promise or a representation in good faith as to future conditions does not constitute fraud has been recognized in many cases and is usually said to be subject to an exception in case of a wilfully false statement of an intention. Thus the concealment by a purchaser of the fact of his insolvency is, when coupled with a present intention on his part not to pay, a fraud entitling the seller to rescind. See the note to German Nat. Bank v. Princeton State Bank, 8 Ann. Cas. 502. In like manner, while a statement by a vendor of his intention to make certain improvements on adjacent property is ordinarily deemed to be a mere promise or expression of opinion as to the future, if such a statement is made with a present intention not to carry it into effect, it constitutes a fraud on the vendee. See the note to Roberts v. James, Ann. Cas. 1914B 859.

v.

GRIMM ET AL.

Georgia Supreme Court—September 22, 1914.

142 Ga. 448; 83 S. E. 200.

1. Executors and Administrators — Order to Sell Land — Sufficiency of Description.

An order to sell land, granted to an administrator by the court of ordinary, describing the land as located in a named county and known by a certain name, and as containing a stated number of acres, more or less, and lying alongside a certain river, followed by an additional description giving the calls for three sides of it, is not void for uncertainty. When property has a descriptive name, it may be conveyed by that name; and such description will prevail over one which is intended to be a further description, but which is uncertain and imperfect. Extrinsic evidence is receivable to apply the description to its subject-matter.

2. Evidence — Administrator's Deed — Necessity of Showing Appointment.

An administrator's deed, accompanied by the order of the ordinary granting leave to sell, is admissible as a muniment of title, without the production of the letters of administration.

3. Same.

An administrator's deed without an order of sale, or a sheriff's deed not accompanied by the execution under which the property is sold, is admissible in evidence as color of title.

4. Admissibility of Ancient Map.

An ancient map of the public roads of a county, purporting to have been made by authority, and coming from the proper custody, is competent evidence to show the existence and location of the public roads of the county at the time it was made, and in a contest between coterminous landowners, where a road delineated on the map is claimed to be a boundary, such map is relevant, and is receivable in evidence when, upon inspection by the court, the map appears to be what it purports to be and is shown to have been produced from the proper depository.

[See note at end of this case.]

5. Admissibility of Survey.

An unofficial survey is admissible in evidence when proved to have been correct.

6. Adverse Possession — Instruction Condemned.

The charge of the court in respect to prescriptive title was an inaccurate statement of the law.

7. Boundaries — Establishment by Parol.

A disputed boundary line between coterminous proprietors may be established by oral agreement, if the agreement be accompanied by actual possession to the agreed line, or is otherwise duly executed.

[See Ann. Cas. 1912B 662.]

8. Real Property — Action Held to Involve Title.

Where a plaintiff seeks to enjoin a defendant from trespassing on land, on the ground that he has title to the premises, and the defendant in his answer asserts title to the premises, and both parties offer evidence to substantiate their respective claims, it is error to instruct the jury that their verdict would not determine the title to the premises.

Error to Superior Court, Chatham county: CHARLTON, Judge.

Action for injunction. John H. Grimm et al., plaintiffs, and H. H. Bunger, defendant. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

P. W. Meldrim for plaintiff in error.

R. R. Richards for defendants in error.

[449] EVANS, P. J.—This is an action by John H. Grimm et al. against H. H. Bunger, to enjoin the defendant from knocking down parts of a fence erected by the plaintiffs, and otherwise trespassing upon a triangular piece of land containing between two and three acres, located in Chatham county, adjacent to the bridge which spans the Ogeechee river.

The plaintiffs prevailed, and the court refused the defendant a new trial.

1. The court received in evidence a deed from Brooks, administrator, to the plaintiffs, over the objection that the order from the court of ordinary authorizing the sale was insufficient to identify the premises, as one of the boundaries was omitted, and because the description in the deed did not correspond with the description [450] in the petition. The description of the premises in the order is all "that tract of land lying in the county of Chatham, said State, known as Litchfield, containing one thousand and eighty-four (1084) acres, more or less, lying on the Great Ogeechee River, bounded on the south by the Savannah and Darien Road, east by the Fort Argyle Road, and west by the Great Ogeechee River." When property has a descriptive name, it may be conveyed by that name; and such description will prevail over one which is intended to be a further description, but which is uncertain and imperfect. Martin v. Lloyd, 94 Cal. 195, 29 Pac. 491. Extrinsic evidence is receivable to apply the description to its subject-matter. Hancock v. King, 133 Ga. 734, 66 S. E. 949. If in fact the premises described in the petition are embraced within the premises known as "Litchfield," parol evidence is admissible to establish the same.

2. An administrator's deed, accompanied by the order of the ordinary granting leave to sell, is admissible as a muniment of title, although the letters of administration may not be produced. The granting of the order of sale by the ordinary adjudicated that the applicant was the administrator and authorized to make the sale. Roberts v. Martin, 70 Ga. 196.

3. It has been repeatedly ruled by this court that an administrator's deed without an order of sale, or a sheriff's deed not accompanied by the execution under which the property was sold, though inadmissible as a muniment of title, is admissible in evidence as color of title. Street v. Collier, 118 Ga. 470, 45 S. E. 294; Dodge v. Cowart, 131 Ga. 549, 62 S. E. 987; Burkhalter v. Edwards, 16 Ga. 593 (2), 596, 60 Am. Dec. 744.

4. The court received in evidence a copy of a map purporting to have been made by John McKinnon on September 5, 1816, over the objection that the map did not purport to have been made by the county surveyor, and that a map made by a private person should be proved to be correct before it is admissible as evidence. Counsel for the defendant stated that he did not insist upon the introduction of the original, which was in the custody of the county commissioners. The court allowed the map to be introduced on the ground that it came from the custody of the proper public officials, and purported on its face to be a map of the county roads in 1816. The map had an endorsement thereon that it was made at the request of the commissioners of roads of the county, purporting [451] to have been signed by "John McKinnon, Surv.," and bearing date September 5, 1816. An ancient map of the public roads of a county, purporting to have been made by authority, and coming from the proper custody, is competent evidence to show the existence and location of the public roads of the county at the time it was made; and in a contest between coterminous landowners, where a road delineated on the map is claimed to be a boundary, such map is relevant on the question of boundary. The theory on which such ancient maps are received is that where the matter in controversy is ancient and not susceptible of better evidence, traditional reputation of matters of public and general interest is competent evidence of the matters to which it relates. 1 Greenleaf, Ev. (16th ed.) 226; Adams v. Stanyan, 24 N. H. 405; Donohue v. Whitney, 133 N. Y. 178, 30 N. E. 848. The original map should be produced and shown to have come from the proper depository; and if upon inspection the court should be of the opinion that it is what it purports to be, the map is receivable in evidence without further extrinsic proof.

The admissibility in evidence of an ancient map of matters of a public and general interest is not to be confounded with a map which a landowner causes to be made of his premises. In Bower v. Cohen, 126 Ga. 35, 40, 54 S. E. 918, it was doubted that the rule admitting a map thirty years old as an ancient document applied to private maps. In Jones v. Huggins, 12 N. C. 223, 17 Am. Dec. 567, Taylor, C. J., gave as a controlling reason for excluding an ancient survey of land made under the owner's direction and for his convenience, when offered in behalf of himself or those claiming under him, that it might benefit men to include in such surveys more land than belonged to them.

5. The defendant offered a certain map of the premises, made by the county surveyor, purporting to be a correct map, showing the boundaries of the land as claimed by the defendant. In connection with this evidence it was offered to prove the correctness of the map by the defendant, who was with the surveyor when the survey was made. In approving this ground of the motion the court certified that the map was excluded from evidence for the reason that "the persons who were present, when the work was done were allowed to testify; but the surveyor being accessible, and for a part of the time in the court-room and not called to the stand, the court held that [452] his testimony was necessary to prove the correctness of the map, and that the adversary had the right of cross-examination. The map offered was a copy by the surveyor, purporting to have been copied from the records of deeds in Book 2 1's, 217." The survey was not offered as one made under the rule of court (Civil Code, 1910, § 6314). The defendant offered to prove the correctness of the survey, by a witness who was present when the lines were run, and who proposed to testify to its correctness. An unofficial survey is admissible in evidence when proved to have been correct by the parties who made it. Maples v. Hoggard, 58 Ga. 315. In principle it would seem to be immaterial whether the witness who proposes to testify to the correctness of the survey be the surveyor, or one who was present at the time the survey was made, if he offers to testify to the correctness of the survey. The defendant offered himself as a witness to prove the correctness of the map. If his testimony went to the fact that the map was correct, it should have been received in evidence, notwithstanding the surveyor may not have been put upon the stand and was an accessible witness.

6. Exception is taken to the following excerpts from the charge: "As already indicated to you in what I have said here, it sometimes happens that people are holding adjoining lands, and the boundaries of each extend beyond the line, and each paper takes in the premises in dispute—what is called in law an interlock; and the question arises in that case, what is the jury to do? If they find the plaintiffs' papers, for instance (whether by deed or prescription or color of title), include this particular land in question here on which they claim a trespass was made, and it is also shown that the boundaries of the land described in the defendant's papers (whether by deed, by prescription, or by color of title) extend over the point where the alleged trespass is said to have been committed, and you are confronted with that situation, then the question arises, how that is to be adjusted? The general rule in regard to that is this: that where the boundaries of each cover the same point, then whatever may be the superior title held by any one of the parties, to that party the decision should go. For instance, if one holds by a regular chain of title back to a grant of the State of Georgia, and the other one holds by color of title, and they clash there, superior title as shown by the evidence would control, that is the deed. If you find that both hold the same character of title, and the length of [453] possession thereunder is the same, and an interlock resulted there from the description in the paper, all I can say to you in that regard is that the law would leave them where they found them. If one color of title was perfected, say thirty years ago, and the other color of title was perfected only ten years ago, then as between those you would adopt the color of title which had been perfected thirty years ago. If they both are of the same date, and running the same time, and the seven years had practically transpired at the same time, and therefore both perfected at the same time, then the law would leave them where they found them." The criticism is, that the court laid down a wrong rule of law; the true rule being that if adjacent owners are in constructive possession of the same land, then no prescription can arise in favor of either, and if two persons claim to be in actual possession of the same land, then he is deemed in possession who has the legal title. Throughout the whole charge, and as apparent from the foregoing excerpts, the court instructed the jury on the theory that title by prescription was based upon possession alone; that adverse possession of land under color of title for seven years was known as color of title. For instance, the court instructed the jury, that there are several ways in which one becomes the owner of land in this State; that one class of title is a series of successive conveyances from the sovereign; another class is that known as prescriptive title, which is "based upon possession, not upon paper title, not upon a deed;" and "the third method of acquiring title is what is known as color of title, and that has in it some of the elements of title by deed and some of the elements of title by prescription." The court was in error as to his classification as to color of title being something apart from prescription. The statute declares that actual adverse possession of lands for twenty years shall give a good title by prescription against every one except the State or persons laboring under disabilities; and adverse possession of lands under written evidence of title for seven years shall give a like title by prescription. Civil Code (1910), §§ 4168, 4169. A prescriptive title, therefore, may be founded either upon twenty years actual adverse possession of land, or upon seven years adverse possession of land under color of title. In the present case neither of the contending parties deraigned a perfect paper title. Both parties offered in evidence certain deeds as color of title, and proved possession of a portion [454] of the land embraced therein. In other words, both plaintiffs and defendant were seeking to assert a constructive possession over the premises in dispute. If one of the parties had acquired prescriptive title by reason of the fact that he was in adverse possession of his land for a period of seven years before his adversary went into possession of the land claimed under his color of title, such party would not lose his prescriptive title which had ripened before the other's possession began. But if neither was in actual possession of the premises in dispute, and both were in constructive possession thereof, and neither had acquired a prescriptive title before the possession of the other began, no prescription would arise in favor of either. In Harriss v. Howard, 126 Ga. 325, 55 S. E. 59, it was said that "adjacent owners may be in constructive possession of the same land, being included in the boundaries of each tract. In such cases no prescription can arise in favor of either; but the rights of the parties will be determined according to the superiority of the one title or the other aside from such prescription." That is to say, if both of the adjacent land-owners were in constructive possession, neither having a prescriptive title against the other, and one of them had a paper title from the sovereign, that title would prevail. We do not understand, however, the rule to be that if neither of the adjacent owners has a complete title, the one whose color of title is the oldest shall be preferred, where the possession of neither has ripened their respective color of title into prescriptive title. We think the charge of the court was inaccurate statement of the law.

7. The court charged: "If you find from the evidence in the case that the prior owners of the land in question, that is to say, plaintiffs' ancestors in title, and defendant's ancestors in title, had agreed on a division or boundary line, then I charge you that that division or boundary line so agreed upon must govern in this case." The excerpt from the charge did not fully state the law respecting the conclusiveness of an agreed line between coterminous owners. A disputed boundary line between coterminous proprietors may be established by oral agreement, if the agreement be accompanied by actual possession to the agreed line, or is otherwise duly executed. Osteen v. Wynn, 131 Ga. 209, 62 S. E. 37, 127 Am. St. Rep. 212.

8. The jury were instructed that the object of the present suit "is to prevent the defendant from doing repeated acts prejudicial [455] to the rights of the plaintiffs, who claim to be owners of the land. The verdict of the jury does not determine title. All they have to find from the proofs is that they believe that ownership in the plaintiffs is established" under the evidence in the case. In their pleadings the plaintiffs asserted their right to an injunction by reason of their ownership of the land upon which the alleged trespasses were committed. Their right to injunction was dependent upon showing title in themselves. Issue was joined by the defendant, and both sides submitted evidence tending to show a prescriptive title to the premises in dispute. In the grant of an interlocutory injunction against a trespasser the plaintiff may not be held to strict proof of title. It is sufficient to sustain an interlocutory injunction against trespassers on land, in the absence of a better outstanding title, for the plaintiff to show a prima facie title. McArthur v. Matthewson, 67 Ga. 134. But on the final hearing, where the plaintiff prays permanent injunction against interfering with his possession, on the ground that he has title to the land, and the defendant also sets up title to the land, the plaintiff is not entitled to injunction unless he shows title in himself.

The motion for new trial contains numerous grounds. Those which we have specifically discussed entered into all the others, and such as are not specifically noted are controlled by the foregoing discussion.

Judgment reversed. All the justices concur.

Thus in Lawrence v. Tennant, 64 N. H. 532, 15 Atl. 543, the court said: "The party offering the paper must make out a prima facie case for its reception; he must show that the paper is apparently as he contends. If he wholly fail to do this, the court should reject the paper; but if there be a reasonable probability established that the paper is what it purports to be, the question then becomes one for the jury, and the paper ought to go before them with proper instructions. The real question affecting the consideration of such documents with the tribunal before which they are offered is, whether they are genuine, and contain a true statement of what they purport to contain. If found to possess these requisites, there is no reason why they may not be read in evidence. . . . In this case both of these requisites appear. An inspection of the plan leaves no doubt that it is an ancient and much worn document, and, taken in connection with the reported evidence, establishes a reasonable probability that it is what it is marked and purports to be, namely, 'A plot of the town of Epsom, taken on a scale of one hundred rods to an inch, in the year 1800, by D. L. Morril.' The antiquity and genuineness of the plan thus appearing, it was of course admissible if made by public authority; and if not so made, it was none the less admissible, there having been preliminary evidence of its correctness. Other grounds of admissibility need not be considered." So in Spencer v. Levy (Tex.) 173 S. W. 550, the court admitted as evidence a certain map termed the Westcott Map of which it was said that it "had been hanging in the office of the county clerk of Falls county for at least 30 years, during all of which time it has been the custom of citizens of Marlin to buy and sell lots in said Railroad addition as indicated on said map, and it does not appear that any one ever called its correctness in question." The court said: "We do not see how evidence of the correctness of said map could reasonably be made stronger. It purports to have been made in 1871. If the man who made it had testified on the trial hereof that he correctly copied the original map, this would have been only his memory of that event, after the lapse of more than 40 years. That it has stood the test of time as above stated we think is stronger evidence than would have been the memory of the man who made it." Likewise in Whitehouse v. Bickford, 29 N. H. 471, wherein it was held that the genuineness of a plan was sufficiently established to entitle it to be offered in evidence, the court said: "The plan was found in the custody of J. W. Pierce, and that he was at the time the acting clerk of the Masonian Proprietors, having the custody of their records, and that it was delivered by him, at his office in Portsmouth, in this state, as an original plan and as a part of the proprietary records, and the witness of these facts produced the plan in court. It purported, upon its face, to be an ancient plan, bearing date 1781, and purporting to be signed by James Hersey, surveyor. It was accompanied by a certificate attached to the plan signed by Pierce, which also showed that it had been, in point of fact, in his custody, and came from his possession." In Com. v. Alburger, 1 Whart. (Pa.) 469, the court said: "A copy, therefore, of a map of the city remaining in the Surveyor-General's office, as one of the records or papers of that office, received and accredited by the officers as authentic, and proved to be so considered, and to be an ancient paper, of course handed down by the proprietary's officers from early times, relating to its public and official acts, is evidence. . . . The presumption is, that these maps were placed there by the proprietary or his officers, as public documents for the benefit of all concerned in a matter of great public importance. They have been placed where they ought to have been, in the source and depository of all matters relating to the origin of land titles in Pennsylvania, superintended by a public officer of the highest authority, and open to public inspection, where every person might resort for information as to land titles. Even a survey adopted by the land office, though not made by the regular officer, is evidence." And in New Romney Corporation v. New Romney Sewer Com'rs [1892] 61 L. J. Q. B. 558, 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 840, 56 J. P. 756, the court said that a map made under authority of a commission and acquiesced in for a period of sixty years was admissible to show the boundaries of certain marsh lands.

In Finberg v. Gilbert, 104 Tex. 539, 141 S. W. 82, reversing 124 S. W. 979, the court said: "It is not doubted that as to ancient maps and plats long and publicly recognized and with reference to which it may be fairly presumed that the parties, as well as the general public had acted, they may be and are admitted as in the nature of a species of reputation of the location of lots, streets and alleys or even of sections or leagues of land." And in Smucker v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 188 Pa. St. 40, 41 Atl. 457, wherein it was held that a map was not a paper between the parties as to boundary, but a signification by the commonwealth of the quantity taken by boundary, the court said: "The map was over sixty years old; it was found in the files in the proper office at Harrisburg, in a book entitled 'Plan Book No. 23, of Public Works,' in the very custody and place it should have been. We do not think that, to give effect to such a map, thus guarded, as evidence, it was necessary that defendant should go further and show that it was framed and filed at the exact time the state entered upon the land of which the map purports to be the boundary."

Where an ancient official map is no longer in existence, a copy or tracing thereof properly authenticated is admissible in evidence. Barker v. Mobile Electric Co. 173 Ala. 28, 55 So. 364; Hamilton v. Smith, 74 Conn. 374, 50 Atl. 884; Goodwin v. Jack, 62 Me. 414; Dickinson v. Smith, 134 Wis. 6, 114 N. W. 133. See also Gibson v. Poor, 21 N. H. 440, 53 Am. Dec. 216. Thus in Barker v. Mobile Electric Co. supra, the court said: "Official records show that about 1848 one Troost was employed by the city of Mobile to lay out a map of the city. A copy of so much of this map as shows the block containing the property in controversy was introduced in evidence. This map was hearsay, but it was an ancient document and came from a proper custody. It was competent to show boundary lines of private ownership." So in Dickinson v. Smith, 134 Wis. 6, 114 N. W. 133, it was said: "Whether it was filed in the office of the city clerk does not appear, but it does appear that Stephens made such survey and plat and that he set monuments or landmarks, and that copies or prints of such plat made by Stephens were in use, one of them in the office of the register of deeds of Outagamie county, and this copy was offered in evidence. It therefore comes from the custody of the register of deeds, is in common and general use and publicly recognized as a true copy of the John Stephens plat, and the copy itself is apparently of the same age as the original, and is rather a print made by the process of map-making then in vogue than a copy. It was properly received in evidence after proof of the loss of the original." And in Gibson v. Poor, 21 N. H. 440, 53 Am. Dec. 216, by way of dictum the court said: "Even if this ancient plan had not been found, we are not prepared to say, that the copy presented could not have been used. Ancient plans must at some time become worn out by age and use; and the necessity of the case seems to require that their place be supplied by copies. After these copies have been kept among the records, and used by the inhabitants a sufficient number of years to raise the ordinary presumption of genuineness, can they not be used as substitutes for the originals, without resorting to proof of being true transcripts, if the originals cannot be found, or have become defaced and unintelligible by use? If the originals should be lost, there would be no doubt of the competency of the copies as secondary evidence, and the reason would seem to be quite as cogent for the admission of copies after the originals had become defaced by age and use."

In Lawrence v. Tennant, 64 N. H. 532, 15 Atl. 543, the court said: "The party offering the paper must make out a prima facie case for its reception; he must show that the paper is apparently as he contends. If he wholly fail to do this, the court should reject the paper; but if there be a reasonable probability established that the paper is what it purports to be, the question then becomes one for the jury, and the paper ought to go before them with proper instructions." See to the same effect Gibson v. Poor, 21 N. H. 440, 53 Am. Dec. 216; Whitehouse v. Bickford, 29 N. H. 471.

UNOFFICIAL.

An ancient map, made under the direction of a private person, or one for which no official authorization, or recognition appears, is inadmissible in evidence. Pollard v. Scott, Peake N. P. (Eng.) 18; Reg. v. Milton, 1 C. & K. 58, 47 E. C. L. 58 (map made under private act); Hammond v. Bradstreet, 10 Exch. (Eng.) 390, 2 C. L. R. 1195; 23 L. J. Exch. 332, 2 W. R. 625 (maker not deputed to make map); Pipe v. Fulcher, 1 El. & El. 111, 102 E. C. L. 111, 28 L. J. Q. B. 12, 5 Jur. (N. S.) 146, 7 W. R. 19 (not recognized as authority on highways); Earl v. Lewis, 4 Esp. (Eng.) 1; Mercer v. Denne, [1904] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 534; Bower v. Cohen, 126 Ga. 35, 54 S. E. 918; Carter v. Maryland, etc. R. Co. 112 Md. 599, 77 Atl. 301; Washington Female Seminary v. Washington Borough, 18 Pa. Super. Ct. 555 (not made by regular official or filed in proper place). Thus in Pollard v. Scott, supra, the following facts appeared: "A copper-plate map was produced, wherein this close was described as a public road; and the plaintiff offered evidence to prove that it was generally received in the parish as an authentic map. It purported on the face of it to be taken by the direction of the churchwardens of that time." Lord Kenyon refusing to admit it in evidence said: "It would be equally improper to admit it as to admit a plan taken by the Lord of a manor, who might thereby crush and destroy the estates of his tenants." And in Earl v. Lewis, 4 Esp. (Eng.) 1, the court said: "Among those papers so produced, was one describing the bounds and limits of High Ongar parish. It was in the form of a map, or terrier of the parish; but drawn in an unartificial manner, bearing the appearance of a rough delineation of the limits of the parish, made by the parson, or some person on his account. The metes or bounds were set out with apparently sufficient accuracy; but it was not signed by any person whatever, bearing any public character or office in the parish." So in Mercer v. Denne [1904] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 534, wherein the court held a map to be inadmissible because it was not shown to have been made by any competent person, competent to make it quoad the high-water mark and low-water mark, the court said: "The fact that it comes from the possession of the Admiralty makes no difference; it is not an Admiralty chart nor has it received the sanction of the Admiralty in any way. The Admiralty are in the habit of acquiring, either by purchase or by gift, or, perhaps I might say, by quasi-inheritance, as from the East India Company, numbers of old charts and maps. That does not make them in any way official." Likewise in Bower v. Cohen, 126 Ga. 35, 54 S. E. 918, wherein it appeared that a map was offered in evidence to show a division of land into lots and streets, the court said: "It is contended that as this map appears to be more than thirty years old, and there is nothing suspicious in its appearance, it is prima facie admissible. There was no evidence as to the age of the map, except the date thereon and the evidence of Donalson. Donalson came into possession of the map within much less than thirty years from the date on the map; and the mere date on the map, without evidence as to who placed it there, would not be evidence of its age, even if the rule admitting a map thirty years old applies at all to private maps." And in Carter v. Maryland, etc. R. Co. 112 Md. 599, 77 Atl. 301, the court holding a plat to be inadmissible said: "It certainly has an ancient appearance, but it bears on its face no indication of who made it or whence it came or whether it is an original or a mere copy."

However, in Whitman v. Shaw, 166 Mass. 451, 44 N. E. 333, the court said: "Other plans dated in 1820 and 1823, and signed by Mather Withington, were admitted in evidence, against the tenants' exception. They represented certain lots in the vicinity of the White marsh, and were shown on the plan produced by Mr. Bowditch. They came from the custody of one Crafts, who, in 1853, sold the lots to one Dana. The plan of 1820 showed a lot adjoining the White marsh on the opposite side of the creek. The plan of 1823 showed six lots. These lots were drawn on the same scale, and were identical with the same lots as shown on the Bowditch plan. We are of opinion that these plans were admissible on the preliminary question of the genuineness and accuracy of the Bowditch plan." And in S. C. nom. Schools v. Risely, 10 Wall. 91, 19 U. S. (L. ed.) 850, by way of dictum the court said: "Complaint is also made by the plaintiffs that the court erred in not regarding Chouteau's map as a muniment of title conclusive in their favor; but the court is of the opinion that the view taken of it by the state court is correct, and that it was properly regarded as evidence of title, and not as a muniment of title conclusive in itself, and that as such it was regular to submit it to the jury with the other evidence introduced by the parties."

Survey.

PUBLIC.

An ancient survey made by competent authority, recorded or accepted as a public document, and produced from proper custody, is admissible in evidence to prove the location of a boundary line. Talbot v. Lewis, 6 C. & P. 603, 25 E. C. L. 558; Smith v. Brownlow, L. R. 9 Eq. (Eng.) 241; Burns v. United States, 160 Fed. 631, 87 C. C. A. 533; Burgin v. Simon, 135 La. 213, 65 So. 128; Com. v. Alburger, 1 Whart. (Pa.) 469; McCausland v. Fleming, 63 Pa. St. 36; Mineral R. etc. Co. v. Auten, 188 Pa. St. 568, 41 Atl. 327, 43 W. N. C. 158; Aldrich v. Griffith, 66 Vt. 390, 29 Atl. 376. See also Com. v. Philadelphia, 16 Pa. St. 79. Thus in Talbot v. Lewis, 6 C. & P. 603, 25 E. C. L. 558, wherein it appeared that a great number of Spanish dollars were found in the sands of the seashore, and the plaintiff in order to show his title to the same offered in evidence an ancient survey of the manor, made in 1635, at a court of survey, Parke, B., said: "I think that this document is evidence to show the boundaries of the manor; and I am of opinion that it is evidence for that purpose, as being the opinion of persons whom we must presume to have been cognizant of the facts, it having reference to a subject on which reputation is evidence." And in Smith v. Brownlow, L. R. 9 Eq. (Eng.) 241, it was held that the survey of a manor, while a part of the Duchy of Cornwall, and produced from a proper depository, was admissible as evidence of the boundaries of the manor. To the same effect, see Mineral R. etc. Co. v. Auten, 188 Pa. St. 568, 41 Atl. 327, 43 W. N. C. 158. Likewise in Aldrich v. Griffith, 66 Vt. 390, 29 Atl. 376, wherein it appeared that the location of a town line was the issue, the court held that a field book with surveys of the town was admissible.

In Evans v. Merthyr Tydfil Urban Dist. Council [1899] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 241, 68 L. J. Ch. 175, 79 L. T. N. S. 578, the court said: "Objection has also been taken to the admission in evidence of the survey made by Mr. Cheese in 1816. Now with reference to that survey, I am of opinion that, having regard to the fact that it was made by Cheese in performance of the duty cast upon him by the statute 34 Geo. 3, c. 75, s. 8, this document was properly admissible. It is a survey of Crown lands on the occasion of a sale of them, and it was made pursuant to the provisions of a public Act of Parliament; it is a public document produced out of the proper custody, and is admissible as such." Likewise in Burchfield v. McCauley, 3 Watts (Pa.) 9, the court held that a draft of a survey made by a deputy surveyor and found among the official papers of the surveyor, after the death of both, was admissible in evidence. See also Lexington v. Hoskins, 96 Miss. 163, 50 So. 561. And in Hart v. Gage, 6 Vt. 170, wherein it appeared that a field book with surveys was offered in evidence to prove acquiescence as to a division of lands, the court said: "A Field Book, accompanied with testimony showing that it had been recognized as such, was pregnant evidence of the two necessary facts, survey in fact, and an acquiescence under it. And these books, and the maps made from them, as they ripen by time, and monuments perish, may, like Doomsday Book, be the best, if not the only evidence of many ancient surveys."

PRIVATE.

An ancient survey which does not appear to have been officially authorized, or which appears to have been made for a private purpose, is inadmissible in evidence. Evans v. Taylor, 7 Ad. & El. 617, 34 E. C. L. 178, 7 L. J. Q. B. 73, 3 N. & P. 174; Daniel v. Wilkin, 7 Exch. (Eng.) 429, 21 L. J. Exch. 236; Jones v. Huggins, 12 N. C. 223, 17 Am. Dec. 567. See also Rogers v. Riddlesburg Coal, etc. Co. 31 Leg. Int. (Pa.) 325 (made by unauthorized surveyor). Compare Sweigart v. Richards, 8 Pa. St. 436. Thus in Evans v. Taylor, supra, the court sustained the rejection of a "survey of the manor of Minsterworth, parcel of the possessions of the Duchy of Lancaster, made by a person named 'deputy to Sir J. Poyntz,' surveyor, appointed by Queen Elizabeth, on the finding of certain tenants of the manor at a court of survey." Lord Denman said: "The deputy surveyor of the duchy does not appear to have had any authority to institute the enquiry; and, stripped of this authority, he has not merely no right to make any kind of return, but the presumption that he did make it falls to the ground. The paper may have been written by any clerk idling in the office, from his own imagination, or compiled possibly by some interested person in furtherance of a sinister object of his own. From these considerations, it appears that the document was no evidence for any purpose." And in Daniel v. Wilkin, 7 Exch. (Eng.) 429, 21 L. J. Exch. 236, it was held that an early survey made by direction of a commissioner of the Earl of Leicester was "no more evidence of title than a survey or map of any landed gentleman." The court said: "The ground on which a survey made by officers of the Crown under a commission is received, is, that it is presumed that they acted in accordance with their public duty, and have stated nothing in their inquisition or survey which is contrary to the fact. But no such presumption of truth attaches to a survey belonging to a private individual, although the presentment of a jury might be evidence of reputation." So in Jones v. Huggins, 12 N. C. 223, 17 Am. Dec. 567, the court said: "On the question whether the survey itself be competent evidence for the plaintiff, the court is of opinion that it is inadmissible, as being a private memorial procured to be made by Starkey for his own convenience, and is not evidence for him, or for any one who claims through him. The reason for excluding such evidence is decisive, viz., that it might benefit men to include in such surveys more than belonged to them."

However, in Sweigart v. Richards, 8 Pa. St. 436, the court said: "The title to lands cannot be acquired or established by unofficial diagrams, drafts, or surveys. But such papers may often be extremely useful in fixing and designating doubtful boundaries. It has been an ancient custom of the courts to receive them in evidence for what they are worth, in illustrating a question of boundary."

McCLURE ET AL.

North Carolina Supreme Court—May 30, 1914.

166 N. Car. 140; 81 S. E. 1081.

Reformation of Instruments — Proof of Mistake — Parol Evidence.

Parol evidence of mistake in a written contract is admissible for purpose of reformation.

Reformation of Bond — Changing Name of Oblige.

It being intended that a bond should be to the plaintiffs in an action, with whom a contract therefor was made, and by mutual mistake it being made to one who was their active agent in prosecuting the action, it will be reformed, though the loss has occurred, and the surety's principals have become bankrupt.

[See note at end of this case.]

Sufficiency of Evidence for Jury.

Whether the evidence of mistake, warranting reformation of an instrument, is of the necessary clear, strong, and convincing character is a question for the jury.

[See generally 19 Ann. Cas. 343.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Cherokee county: FERGUSON, Judge.

Action to reform and recover on bond. Robert N. Archer et al., plaintiffs, and George W. McClure et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. AFFIRMED.

[141] This action or proceeding was brought by the plaintiffs to reform and recover upon a bond given by the defendants in an action brought by Robert N. Archer and others against George W. McClure. The original action of Archer and others against McClure was brought for the recovery of a certain tract of land described in the complaint, and a restraining order was issued therein against the said McClure, enjoining him from cutting timber from the lands in dispute, and from removing certain sawed lumber. Thereafter the lumber claimed by McClure was sold by him to the Albert Haas Lumber Company, and in order to remove the lumber the Albert Haas Lumber Company, through one of its members, went to M. E. Cozad, who had represented the plaintiffs, Archer and others, as agent, and told him that they were making arrangements to purchase the lumber from McClure and did not care to trespass on the land, and Cozad told Haas that if he would give a good bond of indemnity against all loss, that they could remove the lumber. The original suit of Archer and others against McClure, as shown by the record, was instituted in the name of Archer and others, as trustees, by M. E. Cozad, agent for the plaintiffs, and Mr. Cozad was the active agent in prosecuting the same, Archer and others, trustees, being nonresidents of the State.

After the purchase of the lumber by the Albert Haas Lumber Company and the conversation with Mr. Cozad, in which he agreed to allow them to give bond and remove it, the Albert [142] Haas Lumber Company undertook to give this bond, and applied to the defendant Fidelity and Deposit Company of Maryland to make it. A copy of the bond and of the power of attorney is set out in the record of the original case of Archer and others against McClure, as appears therefrom. The bond is signed by George W. McClure, the Albert Haas Lumber Company, and Fidelity and Deposit Company of Maryland, and its execution authorized by the latter, by the power of attorney attached, the only difference being that the name of M. E. Cozad, who was acting as agent, was inserted in the bond as obligee, without the names of his principals. It is this bond that gave rise to the controversy, the name of M. E. Cozad having, as the plaintiffs alleged, been written in the bond by mistake instead of Archer and others, trustees, the real plaintiffs in the action. This mistake was not discovered until some time after a judgment by default was taken against McClure, adjudging that the plaintiffs were the owners of the land in dispute, and ordering an inquiry as to the damages, and at the succeeding term of court an issue of damages was submitted, and were assessed by the jury at $805. Upon the judgment by default and the verdict assessing damages, a judgment was asked by the plaintiffs (M. E. Cozad having come in and made himself a party plaintiff) against the defendants George W. McClure and the Albert Haas Lumber Company and Fidelity and Deposit Company of Maryland, which judgment was resisted by the latter company upon the ground that the bond given by it was to pay all such sums as might be recovered against the said McClure for the removal of the lumber described in the complaint on file in the suit of M. E. Cozad against George W. McClure.

This proceeding was then instituted to correct the bond so as to conform to the alleged original intention and agreement, which was to indemnify the plaintiffs Archer and others from loss on account of removing the lumber.

The power of attorney signed by the defendant which was filed in the original suit of Archer and others against McClure shows that Aaron Haas or Edwin R. Haas was authorized to execute a bond which the Albert Haas Lumber Company was [143] required to file in the Superior Court of Cherokee County, North Carolina, in the case of M. E. Cozad against G. W. McClure, and the bond was accordingly executed by Albert Haas as attorney in fact of the Fidelity and Deposit Company.

The following verdict was returned by the jury:

1. Did the defendants G. W. McClure, Albert Haas Lumber Company, and Fidelity and Deposit Company execute the bond dated 7 June, 1906? Answer: Yes.

2. Was said bond given for the purpose of allowing the removal of the lumber mentioned in the complaint in the case of R. N. Archer et al. v. G. W. McClure, and was said bond intended to have been given in that case, and by mutual mistake and the mistake of the draftsman the name of M. E. Cozad inserted instead of R. N. Archer and others? Answer: Yes.

3. Did the Fidelity and Deposit Company of Maryland know when the bond was executed that there was such a suit pending in favor of R. N. Archer, Louis Krohn, W. R. Hopkins, F. W. Bruch, E. I. Leighton, and George Reeves? Answer: Yes.

4. Did the Fidelity and Deposit Company of Maryland authorize any one to execute any bond for or on its behalf in any action in favor of R. N. Archer? Answer: Yes.

5. Have the defendants G. W. McClure and Albert Haas Lumber Company been discharged in bankruptcy? Answer: Yes.

B. B. Norvell for appellants.

J. D. Mallonee and Zebulon Weaver for appellees.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts).—The doctrine is elementary that parol evidence is not, in general, admissible between the parties to vary a written instrument, but it is equally well settled that mistake, fraud, surprise, and accident furnish exceptions to the universal principle, and parol evidence, in any case brought within one of the exceptions, admitted to vary the writing so far as to make it accord with the true intention and agreement of the parties. These exceptions rest upon the highest motives of policy and expediency, or otherwise an injured party would generally be without remedy. Equity follows [144] the law, it is true, but sometimes it will intervene and afford relief where the remedy at law is inadequate for the purpose. The doctrine we have stated has often been applied by this and other courts in the correction of written contracts, bonds, deeds, and other instruments, where the mistake was one of fact, mutual and common to all the parties, and the proof clear, strong, and convincing. 2 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (1 Ed.) sec. 858; 1 Beach Mod. Eq. Jur. secs. 48 and 51; 1 Story's Eq. Jur. (12 Ed.) sec. 138 and note; Dillard v. Jones, 229 Ill. 119, 11 Ann. Cas. 82, 82 N. E. 206. A mistake exists when a person, under some erroneous conviction of law or fact, does or omits to do some act which but for the erroneous conviction he would not have done or omitted. It may arise either from unconsciousness, ignorance, forgetfulness, imposition, or misplaced confidence. Where the mistake arises from imposition or misplaced confidence, relief may be had on the ground of fraud. Where it arises from unconsciousness, ignorance, or forgetfulness, no element of fraud exists, and redress must be obtained, if obtained at all, on the distinct equitable basis of mistake. Bispham on Equity (6 Ed.) sec. 185.

It is said in 34 Cyc. 908, to be settled by a host of authorities that where because of mistake an instrument does not express the real intention of the parties, equity will correct the mistake, unless the rights of third parties, having prior and better equities, have intervened. This is done, not for the purpose of relieving against a hard or even oppressive bargain or to give either party a better one, but simply to enforce the agreement as it was made and to prevent the injustice which would ensue if this is not done. Nor will chancery make a new contract, under the pretext of correcting a mistake, for where there is no meeting of the minds, there is no case or ground for reformation. Wherever an instrument is drawn with the intention of carrying into execution an agreement previously made, and by mistake of the draftsman or scrivener it fails to do so, the mistake will be corrected, and the original contract enforced according to the real intention of the parties.

[145] We have said the mistake must be mutual, but by this is not meant that both parties must agree at the hearing that the mistake was in fact made, but the evidence of the mutuality must relate to the time of the execution of the instrument and show that the parties then intended to say one thing and by mistake expressed another and different thing. 34 Cyc. 907, to 935.

A court of equity cannot add or substitute other parties for those appearing on the face of a contract, since the effect might be to make a new contract, but the mistaken use of names of parties appearing in the contract may be rectified in order to carry out the real agreement. 34 Cyc. 934, and cases cited; as, for instance, the insertion of a wrong name through a clerical error or a misnomer of the true obligee in a bond. 34 Cyc. 935, and cases in the notes.

Care must be taken to distinguish between the rule at law excluding parol evidence to vary or contradict a written instrument and that in equity, by which it is reformed so as to make it speak the truth. We considered these questions recently in Wilson v. Scarboro, 163 N. C. 380, 79 S. E. 811, and defined the jurisdiction of a court of equity in such matters. There are decided and well considered cases to the effect that a court of equity will thus correct a mistake in the name of a party to the contract where it was erroneously inserted for the name of another, which is our case precisely. In a case of this sort, Chief Justice Parker, in Brown v. Gilman, 13 Mass. 158, said: "Authorities have been read to show that where a contract in writing has been made and signed, but the name of the party contracted with omitted, it may be supplied by extrinsic proof. Of this we have no doubt, where the name was omitted by mistake or a wrong name inserted." (Italics ours.) And the same was held in Gayle v. Hudson, 10 Ala. 116, where the name of one person was inserted as obligee for that of another, who was the one intended, and it was further said that the equity of reformation could be enforced even against a surety to the bond. The Court concluded as follows: "It is abundantly shown by the citations [146] to the point, and what we have said, that a court of equity is entirely competent to reform the bond so as to make it speak the intention of the parties, upon satisfactory proof being adduced of the mistake."

Without commenting upon them separately, it will be found that the following authorities clearly sustain the right in equity to have this bond corrected so as to insert the name of the intended obligee, some of them being much like our case in their facts, and in them the correction was decreed where the name of the agent had been inadvertently or by mistake inserted for that of his principal: Wait v. Axford, 63 Mich. 227, 29 N. W. 693; Bell v. Tanguy, 46 Ind. 49; Rankin v. Miller, 43 Ia. 11; Lee v. Percival, 85 Ia. 639, 52 N. W. 543; Eustis Mfg. Co. v. Saco Brick Co. 198 Mass. 212, 84 N. E. 449; Denver Brick, etc. Co. v. McAllister, 6 Colo. 261; Scales v. Ashbrook, 1 Metc. (Ky.) 358; Smith v. Watson, 88 Ia. 73, 55 N. W. 68; Smith v. Wainwright, 24 Vt. 97.

The courts are more inclined to exercise this jurisdiction where it will not prejudice the obligor in the bond or the party against whom correction of the instrument is asked. Gayle v. Hudson, supra.

Applying these principles to the facts of this case, we find that there is ample evidence of a mutual mistake. M. E. Cozad was the agent of the plaintiffs, and also had charge of the prosecution of the other action for them. There was but one suit pending in the county relating to the timber, and that was the one in which the bond was given. There was no reason for indemnifying Cozad, as the contract was not with him, but with the plaintiffs, whose timber was about to be removed. According to Mr. Dillard's testimony (and he drew the bond), it was intended to indemnify the plaintiffs in the suit in which G. W. McClure was defendant, and from whom the Albert Haas Lumber Company had bought the lumber, and the plaintiffs in that suit were Robert N. Archer and others. There cannot be the least doubt, upon the evidence, as to the suit referred to in the bond, though the name of the plaintiff therein was mistakenly supposed to be M. E. Cozad. It would not be creditable to the indemnity company should we assume that it was engaging in [147] so important a business transaction as the giving of a bond of indemnity in a suit without knowing what suit it was and where it was pending. And again, it may be said that it is immaterial to defendant who was named as obligee by mistake, as its main and only reliance for reimbursement was upon its coobligors or the principals in the bond, and in that respect the bond is not changed. The defendant owes the money, and it would not be right if we should permit it to escape upon a mere technicality, or an inadvertence of the draftsman, or mistake of the parties as to the real name of the plaintiff. The law is strongly against any such view. It does not regard the name of persons so much as it does the substance and actual identity of the agreement.

The Court, in Smith v. Wainwright, supra, upon a state of facts not substantially unlike ours, said: "Under these circumstances it seems to us that it would be a virtual fraud upon the obligees to allow Wainwright to escape from the obligation of the bond. Upon this ground alone, if they made proper application to the court of chancery to have the bond reformed in this particular, we entertain no doubt it would be the duty of that court to make such a decree upon the present state of the evidence."

If we could see, as contended by the defendant, that it had made one contract and plaintiffs were attempting to substitute another, we would not hesitate to deny the latter any relief; but in this case, while the contract was nominally with M. E. Cozad, it was really with his principals, the plaintiffs.

There is one case decided by this Court which seems to be directly in point, McIntosh v. North State Fire Ins. Co. 152 N. C. 50, 136 Am. St. Rep. 818, and it was an action upon an insurance policy. The Court there said, by Justice Brown: "In Henkle v. Royal Exch. Assur. Co. 1 Ves. (Eng.) case 156, p. 318, the bill sought to reform a written policy after loss had actually happened, upon the ground that it did not express the intent of the contracting parties. Lord Hardwicke said: 'No doubt but this Court had jurisdiction to relieve in respect of a plain mistake in contracts in writing as well as against frauds in contracts, so that if reduced to writing contrary to the intent of the parties, on proper proof, it would be [148] rectified.' If the plaintiffs can establish by the proper degree of proof that this contract of insurance was made for the benefit of the wife and the two infants, who are the owners of the property, and that by mutual mistake, or the error of the draftsman; A. H. McIntosh was erroneously made the beneficiary therein, instead of the other plaintiffs, they will have made out a cause of action which will enable them to have a reformation of the written policy."

In Nicholson v. Dover, 145 N. C. 18, 21, 58 S. E. 444, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 167, the Court said, citing and quoting from Woodruff v. McGehee, 30 Ga. 158: "Where an agent makes a contract without disclosing the name of his principal, the latter may claim all his rights, with the single limitation that the other party shall not be injured thereby." And the law is the same, as we have seen, where the contract runs in the name of the agent, without his being designated as such, when it was intended to be for the benefit of the principal.

The jury have found, upon sufficient evidence, that the bond was intended by the parties to be given in the Archer suit, and that the authority of Albert Haas, as attorney in fact for the indemnity company, related to that suit and extended to the giving of the particular bond now in question.

There are no grounds, for the reasons stated, for disturbing the verdict. The bankruptcy of McClure and the Haas Lumber Company does not affect plaintiff's right to recover. It was the misfortune of the indemnity company that it occurred, and it is in no way attributable to any fault of the plaintiffs. There was no exception, though, on this ground.

The evidence of the mistake must, of course, be clear, strong, and convincing, because of the force of the presumption in favor of the correctness of the instrument as written; but whether it is of that character is for the jury, and not for the court, to decide. Lehew v. Hewett, 138 N. C. 6, 50 S. E. 459, 130 N. C. 22, 40 S. E. 769; Cuthbertson v. Morgan, 149 N. C. 72, 62 S. E. 744; Avery v. Stewart, 136 N. C. 426, 48 S. E. 775, 68 L.R.A. 776, but if we were at liberty to decide upon it in this case, we would unhesitatingly hold it to be clear and satisfactory [149] that a mutual mistake had been made, and that the name of M. E. Cozad had been erroneously inserted for the names of the plaintiffs.

There was no error in the proceedings below.

No error.

NOTE.

Right to Reform Bond by Changing Name of Oblige.

It is the general rule that a court of equity, in order to carry out the intentions of the parties, has the right to reform a bond by changing the name of the obligee. Gayle v. Hudson, 10 Ala. 116; Bell v. Tan- guy, 46 Ind. 49; Smith v. Wainwright, 24 Vt. 97. And see the reported case. See also Hart v. State, 120 Ind. 83, 21 N. E. 654, rehearing denied 120 Ind. 87, 24 N. E. 151. Compare Craft v. Dickens, 78 Ill. 131. Thus in Bell v. Tanguy, supra, an action on a delivery bond, it appeared that the bond was made payable to the constable who levied the execution instead of to the plaintiffs in the judgment on which the execution issued. It was contended, therefore, that there could be no recovery by the plaintiffs. But the court said: "The condition of the bond shows that the execution levied on the horse was in favor of the plaintiffs. The complaint shows this mistake, and shows that it was so written, being a clerical error by the draftsman, and asks to reform the bond, and that the plaintiffs were the proper and legal payees of the bond. This was allowed and was clearly right." In Gayle v. Hudson, supra, the question was raised whether it was allowable to show by parol evidence a mistake in the name of one of the obligees of a bond. Holding that parol evidence should not have been admitted on the trial for such purpose, Collier, C. J., said that "a court of equity is entirely competent to reform the bond, so as to make it speak the intention of the parties, upon satisfactory proof being adduced of the mistake." So in Smith v. Wainwright, 24 Vt. 97, it appeared that a partnership, consisting of three persons, purchased a certain business from one Wainwright. In order to secure to them his good will, and to prevent his entering into the same business again within a prescribed territory, Wainwright gave a bond to the three partners jointly, without naming them, and their assigns, administrators, etc. It was the intention of all the parties that the bond should inure for the benefit of the business. This was assented to thereafter repeatedly by the obligor after changes had been made in the parties to whom the bond was executed. In an action on the bond, alleging a breach of contract in carrying on a like business within the prohibited limits, the defendants endeavored to escape liability on the ground of the change in interest of those who bought out the business, and to whom the bond was executed. Remanding the case to the court of chancery to be disposed of in conformity to the principles of equity law the court said: "Under these circumstances it seems to us, that it would be a virtual fraud upon the obligees to allow Wainwright to escape from the obligation of the bond. Upon this ground alone, if they made proper application to the court of chancery to have the bond reformed in this particular, we entertain no doubt it would be the duty of that court to make such a decree upon the present state of the evidence."

However, in Craft v. Dickens, 78 Ill. 131, a bill in chancery to reform an attachment bond, it was held that equity would afford no relief. Reviewing the facts briefly the court said: "It appears, . . . that Dickens sued out an attachment, before a justice of the peace, against Craft, claiming twenty dollars, and executed an attachment bond in the cause, payable to 'John B. Craft, executors, administrators or assigns.' . . . The bill charged that the bond was intended to be made payable to John B. Craft, his executors, administrators or assigns." Affirming the decree dismissing the bill, Mr. Chief Justice Scott said that "conceding a mistake did occur in the execution of the bond, it is plain equity will not assume jurisdiction to reform it, for the reason the statute has given courts of law, in which all attachment proceedings are had, ample powers to allow amendments at the trial, and complainant should have made his application to have the bond corrected in the court where he was sued."

v.

JONAH.

New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals—
June 17, 1914.

83 N. J. Eq. 295; 90 Atl. 1004.

Injunction — Grounds — Breach of Contract.

Equity will restrain a breach of an express covenant where injury arising from a breach cannot be adequately compensated.

Covenant against Engaging in Competing Business.

A stipulation, in a firm agreement between plaintiff and defendant for the general practice of medicine at Atlantic City, that defendant will not practice medicine in the city for three years after the termination of the firm, is enforceable in equity at the suit of plaintiff who had built up so large a practice in the city as to be unable to take care of it without assistance, as against the objection that equitable relief will deprive defendant of the privilege of practicing in the only field of his acquaintance; the practice of the firm not being confined to Atlantic City, but embracing adjacent boroughs.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Court of Chancery.

Action by Philip I. Marvel, plaintiff, against William E. Jonah, defendant. From judgment rendered, plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Bourgeois & Coulomb for appellant.

Allen B. Endicott and Robert H. McCarter for respondent.

[296] GUMMERE, C. J.—The complainant and defendant are practicing their profession in the city of Atlantic City, together with one Dr. Durand, as partners. The bill filed by the complainant prays an accounting from the defendant, the dissolution of the partnership relationship between them, because of continued violations by the defendant of certain provisions contained in the partnership agreement, and the enforcement against the defendant of a restrictive covenant contained in that agreement, by the terms of which the defendant bound himself, in case the partnership was terminated because of violations of the contract by him, to refrain from practicing his profession in Atlantic City for a period of three years next thereafter. The learned vice-chancellor before whom the case was heard in the court below held that the complainant was entitled to an accounting, and to have the partnership dissolved because of breaches of the partnership agreement by the defendant, but refused to enforce against the latter the restrictive covenant, because he considered that to do so "would be unjust and unnecessarily oppressive." From so much of the decree as refuses an injunction against the defendant restraining [297] him from practicing in Atlantic City during the stipulated period the complainant appeals.

Dr. Marvel began the practice of medicine in Atlantic City about 1884. His practice gradually grew to such an extent that in 1905 it became necessary for him to employ an assistant. Dr. Jonah, who had graduated from a medical college five years before that time, was selected by him for that position. In 1906, Dr. Marvel found it desirable to employ a second assistant, and took in Dr. Durand. In 1908, the complainant and defendant entered into a parol partnership agreement which, in 1910, was superseded by that which is involved in the present controversy. It is apparent from the proofs that the present development and value of the practice of the firm is, in large measure, due to the efforts and reputation of Dr. Marvel; and that his purpose in having the restrictive covenant put in the partnership agreement was to prevent the younger members of the firm, after having been brought into association with his patients, as his representatives, from setting up an independent practice in Atlantic City, and taking with them such patients, or any of them.

The conclusion of the learned vice-chancellor that it would be unjust and unnecessarily oppressive to enforce the restrictive covenant against Dr. Jonah, seems to be based upon the idea that, although the independent practice of his profession in Atlantic City by Dr. Jonah will result in the loss of patients by Dr. Marvel, yet, even after such loss, the latter's practice will still be so large as to be beyond his ability to cope with it without the assistance of others, and, consequently, that the restraint sought by him against Dr. Jonah would be of little value to him if granted. The premises do not justify such a conclusion. If Dr. Marvel has built up a practice so large that he is unable to take care of it without the aid of qualified assistants, he is entitled to the emoluments thereof, and to be protected against the loss of those emoluments through illegal competition. It will hardly do to say that a man who has built up a business so extensive that he cannot handle it without the aid of a staff of assistants, suffers no loss or injury by its diminution in volume to such an extent that he no longer needs assistance to carry it on, provided that [298] what remains of it is sufficient to fully occupy his own time. Common experience is to the contrary.

But the right of Dr. Marvel to the aid of a court of equity to restrain Dr. Jonah from violating his covenant to refrain from practicing his profession in Atlantic City for three years after the termination of their partnership agreement, does not depend upon the extent of the injury to his business which would result from such violation. It is sufficient that such injury be material. Where there is an express covenant, and an unconverted injury arising from the breach of it, equity will grant an injunction to restrain such breach, where the injury arising therefrom cannot be repaired, nor estimated in dollars and cents. The damages arising from the breach of a covenant such as that now under consideration would be continuing, accruing from day to day, and it would be impossible to ascertain the money loss sustained by Dr. Marvel therefrom with anything approaching accuracy. A suit at law, therefore, would afford no adequate remedy; and when this is the case, a court of chancery should enforce the covenant by granting an injunction to prevent the breach of it. Butler v. Burleson, 16 Vt. 176; Timmerman v. Dever, 52 Mich. 34, 17 N. W. 230, 50 Am. Rep. 240; Wilkinson v. Colley, 164 Pa. St. 35, 30 Atl. 286, 26 L.R.A. 114; Gravelly v. Barnard, 14 R. 18 Eq. (Eng.) 518. In each of the cited cases the complainant, a physician, appealed to a court of equity to restrain a fellow-practitioner from violating a covenant very similar in its legal aspects to that which Dr. Marvel claims the benefit of. In each of them the restraint prayed for was decreed, and this was done without any consideration of the extent of the injury

The conclusion of the learned vice-chancellor that the granting of the restraint asked for by Dr. Marvel would be unjust to the defendant, seems to be based upon the idea that the latter would thereby be deprived of the privilege of pursuing his practice in the only field of his acquaintance. But this idea is not justified by the proofs in the case, for from them it appears that the practice of the firm is not confined solely to the city of Atlantic City, but embraces Ventnor, Margate and Longport, boroughs which are adjacent thereto. But even if the deprivation [299] should be as complete as the learned vice-chancellor seems to think it would, we see no injustice in compelling Dr. Jonah to live up to the covenant solemnly entered into by him, and which was one of the causes inducing Dr. Marvel to admit him into partnership, and to a share in the benefits of the practice which he had built up. The fact that the performance of such a promise involves personal hardship, or pecuniary loss, to the promisor, affords no justification for nonperformance. If the law recognized such an excuse for the breach of a contract of this kind, very few cases would be found in the books where the performance of such negative covenants had been compelled by injunction; for speaking generally it is only where the performance of the covenant is disadvantageous to the covenantor that he refuses to perform it, and renders it necessary for the party for whose benefit it is made to apply to the courts for relief.

The above views lead to a reversal of so much of the present decree as is brought before us by this appeal. The record will be remitted to the court of chancery with a direction that an injunction issue against Dr. Jonah restraining him from the practice of his profession in the city of Atlantic City for a period of three years from and after the making of the decree in that court. The complainant below is entitled to costs.

GARRISON, J. (dissenting).—I agree that Dr. Marvel was entitled to the measure of protection stated in the majority opinion, viz., that Dr. Jonah often having been brought into association with Dr. Marvel's patients should not set up an independent practice in Atlantic City and take with him such patients, or any of them. I very fully agree that a covenant to this effect would be one that a court of conscience ought to enforce. The present covenant, however, goes away beyond such protection and penalizes Dr. Jonah by prohibiting him from practicing not only among such patients of Dr. Marvel's but also among the hundreds of thousands of persons who annually visit Atlantic City without ever having heard of Dr. Marvel.

Such a covenant, while good in law, is, owing to its highly penal character, one to the enforcement of which equity refuses [300] to lend its aid, leaving the parties to the courts of law where the complainant can obtain redress that is exactly proportioned to the injury he has suffered.

This was the view of Vice-Chancellor Leaming, in whose conclusions I concur and vote to affirm the decree advised by him. I am requested by Mr. Justice Bergen and by Judge White to say that they concur in the foregoing views.

For affirmance—Garrison, Bergen, White—3.

For reversal—The Chief-Justice, Parker, Minturn, Kalisch, Bogert, Vredenburg, Hepheimer—7.

RULE STATED.

Where a business, occupation or professional practice is sold, and the seller, as part of the consideration for the purchase, enters into an agreement not to re-engage in the same business, the purchaser may, if the agreement is valid within the rules governing contracts in restraint of trade, enjoin a breach of the agreement.

Thus, in Flaherty v. Libby, 108 Me. 377, 81 Atl. 166, the court said: "It is customary and oftentimes necessary that a person purchasing the business of another, with the good-will that should follow the transaction, enters into an agreement with the seller whereby the seller is restricted from engaging in a similar business within specified districts. If these agreements are not made the seller, if he sees fit, can immediately begin business upon his own account, or in the employment of a rival of the purchaser and completely destroy the good-will which he has sold and for which he has received a valuable consideration. . . . It is but just that the parties to an agreement of this kind, entered into for a valuable consideration, should not only live up to the letter of the agreement, but also to its spirit. It is so easy for one indirectly, by word or conduct, to utterly destroy the good-will of a business which he has sold, and which another in good faith has purchased, adequate damages for which, owing to the rules of law governing the assessment of damages, cannot be awarded, that equity carefully scrutinizes the conduct of the seller, and if, directly or indirectly, he so conducts himself that his agreement not to engage in the business is violated, promptly restrains with its writ of injunction further acts that tend to take from the purchaser the rights that he acquired by purchase from the seller."

APPLICATION OF RULE.

The rule allowing an injunction against the violation of an agreement by the seller of a business not to engage in a similar business has been applied to sales of a great variety of occupations. The nature of the business or professional practice which forms the subject matter of the contract is, it seems, an immaterial consideration to the application of the rule; at least, the courts have drawn no distinctions on this ground. Injunctions have been granted to restrain defendants from re-engaging in the following named trades: business of distributing advertising matter, Johnston v. Blanchard, 16 Cal. App. 321, 116 Pac. 973; bakery business, Buckhout v. Witwer, 157 Mich. 406, 122 N. W. 184, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 506 (sale of business by stockholder); bamboo ware and fancy furniture business, *Cook v. Covenant by Employee.

GOVERNING PRINCIPLES.

Ordinarily, the negative covenant in a contract whereby an employee agrees to render services to an employer for a specified period, and not to engage in the same business during such period, does not entitle the complainant to injunctive relief, unless he can show that the employee has some peculiar qualifications. Burney v. Ryle, 91 Ga. 701, 17 S. E. 986; Hammond v. Georgian Co. 133 Ga. 1, 65 S. E. 124; Paxson v. Butterick Pub. Co. 136 Ga. 774, 71 S. E. 1105; Rosenstein v. Von Spreckelsen, 117 Wis. 106, 94 N. W. 78. And see Sternberg v. O'Brien, 48 N. J. Eq. 370, 22 Atl. 348.

by a servant not to engage in a business similar to that of his master after the termination of the employment, see the note to Turner v. Abbott, 8 Ann. Cas. 150.

RULE STATED.

Where a contract of employment contains a valid covenant by the employee that after the termination of the employment he will not engage in the same business as that of the employer, the latter is entitled to an injunction to restrain a breach of the covenant. Caribonum Co. v. LeCouch, 109 L. T. N. S. 587, affirming 109 L. T. N. S. 385; Kelly v. McLaughlin, 21 Manitoba 789, 19 West. L. Rep. 633, 1 West. W. Rep. 309; Skeans v. Hampton, 31 Ont. L. Rep. 424, 6 Ont. W. APPLICATION OF RULE.

The rule that an employee will be restrained from breaking an agreement not to engage in the same business after leaving the service of the employer, has been applied in recent cases to the following named employments; driver of laundry wagon, Eureka Laundry Co. v. Long, 146 Wis. 205, 131 N. W. 412, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 119; driver for laundry company, who had been furnished with list of names and addresses of company's patrons, Philadelphia Towel Supply, etc. Co. v. Weinstein, 57 Pa. Super. Ct. 290; manager for dealers in automobiles, Kelly v. McLaughlin, 21 Manitoba 789, 19 West. L. Rep. 633, 1 West. W. Rep. 309; manager of dye works, Parkers Dye Works v. Smith, 32 Ont. L. Rep. 169, 7 Ont. W. N. 207, 20 Dominion L. Rep. 500; manager for manufacture of typewriter ribbons and carbon paper, Caribonum Co. v. LeCouch, 109 L. T. N. S. 587, affirming 109 L. T. N. S. 385; managerial position in publishing business, McCall Co. v. Wright, 198 N. Y. 143, 91 N. E. 516, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 249; music teacher, Columbia College of Music, etc. v. Tunberg, 04 Wash. 19, 116 Pac. 280; salesman, canvasser and collector for grocery concern, Witkop, etc. Co. v. Boyce, 64 Misc. 374, 118 N. Y. S. 461, 61 Misc. 126, 112 N. Y. S. 874, affirmed 131 App. Div. 922, 115 N. Y. S. 1150; traveling salesman selling teas and coffees, Skeans v. Hampton, 31 Ont. L. Rep. 424, 6 Ont. W. N. 463, 25 Ont. W. Rep. 865, 5 Ont. W. N. 919; solicitor for laundry, Owl Laundry Co. v. Banks, 83 N. J. Eq. 230, 39 Atl. 1055.

Where it appeared that the defendant sold his shares in a livery company, with a contract in writing that he would never again engage in the livery business within the corporate limits of the town, and became an employee of the company, but later took service in the same town with an opposition livery stable, it was held that an injunction would issue restraining him from so doing. Anders v. Gardner, 151 N. C. 604, 66 S. E. 665. And see Holtman v. Knowles, 141 Ga. 613, 81 S. E. 852.

Similarly, an assistant of a medical practitioner will be enjoined from violating a covenant not to practice after leaving his employer. Freudenthal v. Espey, 45 Colo. 488, 202 Pac. 280, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 961; Palmer v. Mallet, 36 Ch. D. (Eng.) 411, 57 L. J. Ch. 226, 58 L. T. N. S. 64, 36 W. R. 460; Fox v. Seard, 33 Beav. 327, 55 Eng. Rep. (reprint) 394. Likewise, a covenant by a solicitor's assistant not to practice after leaving him, has been enforced. Edmundson v. Render [1905] 2 Ch. 320 [1905] W. N. 121. And in Robertson v. Willmott [1909] W. N. 155, an architect's assistant was enjoined from violating such a restrictive agreement.

Considerations Governing Granting of Injunction in Particular Case.

INJURY TO PLAINTIFF.

In Columbia College of Music, etc. v. Tunberg, 64 Wash. 19, 116 Pac. 280, the court said: "The motion for nonsuit, . . . was based upon the ground that it had not been shown that any pupils had left the appellant's school on account of respondent's leaving its employ. We grant that the record fails to disclose this fact. But it does disclose an ill-will, as well as an endeavor to influence the minds of certain of the pupils against appellant and its officers. And respondent should not be allowed to claim that immunity which equity gives to those who walk within its precepts, because his effort and his influence failed of results. His continued effort may succeed. To prevent wrong is the peculiar province of equity. His conduct has been such, and promises to be of such character, that damages may result. If so, they would be irreparable, in the sense that they could be estimated only by conjecture and not by any accurate standard."

LACHES.

In Fries v. Parr, 139 N. Y. S. 220, holding that an action for an injunction was barred by laches, the court said: "It further appears from the evidence that the defendants not only started the business complained of, but continued it for two years before the plaintiff complained of their acts or took legal proceedings to enjoin them, and that during the two years the plaintiff was fully advised of what the defendants were doing and entered no protest against it. In the meantime the defendants have built up for themselves quite a successful and profitable business. We think the plaintiff has slept on his rights, if he had any, and that he was called on to act promptly, and could not delay proceedings without being charged with the consequences of his laches."

But where an action for an injunction was not commenced until more than ten months after the alleged breach of the contract, the court said: "The trial court entertained jurisdiction of the cause knowing that appellee had waited more than ten months before attempting to protect his rights, and we are not prepared to say that such time, under the circumstances of this case, constituted laches on the part of appellee sufficient to deprive him of resort to a court of equity." Locke v. Murdoch (N. M.) 151 Pac. 298.

REMEDY AT LAW.

In Holliston v. Ernston, 124 Minn. 49, 144 N. W. 415, the court said, quoting Andrews v. Kingsbury, 212 Ill. 97, 72 N. E. 11: "The general rule that a writ of injunction should only issue where there is an unquestionable right and where irreparable injury will be suffered, and there is no adequate remedy at law either on account of the insolvency of the defendant or for some other cause, is not applicable to this case. Courts of equity will, and frequently do, interpose by injunction, thereby indirectly enforcing the performance of negative covenants by prohibiting their breach; and where there is an express negative covenant, courts of equity will entertain bills for injunctions to prevent their violation, even though the same will occasion no substantial injury or though the remedy be adequate at law." And in Artistic Porcelain Co. v. Boch, 76 N. J. Eq. 533, 74 Atl. 680, the court said: "The innumerable instances in which a violation of a contract of the kind under consideration has been enjoined are rested upon the ground that from the nature of such cases just and adequate damages cannot be estimated for a breach of the contract, and that injunctive relief avoids a multiplicity of actions."

STIPULATION FOR LIQUIDATED DAMAGES.

The fact that the contract stipulates for a fixed sum to be paid to the covenantee in case of a breach thereof, does not oust the jurisdiction of a court of equity. Wills v. Forester, 140 Mo. App. 321, 124 S. W. 1090. And see Buckhout v. Witwer, 157 Mich. 406, 122 N. W. 184, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 506. In Magid v. Tannenbaum, 164 App. Div. 142, 149 N. Y. S. 445, the court said: "This case is further differentiated from those in which an injunction has been granted, because if there was a valid contract not to enter a similar employment for a year after his employment with the plaintiffs ceased, the contract itself provided for liquidated damages in case of such breach, and so the plaintiffs would have an adequate remedy at law. In our opinion the record fails to disclose proper and sufficient grounds to warrant the issue of the injunction pendente lite."

And the fact that a bond is given by the covenantor does not vary the rule. Hickey v. Brinkley, 88 Neb. 356, 129 S. W. 553; Fox v. Scard, 33 Beav. 327, 55 Eng. Rep. (reprint) 394; Palmer v. Mallet, 36 Ch. D. (Eng.) 411, 57 L. J. Ch. 226, 58 L. T. N. S. 64, 36 W. R. 460.

ANDERSON

v.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Idaho Supreme Court—January 19, 1914.

25 Idaho 433; 133 Pac. 127.

Liens — Logger's Lien — Persons Entitled.

Section 5125 of the Revised Codes, which provides that "every person performing labor upon, or who shall assist in obtaining or securing, sawlogs, spars, piles, cordwood, or other timber, or in obtaining or securing the same," is sufficiently broad and comprehensive to confer a lien upon laborers who work in the employ of a contractor in moving a large quantity of railroad ties a distance of a couple hundred feet from the place where they were piled upon the railroad company's right of way and loading them upon cars for transportation.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The statute (Rev. Codes, § 5125), confers the same lien in favor of every person "performing labor upon" sawlogs, etc., as it confers on every person who assists in "obtaining or securing" such material.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A statute (Rev. Codes, § 5125) which confers a lien in favor of laborers who perform work upon or aid in obtaining or securing "sawlogs, spars, piles, cordwood, or other timber," is sufficiently broad and comprehensive to confer a lien in favor of persons who work upon or assist in obtaining or securing railroad ties, and the words "other timber" are sufficiently comprehensive to include ties.

[See note at end of this case.]

Removal of Property Subject to Lien — Validity of Statute.

Section 5140 of the Revised Codes, which provides for the recovery of damages from any one who elicits certain property on which a lien exists for labor performed, is constitutional and valid.

Statutes — Title — Effect of Subsequent Codification.

Where a section of a legislative act has been incorporated in the Revised Codes and adopted as a part of the complete statutes of the state, the court will not inquire into or consider the sufficiency of the original title of the act in which such section was originally adopted by the legislature. In such case, it is too late to raise the sufficiency of the title to the original act, which was adopted prior to the date of its incorporation and adoption in the Revised Codes of the state.

Liens — Removal of Property Subject to Lien — Statute.

The purpose and intent of section 5140 of the Revised Codes is to render every person who injures, destroys, or removes any of the property therein described on which a lien exists liable for the amount of the claim held against the property, or, if the property be of less value than the lien claimed, then it allows the claimant the damages which he has sustained by reason of the removal or destruction of the particular property.

Logger's Lien — Persons Furnishing Supplies — Validity of Statute.

Chapter 226, Sess. Laws 1911, giving a lien on logs in favor of a person furnishing supplies, groceries or feed to a contractor or board to an employee is invalid, void, and inoperative, for the reason that it does not provide for any notice to the owner of the property on which the lien is to attach, and affords him no means or method of protecting himself against such claim, and does not provide a method of procedure for taking his property for such claim by "due process of law," and does not give such property owner the "equal protection of the law."

Due Process of Law — What Constitutes.

No process is "due process" which does not give notice, either actual or constructive, and no taking of property for debt is lawful unless the debt has been created with the knowledge and consent of the debtor.

[See 6 R. C. L. tit. Constitutional Law, p. 433.]

Appeal from District Court, Bonner county: FLYNN, Judge.

Action by A. J. Anderson, plaintiff, against Great Northern Railway Company, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

G. H. Martin for appellant.

C. S. Albert, H. H. Taylor and Thos. Balmer for respondent.

C. L. Heitman, amicus curiae.

[440] AILSHIE, C. J.—The appellant commenced this suit on six alleged causes of action which had been assigned to him, and on a seventh in his own favor. A demurrer was sustained to each cause of action and judgment of dismissal was entered, and this appeal was thereupon prosecuted.

One Lee Decker was employed by respondent to take 13,655 railroad ties from where they were stacked on respondent's right of way and remove them a few hundred feet and load them on to respondent's cars. In doing the work involved in this contract, Decker employed six men and secured groceries and supplies from appellant for the use of himself and men while doing this work. Decker appears to have failed to pay his men. The men thereupon and within the statutory time filed liens under the provisions of sec. 5125 of the Revised Codes. Respondent contends, and the trial court agreed with it, that this statute does not contemplate or provide a lien of the kind here sought to be enforced.

Section 5125 provides as follows: "Every person performing labor upon, or who shall assist in obtaining or securing, saw-logs, spars, piles, cordwood, or other timber, has a lien upon the same for the work or labor done upon, or in obtaining or securing the same, whether such work or labor was done at the instance of the owner of the same or his agent. The cook shall be regarded as a person who assists in obtaining or securing the timber herein mentioned."

It must be remembered that this statute is written in the disjunctive and that the lien contemplated is given to "every person performing labor upon . . . saw-logs, spars, piles, cordwood, or other timber" as well as to "every person . . . [441] who shall assist in obtaining or securing" any of the property mentioned. In other words, the same lien is given to one for "performing work upon" any of the property enumerated as is given to one who "assists in obtaining or securing" any such property. This court adopted this same course of reasoning in construing sec. 5110, Rev. Codes, in Hill v. Twin Falls Salmon River Land, etc. Co. 22 Idaho 274, 125 Pac. 204. This work was undoubtedly done upon these ties in removing and loading them; it was work done about, concerning, in respect to, or with reference to these ties. There is little room for doubt but that railroad ties are timber and fall within the enumeration of "other timber" as used in sec. 5125, supra. As authority in point and supporting this view, see Forsberg v. Lundgren, 64 Wash. 427, 117 Pac. 244.

We think the word "timber" as here used refers to any kind of timber as it may be taken from the forest, whether in a prepared state for the use to which it is to be applied or in the natural and unfinished condition. For example, cordwood is enumerated preceding the use of the words "or other timber," and yet cordwood is not a manufactured article. On the other hand, "spars and piles" are enumerated and signify specially prepared pieces of timber for definite purposes. It would be extremely technical and strict to construe the statute as not giving a lien for work upon or in securing ties.

In this case it is alleged that after the ties were loaded on the cars the railroad company elogined them and scattered them along its right of way in the states of Washington, Idaho and Montana and rendered it impossible for the claimants to identify them or foreclose their lien thereon, and appellants seek personal judgments against the company for damages under the provisions of sec. 5140, Rev. Codes. That section provides as follows:

"Any person who shall injure, impair, or destroy, or who shall render difficult, uncertain or impossible of identification, any saw-logs, spars, piles, cordwood, or other timber, upon which there is a lien as herein provided, without the express consent of the person entitled to such lien, shall be liable to the lienholder for the damages to the amount secured by his [442] lien, which may be recovered by civil action against such person."

It will be observed that the foregoing section 5140 applies to any person who shall injure, impair or destroy or shall render uncertain, difficult, or impossible of identification any of the property on which a lien exists under sec. 5125. The objection that sec. 5140 of the Rev. Codes, as originally enacted and found in the 1899 Sess. Laws, p. 188, is unconstitutional and in violation of sec. 16, art. 3 of the state constitution, is without merit, for the reason that this section was subsequently incorporated in the Revised Codes and was adopted as a part of the entire body of the revised statutes and as a part of the complete code of laws of the state. It is now too late to raise the sufficiency of the title to a statute originally adopted prior to the date of the adoption of the Revised Codes, where such statute has been incorporated in the general code of laws. (36 Cyc. 1068; Central of Georgia R. Co. v. State, 104 Ga. 831, 31 S. E. 531, 42 L.R.A. 518; Kennedy v. Meara, 127 Ga. 68, 56 S. E. 243, 9 Ann. Cas. 396; Christopher v. Mungen, 61 Fla. 513, 55 So. 273.)

Lastly, it is argued that sec. 5140 of the Rev. Codes is unconstitutional and void, for the reason that it is violative of sec. 1 of the fourteenth amendment to the federal constitution, and of sec. 13, art. 1, of the state constitution in that it deprives respondent of its property without due process of law and denies to it the equal protection of the laws. We do not think this objection is well founded. In the first place, under this statute, there is no liability against one who injures, destroys or removes such property, unless there is an existing lien thereon. The statute creates the lien. It specifies the kind of a contract and transaction and the conditions under which a laborer will be entitled to a lien. Whenever, therefore, the owner or purchaser of or contractor for property falling within the purview of this statute employs a laborer or enters into a contract which comes within the terms of the statute, the law at once becomes operative and gives to the party rendering the services or performing the labor a lien. This lien exists by operation of law for the period of [448] sixty days. At the expiration of that time, the lien lapses and ceases to exist, unless in the meanwhile the claimant has complied with the provisions of the statute requiring the filing of a written notice of his lien claim, setting forth the facts required to be shown by the statute. If the lien claimant complies with this statute, the lien continues in force from the time of its inception, namely, when he commenced work until the claim is paid or the lien is foreclosed. Under this statute, it is not a question of the lien arising at the time the notice of lien is filed with the proper county official and of the lien relating back to the time the work commenced. There is no such thing under this statute as a lien relating back. The lien arises with the commencement of work and is created by statute, and its continuance beyond sixty days is conditional upon the claimant doing the thing required by the statute.

Now, as for the contention that the statute is void because of being arbitrary, we fail to see wherein this contention contains any merit. The court will first determine whether the claimant was entitled to a lien, and after that fact has been determined, the damages sustained by the lien claimant by reason of eloignment of the property must be determined and assessed in the same way that damages would be determined and assessed in any other case. The fact that this statute may impose an extra burden and hardship upon the owner of the property in that it requires him to ascertain whether any liens exist against the property before removing it, is not a sufficient ground for holding the statute unconstitutional and void. That might be a good argument to present to the lawmaking body, and it might furnish a reason or justification for the legislature making some exceptions in the law, but they have not done so and the court would not be justified in doing so. It is certainly within the power of a railroad company, a lumber company, or of an individual to ascertain whether laboring men have been paid before settling with the contractor, and if they fail to do so, they must assume the consequent burdens and obligations which arise under the statute. The law, therefore, undertakes to render a person [444] who injures, destroys, impairs or removes the property on which such lien exists liable for the amount of the claim held against the property, or, if the property be of less value than the lien claim, then it allows the claimant the damages which he has sustained by reason of the removal or destruction of the particular property. There is nothing unusual or oppressive about such a statute. The statute might make such a person guilty of a crime, as it does in case of removal of personal property covered by a chattel mortgage. Under the statute, no penalty attaches to the person doing the thing, unless he first violates the statute which prohibits him injuring, impairing, destroying, or removing any such property. If he does this thing, then he is subject to the penalty which may be recovered in a civil action against such person.

The argument advanced that a railroad company would be liable for receiving and shipping ties or other timber product until it can first determine and ascertain whether there are any liens on the property, is unsound. The statute has no application to any such transaction; a common carrier receiving and transporting freight in due course of business would not be liable for impairing, destroying or rendering uncertain or impossible of identification any property on which there is a lien. It does not seem possible that the mere constructive notice which the statute imparts would extend beyond the party first removing or disturbing the property. In other words, the liability is not one that would attach to every subsequent purchaser, bailee or carrier of the property.

This brings us to a consideration of the seventh cause of action which involves the validity and constitutionality of chap. 226 of the 1911 Session Laws (1911 Sess. Laws, p. 727). It is argued by counsel that section 1 of this act violates sec. 1, art. 14, of the federal constitution and sec. 13 of art. 1 of the state constitution. Sec. 1 of chap. 226 of the 1911 Session Laws provides as follows:

"Every person, firm, company or corporation selling or furnishing supplies, groceries, feed or other necessities to any contractor, boarding-house keeper or other person, firm or corporation to be used upon and while such contractor, boarding-house [445] keeper or other person, firm or corporation, or the employer of such contractor, boarding-house keeper or other person, firm or corporation is engaged in obtaining, securing, cutting or manufacturing saw-logs, spars, piles, cord-wood, ties or lumber, has a lien upon the same for the value of the supplies, groceries, feed or other necessities so furnished."

Section 2 provides for filing a notice of lien, and the remaining sections provide the procedure to be followed, while section 9, being the last section of the act, provides that, "Any person who shall injure, impair or destroy, or who shall render difficult, uncertain or impossible of identification, any saw-logs, spars, piles, cord-wood, ties or lumber upon which there is a lien, as herein provided, without the written consent of the person entitled to such lien, shall be liable to the lien-holder for the damages of the amount secured by his lien, together with treble damages which may be recovered by civil action against such person."

We have examined this statute with unusual care and have considered the authorities cited, both in support of and opposition thereto, and over and above all this have considered what must be the practical workings and effect of this statute. We are not going to review authorities here but shall rather briefly state some of the reasons which have led us to reach the conclusion hereafter to be stated.

Lien laws rest on two cardinal principles: First, that the owner of the property on which the lien is claimed has received some benefit or advantage by reason of the service rendered or material or supplies furnished; and, second, that the owner has contracted with someone, who thereby becomes his agent, to render such service or furnish such material or supplies. The statute under consideration, as may be seen from an examination of section 1, above quoted, runs counter to both these principles of lien laws. It attempts to create a lien irrespective of contract and without regard to any benefit either direct or remote which the owner of the property may have received from the supplies furnished. It furnishes the owner of the property no notice and affords him no method of protecting himself against any such claim, and [446] charges him with a claim which may equal or exceed the value of the property although he has paid the contract price to the men who actually did the labor. In these respects, it undoubtedly has the effect of taking property without due process of law. When the owner of property makes a contract to have work done on such property, he presumably contracts to pay the full value of such work, and he certainly cannot foresee what groceries, feed and supplies the contractor or laboring men may purchase or need in course of the performance of such work. Men must eat and teams must be fed whether they be working or not, and to charge a property owner or one having building done or material furnished with all the "supplies, groceries, feed or other necessities" which the contractor or any of his men may purchase and use during the performance of such work without giving or serving any notice thereof on the person to be charged would certainly be taking the property of one man and giving it to another without "due process of law" and without affording the party "the equal protection of the law." No process is "due process" which does not give notice, either actual or constructive, and no "taking of property" for debt is lawful unless the debt has been created with the knowledge and consent of the debtor. This knowledge and consent may be constructive so far as it is necessary to create a charge against property, but the statute which furnishes the constructive notice must provide process by which the claims may be measured and established so the property owner may have a ready and certain method of knowing or ascertaining his liability. No such method is furnished by the statute under discussion. There is no means afforded for the property owner to learn who has furnished groceries, supplies or necessities to the contractor or men until after his liability has attached for laborers and materialmen's liens if he has not in the meanwhile paid them in full. If this statute should be upheld in its present condition, its enforcement would subject the owner of the property on which the lien is claimed to double and possibly treble liability for the work performed or materials furnished.

[447] We conclude that chapter 226 of the 1911 Session Laws is invalid and void, for the reasons above set forth. The following authorities are in point upon the legal principles here involved and hold to the effect above suggested: Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 616; Rogers-Ruger Co. v. Murray, 115 Wis. 267, 95 Am. St. Rep. 901, 91 N. W. 657, 59 L.R.A. 737; Perrault v. Shaw, 69 N. H. 180, 76 Am. St. Rep. 160, 38 Atl. 724; Meyer v. Bank Loan, etc. Co. 77 Mich. 199, 18

Am. St. Rep. 396, 43 N. W. 778, 6 L.R.A. 204; Bickelberg v. Montana Union R. Co. 8 Mont. 271, 20 Pac. 314, 2 L.R.A. 813; Catrill v. Union Pac. R. Co. 2 Idaho 576, 21 Pac. 416.

The judgment in this case will be reversed as to the first six causes of action prosecuted under section 5125, Rev. Codes, and this case is remanded, with direction to the trial court to overrule the demurrer thereto, and the judgment is affirmed as to the seventh cause of action prosecuted under chap. 226 of the 1911 Sess. Laws. Appellant will be awarded six-sevenths of the taxable costs of this appeal.

SULLIVAN, J. (concurring in part and dissenting in part).—I concur in the conclusion reached by Chief Justice Ailshie to the effect that sec. 1 of chap. 226 of the Session Laws of 1911, p. 727, is unconstitutional and void, in that it undertakes to deprive one of property without due process of law; and I dissent to that part of Chief Justice Ailshie's opinion wherein he holds that the plaintiff and his assignors have a valid lien upon said ties for loading them on the cars after they had been manufactured and delivered to the railroad company upon their right of way. All of the work performed upon said ties was done and the ties delivered as a finished timber product, to the respondent. Sec. 5125 provides that "every person performing labor upon, or who shall assist in obtaining or securing, saw-logs, spars, piles, cordwood, or other timber, has a lien upon the same for the work or labor done upon, or in obtaining or securing the same." The legislature [448] in enacting that section did not have in view, and did not intend to provide for, a lien upon the timber products there referred to, for work and labor upon them after they had been delivered to the owner as finished products.

In this case, all of the work required to complete the ties had been done and the ties delivered to and placed upon the right of way of the defendant. The respondent and his assignors were employed by a person who had a contract with the railroad company to place said ties upon the cars for distribution along the company's railway lines. They began their work about November 13, 1912, and completed it about December 10, 1912. Thereafter, on January 14, 1913, thirty-five days after they had completed loading the ties, and after the railroad company had moved said ties out of the state, they filed their liens. The railroad company had transported said ties out of the state before the lien was filed, and innocently so, and as I view it, it would be an outrage upon justice to permit the plaintiff to penalize the defendant in three times the value of the wages sought to be recovered, under the facts of this case. It is a monstrous proposition to me to hold that one who loads on the cars certain timber that has been manufactured and delivered to the railroad company for transportation can compel the railroad company to hold the material for thirty-five or sixty days in order to permit him to file a lien.

The clear intent of the legislature in enacting said section 5125 was to give a lien for labor performed in the woods and logging camps, upon timber products before they were delivered as completed products to the owner.

After those ties had been delivered to the company, there was no other labor required to obtain or secure them. The respondent had already "obtained and secured" them. The labor for which appellant claims a lien here was performed subsequently to the time the ties were obtained and secured by the respondent and his assignors merely took the ties and placed them on the cars for shipment after they had been "obtained and secured" and delivered into the possession of respondent and piled on its right of way by [449] other parties. Those ties were in the possession of the respondent and were completed timber products before the appellant performed any labor in connection with them.

If the legislature had desired to give a lien to those who performed labor in loading ties upon the cars, they might have done so; but as I view it, they have not attempted to do that. They were simply attempting to give a lien for the work done in procuring the finished timber products mentioned in said section and delivering them to the owner.

In states having statutes similar to ours, such statutes are regarded as timber lien statutes enacted for the purpose of protecting laborers who produce the finished product, such as cordwood, saw-logs, ties, etc.—those who work in the woods and those who deliver such products, after they are finished, to the owner. (See Jones on Liens, secs. 702-730.) This intent is clearly shown by the phraseology of the statute providing a lien for all those who shall "perform labor upon," etc., enumerating only the raw products of the woods and the products that are produced in the woods, such as "spars, piles, cordwood or other timber products." The last part of said section, to wit, "the cook shall be regarded as a person who assists in obtaining or securing the timber herein mentioned," clearly shows that said statute was intended only to secure those who worked in the woods or in hauling such products to the place where they were to be delivered to the owner.

Under the construction of the provisions of said statute by the majority, railroad construction men who lay these ties in the road-bed and the cooks who prepare their food assist in "obtaining or securing" them. Unless the cooks and tie-layers, and even those who furnished supplies to the railroad construction camps in which these men were working, were paid immediately and simultaneously with the laying of each tie, where the ties were secured from different places and laid indiscriminately, they would be entitled under the construction of the statute to an action for damages against the railway company for commingling the ties and impairing their liens. The legislature could not have intended to thus [450] cripple business operations, without requiring each person to notify the company as soon as the work was done that he had not been paid for his labor.

Certainly none of the labor performed by the appellant and his assignors was performed upon said ties, according to the allegations of the complaint, before they were completed ties and delivered to the possession of the respondent, and the respondent in no manner assisted in "obtaining or securing" said ties, within the meaning of those words as used in said statute. It is true the appellant alleges in third paragraph of his complaint that he "performed labor upon and assisted in obtaining and securing said railroad ties," while the other allegations of the complaint clearly show that that statement is false and that they did nothing toward "obtaining and securing" said ties.

All over the timber country in the north men have contracts for placing logs, cordwood and lumber upon cars for the purpose of shipping them to different points in the state or out of the state, and the legislature never intended to give a lien, by the provisions of the laborer's lien law, to persons who place such finished timber products upon the cars for shipment after they have been delivered to the owner. Is it possible or probable that it was intended to give a lien to persons who are employed to load lumber upon a car for shipment out of the state; that such persons have sixty days in which to file a lien, when it is well known by those who load the lumber that it is to be shipped immediately to other parts of the state or out of the state? And if the owner ships the lumber, that he is penalized in three times the value of the labor? The legislature never intended said lien law should be applied so as to cripple business, as will be done by the construction placed upon the statute by the majority of the court. The action of the trial court in sustaining the demurrer in this case ought to be affirmed.

STEWART, J. (dissenting).—I dissent from the majority of the court in their two opinions upon the question that sec. 1, chap. 226 of the 1911 Sess. Laws (p. 727) violates sec. 1, [451] art. 14 of the federal constitution and sec. 13 of art. 1 of the state constitution.

Section 1 provides: "Every person, firm, company or corporation selling or furnishing supplies, groceries, feed or other necessities to any contractor, boarding-house keeper or other person, firm or corporation to be used upon and while such contractor, boarding-house keeper or other person, firm or corporation, or the employer of such contractor, boarding-house keeper or other person, firm or corporation is engaged in obtaining, securing, cutting or manufacturing saw-logs, spars, piles, cordwood, ties or lumber, has a lien upon the same for the value of the supplies, groceries, feed or other necessities so furnished."

In this case one Decker was employed by respondent to take railroad ties from where they were stacked on respondent's right of way and remove them a few hundred feet and load them on to respondent's cars. In doing the work involved in the contract, Decker employed men and secured groceries and supplies from appellant for the use of himself and men while doing the work. He failed to pay the men, and the men, within the statutory time, filed liens under the provisions of sec. 5125, Rev. Codes. Respondent contends, and the trial court agreed with him, that this statute does not contemplate or provide for a lien of the kind here sought to be enforced.

In connection with this section it is clear that chap. 226 of the Sess. Laws of 1911 has no repealing clause and is not an amendment of sec. 5125. It will be observed by comparing these two sections that sec. 1 of chap. 226 does not contain "every person performing labor upon," which is incorporated in sec. 5125, but does provide "every person, firm, company or corporation selling or furnishing supplies, groceries, feed or other necessities to any contractor, boarding-house keeper or other person, firm or corporation to be used upon and while such contractor, boarding-house keeper or other person, firm or corporation . . . is engaged in obtaining"; then follows the rest of the quotation above given from sec. 1.

[452] It will thus be seen that sec. 1 contains a provision, "Every person, firm, company or corporation selling or furnishing supplies, groceries, feed or other necessities, to any contractor, boarding-house keeper or other person, firm or corporation to be used upon and while such contractor, boarding-house keeper or other person, firm or corporation . . . is engaged in obtaining," and that chap. 226, 1911 Session Laws, does not repeal sec. 5125, Rev. Codes, specifically or by implication, and is not repugnant to such section.

The two legislative acts are not repugnant to or in conflict with each other, but the one last passed is the latest expression of the legislature upon the creation of a lien for selling or furnishing supplies, groceries, feed or other necessities to any contractor, boarding-house keeper or other person or corporation to be used upon and while such contractor, boarding-house keeper or other person, firm or corporation is engaged in obtaining, etc. So these two acts are the same in effect, except the provisions in sec. 1 of chap. 226 as to furnishing merchandise such as groceries, feed and other necessities to be used while the contractor is engaged in obtaining, etc. This is not found in sec. 5125. That section provides for a lien for the work and labor upon or in obtaining or securing sawlogs, etc. If both acts by any reasonable construction can be construed together, both should be sustained. (38 Cyc. pp. 1073-1079.)

This same author announces what we think is the true rule on p. 1077: "When two statutes cover, in whole or in part, the same subject matter, and are not absolutely irreconcilable, no purpose of repealing being clearly shown, the court, if possible, will give effect to both. Where, however, a later act covers the whole subject of earlier acts and embraces new provisions, and plainly shows that it was intended, not only as a substitute for the earlier acts, but to cover the whole subject then considered by the legislature, and to prescribe the only rules in respect thereto, it operates as a repeal of former statutes relating to such subject matter, even if the former acts are not in all respects repugnant to the new act. But in order to effect such repeal by implication, it must appear [453] that the subsequent statute covered the whole subject matter of the former one, and was intended as a substitute for it. If the later statute does not cover the entire field of the first and fails to embrace within its terms a material portion of the first, it will not repeal so much of the first as is not included within its scope, but the two will be construed together, so far as the first still stands."

This rule is also followed by this court in the case of People v. Lytle, 1 Idaho 143.

This subject is annotated by the author in the quotations given from Cyc., and most of the courts in the different states of the Union have followed the rule quoted above, and we believe that such rule should be adhered to by this court. It has been approved by this court.

In the case of Phillips v. Salmon River Min. etc. Co. 9 Idaho 149, 72 Pac. 886, this court, in construing a laborer's lien as it existed at that time, announced the rule that "the provisions of our lien laws must be liberally construed with a view to effect their objects and promote justice," and we think the general rule above stated is the correct rule and should be applied in the construction of a statute of the character involved in this case

In the case of Empire Copper Co. v. Henderson, 15 Idaho 635, 99 Pac. 127, this court held that in construing an act of the legislature the court should ascertain and give effect to the legislative intent where that can be ascertained; but where the language of an enactment is clear and specific as to the subjects upon which a lien is provided for, then the court cannot assume that the legislature included subjects not mentioned in the language of the act, but must accept the act as formulated and adopted by the legislature. (See Holmberg v. Jones, 7 Idaho 752, 65 Pac. 563; 36 Cyc. 1107; Idaho Mut. Co-operative Ins. Co. v. Myer, 10 Idaho 294, 77 Pac. 628.)

In the case of Mara v. Branch (Tex.) 135 S. W. 661; the court of appeals of Texas, in dealing with merchandise, defines the same as follows: "'Merchandise' is a term of very extended meaning, and usually conveys the idea of personalty [454] used by merchants in the course of trade. It may as a fact include every article of traffic."

In the case of Ensign v. Coffelt, 102 Ark. 568, 145 S. W. 231, the supreme court of Arkansas, in construing a statute which makes void notes given in ordinary form for the price of patented machines, etc., holds that it shall not extend to merchants and dealers who sell patented things in the usual course of business; the words "merchant" and "dealer" meaning persons engaged in the business of buying and selling merchandise or other personal property in the usual course of trade.

Sutherland on Statutory Construction, vol. 2, sec. 363, lays down the rule of law as follows:

"The intent is the vital part, the essence of the law, and the primary rule of construction is to ascertain and give effect to that intent. The intention of the legislature in enacting a law is the law itself, and must be enforced when ascertained, although it may not be consistent with the strict letter of the statute. . . . Intent is the spirit which gives life to legislative enactments. In construing statutes, the proper course is to start out and follow the true intent of the legislature and to adopt that sense which harmonizes best with the context and promotes in the fullest manner the apparent policy and objects of the legislature."

The rule is generally recognized by the authorities to be that where a statute enumerates the things upon which it is to operate, it is to be construed as excluding from its effect all those not expressly mentioned; expressio unius exclusio alterius. (Perkins v. Thornburgh, 10 Cal. 189; Smith v. Randall, 6 Cal. 47, 65 Am. Dec. 475.)

In the case of In re Hull, 18 Idaho 475, 110 Pac. 256, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 465, this court held and stated on p. 279: "We enter upon the consideration of this statute fully conscious of the duty which rests on the court to ascertain what the law is on the subject, and to declare it as we find it rather than as we think it ought to have been. We have no right to add to or take from the law."

[455] The court cannot speculate upon the intent of the legislature, but must accept the interpretation of the act as it appears therein. This rule is discussed and determined in the case of Empire Copper Co. v. Henderson, 15 Idaho 635, 99 Pac. 127; Holmberg v. Jones, 7 Idaho 752, 65 Pac. 563.

The language used in chap. 226, Session Laws 1911, sec. 1, when read as an entirety, is clear and would seem to furnish its own interpretation, in designating the property upon which liens may be filed by certain persons, firms and corporations for supplies, groceries, feed or other necessities sold or furnished to any contractor, boarding-house keeper or other person, firm or corporation to be used upon and while such contractor, boarding-house keeper or other person, firm or corporation, or the employer of such contractor, boarding-house keeper or other person, firm or corporation is engaged in obtaining, securing, cutting or manufacturing saw logs, spars, piles, cordwood, ties or lumber.

If the language used in chap. 226, 1911 Sess. Laws, sec. 1, is unconstitutional, then it results in discrimination against the merchant and salesman or the producer of feed and sustenance who is engaged in selling or furnishing supplies, groceries, feed or other necessities to any contractor, boarding-house keeper, or other person or corporation, to be used upon and while such contractor, boarding-house keeper or other person, firm or corporation is engaged in obtaining, etc., as without the furnishing of such supplies to the men who are doing the labor in obtaining, securing, cutting or manufacturing saw logs, spars, piles, cordwood, ties or lumber by such merchants or salesmen, such employees so engaged would be deprived of the necessities of life and would be unable to live without such supplies, and the man who provided them, under the provisions of the statute in question, is justified in claiming a lien, and the statute should not be held void.

I therefore hold that chap. 226, 1911 Sess. Laws, is not in violation of the constitution. Neither is the act beyond the power vested in the legislature in enacting laws providing for mechanics' liens either for laborers engaged in obtaining, securing and cutting or manufacturing saw logs, spars, piles, [456] cordwood, ties or lumber, or for every person, firm, corporation, or company selling or furnishing supplies, groceries, feed or other necessities to any contractor, boarding-house keeper or other person, firm or corporation, or the employer of such contractor, boarding-house keeper or other persons, firm or cor- poration engaged in obtaining, securing, cutting or manufacturing saw logs, spars, piles, cordwood, ties or lumber.

My conclusion in this case is that chap. 226 is not unconstitutional, and should be sustained by this court, and that a judgment should be entered in this case accordingly.

I. Manual Labor.

1. IN GENERAL.

The statutes which give a lien to those who work on timber or logs differ materially in wording, but in all cases the object of the acts is to protect the wages of the men who actually do the manual labor and to accomplish this object the courts have construed such statutes liberally. As was said in Breault v. Archambault, 64 Minn. 420, 67 N. W. 348, 58 Am. St. Rep. 545: "That the statute in question was enacted to correct an abuse and to remedy an evil which had grown to enormous proportions is a matter of common history. Many owners of pine land habitually entered into logging contracts with reckless and irrepressible parties, the purpose and inevitable result being that the men who did the work were unable to collect their wages. The statute was passed to protect these men and the interests of labor, and a sound public policy require that it be liberally construed; that a construction be placed upon it which will protect all who, in furtherance of the common object, go into the logging camp, and there engage in the business of converting trees into logs and timber, in hauling the same to the banks of the streams, and there driving or rafting the product of their labor to market.

It has been held under a statute providing that "every person performing labor upon, or who shall assist in obtaining or securing sawlogs . . . has a lien upon the same for the work and labor done" etc., that a person who does the work of blasting rocks along a river to make a passage for logs thereon, which blasting is part of a general logging enterprise, is entitled to a lien. Duggan v. Washougal Land, etc. Co. 10 Wash. 84, 38 Pac. 856. And where the work done consists in construing a road which is necessary for the taking of logs from one place to another in a logging camp, the person doing that work may claim a lien therefor. Proulx v. Statson, etc. Mill Co. 6 Wash. 478, 33 Pac. 1067. But no lien will be given to those who do the work of opening up a public road leading to a logging camp laid out by county commissioners over which no logs are to be hauled but which is to be used only for hauling supplies to the camp. Duggan v. Washougal Land, etc. Co. 10 Wash. 84, 38 Pac. 856. In Grand Rapids Chair Co. v. Runnels, 77 Mich. 104, 43 N. W. 1006, an affidavit in an action brought under a lien law which gave a lien to laborers for "cutting, skidding, falling, hauling, scaling, banking, driving, running, rafting, or booming any logs" etc., alleged that the labor was performed in "cutting, skidding, hauling, chopping, sawing, swamping, loading, and falling." It was held that the services mentioned were within the meaning of the statute since "chopping" was included in "cutting," and "loading" was a necessary part of the "hauling," and "swamping" belonged to "skidding" as it consisted in the cutting out of the brush and removal of the rubbish in the way of getting the logs to the skidway.

It has been held that a scaler has a lien on logs for his service in scaling them. Meands v. Park, 95 Me. 527, 50 Atl. 706; Kline v. Comstock, 67 Wis. 473, 30 N. W. 920. See also Kennedy v. South Shore Lumber Co. 102 Wis. 284. And under a statute providing that "whoever labors at cutting, hauling, rafting or driving logs or lumber has a lien thereon for his personal services," it has been held that one who cuts, peels, and piles lumber is entitled to a lien. Bondur v. Le Bourne, 79 Me. 21, 7 Atl. 814. So a person who belonged to a gang of loggers and who spent his last day in getting together the tools which had been used in the enterprise has been held to be entitled to a lien for his services. Milton v. Underwood Lumber Co. 79 Wis. 646, 48 N. W. 857.

But under a statute giving a lien to "whoever labors at cutting, hauling, rafting or driving logs or lumber," it has been held that one who "sticks" lumber, that is, places thin strips of wood between layers of boards or lumber to secure a proper circulation of air through the pile, is not entitled to a lien. Hutchins v. Blaisdell, 106 Me. 92, 75 Atl. 291, wherein the court said: "Does the statute give a lien for sticking lumber? We think not. The evidence is barren of any explanation of the term but it is familiar knowledge that it is the process of placing thin strips of wood between layers of boards or timber in order to secure a proper circulation of air and the consequent seasoning of the lumber without warping or decay. It is not a necessary incident of hauling, but a distinct and independent branch of work that requires experience and skill in order to accomplish the best results. The work must be carefully done and requires time, for lumber improperly stuck may be greatly damaged. One crew may be and often is hired to haul and another to stick. A man may be competent to do the one but incompetent to do the other. A contract to haul would include loading and unloading but would not be construed to include sticking, because not all lumber is required to be stuck, and a contract to haul and stick would not be fulfilled by simply hauling and unloading in piles. The legislature might well have provided a lien for such work but it has not yet done so, and the court cannot create it."

Where a person occupies the position of foreman or superintendent of an entire logging operation and had charge of the men engaged in cutting and hauling the logs, but performs no manual labor on the logs, he does not "labor" within the meaning of a statute which provided that "whoever labors at cutting . . . logs or lumber . . . has a lien" etc. Meands v. Park, 95 Me. 527, 50 Atl. 706.

Under a statute declaring that "every person doing the work of cutting and sawing logs into lumber, getting out wood pulp, . . . shall have a lien upon the . . . lumber for the amount of wages," it has been held that one who does work directly for the betterment of the property, such as cutting, hauling and rafting logs is entitled to a lien thereon. Thomas v. Merrill, 169 N. C. 623, 86 S. E. 593.

A logger who is detained by his employer and is ready to do service for him, but whose services are not actually needed, is entitled to compensation for the time thus spent and has a lien on masts cut and hauled by a crew of which he is a member, under a statute which gives to log laborers a lien for personal services. McCrillis v. Wilson, 34 Me. 286, 56 Am. Rep. 655.

Under a statute declaring that "any person who shall do or perform any labor or services in cutting . . . sawing . . . into lumber . . . any logs" shall have a lien, it has been held that work done in repairing the machinery of a sawmill is of such a nature as to give a right to a lien. Engi v. Hardell, 123 Wis. 407, 100 N. W. 1046.

Where a statute provides that "every person performing labor upon, or who shall assist in obtaining or securing saw logs, spars, piles, cordwood, shingle bolts, or timber, . . . shall have a lien upon the same for work or labor done upon, or in obtaining or securing . . . the particular saw logs, spars, cordwood, shingle bolts, or other timber in said claim of him described" etc., laborers who cut and manufacture railroad ties in the woods are entitled to a lien. Forsberg v. Lundgren, 64 Wash. 427, 117 Pac. 244 (superseding Ryan v. Guilfoil, 13 Wash. 373, 43 Pac. 351).

A statute which provides that "every person performing labor upon or who shall assist in obtaining or securing saw logs, spars, piles, cord wood, shingle bolts, or other timber, and the owner or owners of any tugboat or towboat which shall tow or assist in towing, . . . and the owner . . . of any logging or other railroad over which saw logs . . . or other timber . . . shall be transported and delivered, shall have a lien upon the same" etc. has been held to apply to the labor of one who hauls timber products after they have been cut, and who does not use in doing the work a "tug boat," "towboat" "logging or other railroad." O'Brien v. Perfection Pile Preserving Co. 49 Wash. 395, 95 Pac. 489.

Under a statute which gives to laborers who perform work and labor a lien on the production of their labor, laborers who cut timber into logs and haul and place them on a mill skidway are entitled to a lien on the lumber made from the logs as their labor is part of the work necessary to change the timber into lumber. Klondike Lumber Co. v. Williams, 71 Ark. 334, 75 S. W. 854.

Under a statute which gives a lien to "every person doing the work of cutting or sawing logs into lumber" etc. it has been held that the following persons are entitled to a lien: a mill hand piling lumber; a mill hand inspecting lumber; and all others engaged in handling lumber at a sawmill, including the sawyer, the lumber stacker, the mill foreman, the slabman, the saw filer, the engineer for the mill engine, the fireman at the mill boiler, the lumber handler, the edgerman, the jacker and piler. Hogsed v. Gloucester Lumber Co. (N. C.) 87 S. E. 337, wherein it was also held that those who were engaged on a train hauling logs in a timber plant, such as the engineer thereon, the dogger on carriage, the fireman, conductor, and brakeman on the train, the night watchman, and all connected with the repairs of the machinery, or the running of the log train, or the bringing in of the logs to the mill, did not come within the words of the act and were not entitled to a lien.

It has been held that a person was not entitled to a lien on lumber manufactured at a sawmill where it appeared that he superintended the building of an addition to the mill and the installation of the machinery, and that later when the mill started operating he oversaw the keeping of the mill and machinery in repair when breakages occurred, unless he could separate the work done while the mill was in operation from that performed previous thereto. Glover v. Hynes Lumber Co. 94 Wis. 457, 69 N. W. 62.

And it has been held that where a statute gives a lien to those who furnish timber or other supplies to a sawmill a person who cuts and hauls logs, which he does not own, to a mill, is not entitled to a lien for his services. Kendall v. Davis, 52 Ga. 9. Balkcom v. Empire Lumber Co. 91 Ga. 651, 17 S. E. 1020, 44 Am. St. Rep. 58; Trapp v. Walters, 6 Ga. App. 480, 65 S. E. 306.

Under a statute which provides, in effect, that every person performing labor on, or who shall in any manner assist, in the manufacture of lumber shall have a lien on the lumber while it remains at the yard where it is manufactured, it has been held that where work is performed in, around and about a sawmill, and in some manner connected with and incidental to the converting of timber into lumber, those who do the work may claim a lien for their services. Alderson v. Lee, 52 Ore. 92, 96 Pac. 234.

Under a statute which declares "that any person or persons who perform any labor or services in manufacturing lumber or shingles, . . . shall have a lien thereon" and that "the word 'person' or 'persons' shall be interpreted to include cooks, blacksmiths, artisans, and all others usually employed in performing such labor and services," it has been held that one who furnishes shingle bands to bind manufactured shingles has a lien on the shingles for his services. Bass v. Williams, 73 Mich. 208, 41 N. W. 229.

Where a statute provides that "any person or persons who perform any labor or services in manufacturing lumber or shingles in or about any lumber or shingle mill, or in cutting, skidding, falling, hauling, scaling, banking, driving, running, rafting, or booming any logs, timber, cedar posts, telegraph poles, railroad ties, bark, shingle bolts, stave bolts, staves, cordwood, pulp wood, hop poles, hoop poles, veneering wood or any other forest products in this state, shall have a lien thereon for the amount due for such labor or services" etc., it has been held that no lien is given to a person who hauls the product into which logs and timber are manufactured from a mill yard to a railroad. Villeneuve v. Sines, 92 Mich. 556, 52 N. W. 1007. And under a statute of similar import the same rule was laid down in the case of McGeorge v. Stanton-De Long Lumber Co. 131 Wis. 7, 110 N. W. 788. See also Mitchell v. Page, 107 Me. 388, 78 Atl. 570. Compare the reported case. In McGeorge v. Stanton-De Long Lumber Co.

supra, the court said: "The language of the statute provides for a lien upon lumber 'material' for the labor of producing the same from saw logs. Otherwise no lien is given thereon. The complete process of manufacturing logs into lumber ordinarily includes the work of placing the lumber in the sawmill yard in piles but not that of transporting the same from the yard to market. Such process is ended at the point in the mill yard from which it is designed that the lumber shall be taken to enter into consumption."

It has been held that a blacksmith who works in a logging camp is entitled to a lien for his services equally with the lumbermen. Breault v. Archambault, 64 Minn. 420, 67 N. W. 348, 58 Am. St. Rep. 545, wherein the court said: "It is evident that a cook or a blacksmith is as essential to a logging crew as is the man who swings an ax or drives a team, and it is also evident that both perform manual labor. If the ax man or the teamster was compelled to leave his work, and spend two hours of each day in preparing his own food, or in shoeing his horses, or repairing his sled or tools, would it be suggested that his time while so engaged should be deducted from his day's work, and a lien allowed for the balance only? We believe that no one would think of asserting such a proposition. And, if this be so, why should a person who renders these services, but performs no other, be declared outside of the statute, and thus deprived of a lien? The camp cook and the blacksmith are part of the crew whose business it is to cut and bank logs. They do not personally and directly engage in the work of cutting the logs or in handling them, but it is absolutely necessary that the men personally and directly engaged be furnished with food, that the animals be shod, that the sleds be kept repaired, and the tools be sharpened and kept in order." In Glazener v. Gloucester Lumber Co. 167 N. C. 676, 83 S. E. 696, however, it was held that a blacksmith employed at a lumber plant whose duties were to make repairs from time to time on the cars which were used to haul out logs from the woods, and to make necessary repairs, in the way of blacksmithing, on the sawmill machinery, was not entitled to a lien under a statute which gave a lien to every person who did the work of cutting or sawing logs into lumber.

It has been held that one who worked for a railroad company, building and helping in repairing its railway, which was constructed to transport the timber felled in its territory, and which was moved, as the timber disappeared, from place to place, had no lien for his services on logs which were carried on the railroad. Carpenter v. Mc-

Cord Lumber Co. 107 Wis. 611, 83 N. W. 764. Nor is one who does repair work on a railroad track and bridge over which a logging train is run entitled to a lien on the lumber which is cut at a sawmill from the logs brought in by such train, under a statute which gives a lien to all those who do the work of "cutting or sawing logs into lumber." Glazener v. Gloucester Lumber Co. 167 N. C. 676, 83 S. E. 696.

One who does work consisting in driving piles and building docks and tramways for permanent use in connection with a sawmill, which structures are necessary to the business of the mill, has no claim to a lien on the product of the mill for such services, under a statute which provides that "any person who shall do or perform any labor or services in cutting, felling, hauling, running," etc., "or manufacturing into lumber, any logs," etc., shall have a lien on such logs and lumber. Kendall v. Hynes Lumber Co. 96 Wis. 659, 71 N. W. 1039. And it has been held that a person who furnishes a cable and boom chains for logging operations, and also does work shoeing horses which are used in such operations has no lienable claim on the logs for his services. Braeger v. Bolster, 60 Wash. 579, 111 Pac. 797.

Where a statute gives a right to boom companies duly incorporated to take possession of logs which come down a stream and requires that the logs then taken possession of shall be inspected and scaled under the supervision of a state surveyor it has been held that he may by statute be given a lien on the logs of private persons for performing such services. Lindsay, etc. Co. v. Mullen, 176 U. S. 126, 20 S. Ct. 325, 44 U. S. (L. ed.) 400.

A New York statute, entitled "Artisans' Lien on Personal Property," provides that "a person who makes, alters, repairs, or in any way enhances the value of an article of personal property, at the request or with the consent of the owner, has a lien on such article, while lawfully in possession thereof, for his reasonable charges for the work done and material furnished, and may retain possession thereof until such charges are paid." Under that statute it has been held that one who cuts, skids and draws logs has no lien thereon for his services, as the acts refer only to skilled labor as distinguished from common labor, and for the further reason that the law applies to personal property only and not to trees, the cutting of which does not constitute a making, altering, or repairing of an article of personal property. O'Clair v. Hale, 25 Misc. 31, 54 N. Y. S. 386 (affirmed in O'Clair v. Hale, 35 App. Div. 77, 54 N. Y. S. 388, on the ground that the lienor had not proved such possession as would entitle him to a lien under the statute). To the same effect see Brackett v. Pierson, 114 App. Div. 281, 99 N. Y. S. 770.

2. EMPLOYEE OF CONTRACTOR.

In a few cases, some of which are of no present authority because of statutory amendments (see statements after cases set out infra) it has been held that a person who performs labor on logs is not entitled to a lien thereon for his services where he is in the employ of a person who is doing the work under a contract with the owner of the logs. Thus it has been held that laborers employed by one who has a contract with the owner of logs to "drive" them down a stream have no right to a lien on the logs by virtue of a statute which provides "that laborers and contractors, contracting and engaging to cut, raft or sell logs or timber of any kind, or to perform any labor in connection with the sale and delivery of any such logs or timber, shall have a first lien on such logs or timber." etc. Wright v. Terry, 23 Fla. 160, 2 So. 6. To the same effect see Landry v. Blanchard, 16 La. Ann. 173. And where a statute gives a lien to "any person who labors at cutting, hauling . . . logs or lumber . . . for his personal services" etc., a laborer who works on logs for a contractor and who has no agreement direct with the owner of the logs has no lien thereon for his services. Jacobs v. Knapp, 50 N. H. 71. (But see N. H. Public Statutes, 1901 p. 452, sec. 13.) So where a statute creates a lien in favor of "every person performing labor upon, or who shall assist in obtaining or securing saw logs, piling, railroad ties, . . . whether such work or labor was done at the instance of the owner of the same or his agent," one who is employed to do work of the kind mentioned in the act by a person who stands in the relation of a contractor to the owner of the logs is not entitled to a lien. Lane v. Lane Potter Lumber Co. 40 Mont. 541, 107 Pac. 898. (But see Mont. Laws 1909, p. 66.)

On the other hand, it has been held, in a number of cases, under statutes variously worded, that a log laborer is entitled to a lien for his services even though the services are furnished through a contractor. Klondike Lumber Co. v. Williams, 71 Ark. 334, 75 S. W. 854; Allen v. Roper, 75 Ark. 104, 86 S. W. 836; Sattes, etc. Lumber Co. v. Hales, 11 Ga. App. 569, 75 S. E. 898; Doe v. Monson, 33 Me. 430; Reilly v. Stephenson, 62 Mich. 509, 29 N. W. 99; King v. Kelly, 25 Minn. 522; Munger v. Lenroot, 32 Wis. 541. See also Kendall v. Davis, 52 Ga. 9; Trapp v. Watters, 6 Ga. App. 480, 65 S. E. 306. In Munger v. Lenroot, supra, the court said: "The statute is founded upon the equitable principle that the laborer who, by his services, has imparted additional value to property of this kind, shall have a lien upon it for his reasonable charges. His right to the lien does not depend upon the fact that he was employed by the general owner of the property to perform labor upon it; but he has a lien when hired by a contractor. So far as the general owner is concerned, if he does not himself employ the laborer, the proceeding is strictly in rem. Where the laborer is employed by one not the general owner, as in the case before us, the proceeding has a double aspect, to enforce the personal liability of the debtor as well as to enforce a lien given by the statute. This law requires that the person or corporation liable for the payment of the debt shall be the defendant in the action; but I think the legislature did not intend to restrict the lien to the case where the general owner hired the laborer and was himself personally liable for the services. If this were the intention of the statute then it is very apparent that many cases would arise where the laborer would have no lien, because not employed by the general owner, but by a contractor. I have no doubt, therefore, that the legislature intended by the first section to give the lien absolutely to the laborer, regardless of the question whether he had rendered the services under a contract with the general owner or not."

II. Services of Contractor.

There is some authority to the effect that a person who takes a contract to do logging work but who does no physical work himself is entitled to a lien for his services. Thus it has been held that an independent contractor is entitled to a lien even though the actual work is done by laborers whom he hires, under a statute which provides that "any person or persons who performs any labor or services . . . shall have a lien" etc. Shaw v. Bradley, 59 Mich. 199, 26 N. W. 331; Phillips v. Freyer, 80 Mich. 254, 45 N. W. 81, overruling Kieldsen v. Wilson, 77 Mich. 45, 43 N. W. 1054; Carver v. Bagley, 79 Mich. 114, 81 N. W. 757. In Shaw v. Bradley, supra, the court said: "It is first claimed that an independent contractor is not entitled to a lien, under the provisions of this act, under any circumstances. But what is meant by an 'independent contractor'?" As applied to the facts as disclosed by this record, I suppose it must refer to a party who enters into a contract with the owner of the property to drive and deliver the logs, cedar posts and telegraph poles for an agreed compensation. Such a contractor, in my opinion, is within the very terms of the law giving a lien to any person who may perform any labor or services in banking, driving, or running any logs, timber, cedar posts, or telegraph poles in the state, for the amount due for such labor or services. There must be a contract, express or implied, to support a lien; and it never arises, unless by express provision of the statute, where no contract relations exist. The language of the statute, 'that any person or persons that perform any labor or services in cutting,' etc., under the common application of the maxim, 'qui per alium facit, per seipsum facere videtur,' is legally applicable to the general contractor having servants or sub-laborers under him."

And under a statute which provides that "all persons hauling stocks, logs, or lumber with teams for another person shall have a lien against the personalty so hauled by them, to the extent of the amount of the indebtedness if by contract, and to the extent of the value of the services so rendered if the price to be paid for the same is not agreed upon," it has been held that a person who hauls logs for another, using laborers to do the actual physical work, is entitled to a lien. Bruton v. Beasley, 135 Ga. 412, 69 S. E. 561.

However, in other cases, it has been held that one who takes a contract to do logging works and who does no physical work himself is not entitled to a lien on the logs or lumber for the value of the services he renders. Klondike Lumber Co. v. Williams, 71 Ark. 334, 75 S. W. 854; Campbell v. Sterling Mfg. Co. 11 Wash. 204, 39 Pac. 451; Dallaire v. Gauthier, 24 Quebec Super. Ct. 495. Compare Desantels v. McClellan, 30 West L. Rep. 485, 7 West W. Rep. 1221. The fact that a contractor does some physical work himself on the logs and lumber does not give him a lien under a statute which provides that "whoever labors at cutting, hauling, . . . logs or lumber . . . has a lien" etc. Littlefield v. Morrill, 97 Me. 505, 54 Atl. 1109, 94 Am. St. Rep. 513. So the same effect under a statute of similar import see Baxter v. Kennedy, 35 N. Bruns. 179. In Littlefield v. Morrill, supra, the court said: "It is true, these plaintiffs performed some physical labor and also used their own teams to some extent on these logs and lumber, but they did so under the direction of an employer and for mere wages. They had not merely hired out their personal labor. They had taken a contract to cut and haul all the logs on the tract, and were independent in their method of doing it, and were carrying out their contract largely through the labor of others employed by them. They were contractors engaged in a business enterprise from which they expected profits which might be more or less according to circumstances. They were not mere laborers working for fixed wages the rate of which would not be varied by circumstances.

When they labored themselves it was not for wages, but to increase profits by saving wages."

Under a statute providing that "whenever . . . any laborer . . . may labor or perform any services in any . . . mill . . . by virtue of any contract or agreement . . . the . . . employees shall have a first lien upon all products, machinery . . . or things of whatsoever character that may be created in whole or in part by the labor of such person," etc., it has been held that where a contract was made to haul logs at a stipulated price per thousand feet and the work was done with teams and personal labor, the contractor was not entitled to a lien for his services as the statute did not give a lien for the services of the teams and the evidence did not show what the value of his personal services were. Sparks v. Crescent Lumber Co. 40 Tex. Civ. App. 222, 89 S. W. 423; Jackson v. Downs (Tex.) 149 S. W. 286.

III. Services of Team.

Under a statute which provides that "whoever performs manual labor or other personal service for hire, in or in aid of the cutting, hauling, banking, driving, rafting, towing, cribbing or booming, any logs . . . shall have a lien thereon for the price or value of such labor or service" it has been held that one who lets teams for logging services to a person for an agreed price per month and who does no labor himself on the logs has no lienable rights thereon. McKinnon v. Red River Lumber Co. 119 Minn. 479, 138 N. W. 781, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 872; Kenny v. Duluth Log Co. 128 Minn. 5, 150 N. W. 216. To the same effect under similar statutes, see Richardson v. Hoxie, 90 Me. 227, 38 Atl. 142; McMullin v. McMullin, 92 Me. 336, 42 Atl. 500, 69 Am. St. Rep. 510; Mabie v. Sines, 92 Mich. 545, 52 N. W. 1007; Lohman v. Peterson, 87 Wis. 227, 58 N. W. 407; Edwards v. H. B. Waite Lumber Co. 108 Wis. 164, 84 N. W. 150, 81 Am. St. Rep. 884; Rheume v. Batiscan River Lumber Co. 23 Quebec Super. Ct. 166; Muller v. Shibley, 13 British Columbia 343; Hunt v. Panhandle Lumber Co. 66 Wash. 645, 120 Pac. 538.

By virtue of a statute which provides that "any person who may do or perform any manual labor in cutting, banking, driving," etc., "any logs or timber in this state, shall have a lien thereon . . . for the amount due for such services," it has been held that a person who furnishes teams to work in a logging operation and who also does work himself, is entitled to a lien for the value of the services rendered by the teams. Martin v. Wakefield, 42 Minn. 176, 43 N. W. 966, 6 L.R.A. 362 To the same effect see Klondike Lumber Co. v. Williams, 71 Ark. 334, 75 S. W. 854. And the right to claim a lien is conferred on one who is only a bailee of the team at the time he hires out its services. Kelley v. Kelley, 77 Me. 135.

Under the Minnesota statute it has been held that even though a person who furnishes teams for logging work does no work himself, he is entitled to a lien if he furnishes his own teamsters with his teams. Breault v. Archambault, 64 Minn. 420, 67 N. W. 348, 58 Am. St. Rep. 545. To the same effect under a statute of similar import see Hogan v. Cushing, 49 Wis. 169, 5 N. W. 490. In Breault v. Archambault, supra, the court said: "As before stated, the plaintiff in the Lane case furnished, at the request of the contractors, two teams, and two teamsters to care for and drive the teams, at a gross price per month for each team and teamster. If plaintiff had driven these teams, the case would be covered by that of Martin v. Wakefield, supra, in which it was held that, when a man and team were employed at a gross price for both, his lien on the logs extended to the use of the team. But the difference is that plaintiff Lane performed no manual labor personally, all being done by the hired teamsters. But we cannot assent to defendants' contention that there is a marked distinction between the cases. Plaintiff was acting through her servants, and the terms of the statute, under the application of the maxim, 'he who acts through another acts himself,' are logically applicable to one who provides teams with which to haul logs, and men to drive the teams, as did the plaintiff Mrs. Lane."

The case of Hale v. Brown, 59 N. H. 551, 47 Am. Rep. 224, which took a contrary view was decided under a statute which had been amended and the court intimated that its decision would have been otherwise if the amended statute had been in effect at the time the claim in suit arose. And two early Maine decisions which also took a contrary view have been made nugatory by a later statute. See McCrillis v. Wilson, 34 Me. 286, 56 Am. Dec. 655; Coburn v. Kerswell, 35 Me. 126.

IV. Miscellaneous.

It has been held that a cook and his assistant who prepare the food for the workmen at a logging camp are entitled to a lien for their wages. Breault v. Archambault, 64 Minn. 420, 67 N. W. 348, 58 Am. St. Rep. 545; Young v. French, 35 Wis. 111; Winslow v. Urquhart, 39 Wis. 260. But the lien is given only to one who cooks the food for the loggers where the provisions are furnished by the employer and so cannot be claimed by one who makes a contract with a company engaged in logging operations to furnish board for the workmen at a stated price per boarder. Akers v. Lord, 67 Wash. 179, 121 Pac. 51; Bradford v. Underwood Lumber Co. 80 Wis. 50, 48 N. W. 1105. See also Polan v. Cain, 59 Wash. 259, 109 Pac. 1009. In Akers v. Lord, supra, the court said: "The statute provides: 'The cook in a logging camp shall be regarded as a person who assists in obtaining or securing the timber herein mentioned.' The only item recognized by this statute is one for labor performed and services rendered. The cook, to the extent that he renders service as a cook, is entitled to a lien; but when he steps outside of his cook-house and ceases to labor for wages, and becomes a boarding-housekeeper, furnishing all the material and supplies, he is no longer within the purview of the statute, any more than any other laborer who furnishes necessary chains, ropes, tackle, or rigging for use in the logging operation, can claim a lien for the cost of such material. The statute limits the lien to labor performed and service rendered, and eliminates supplies and materials furnished, however necessary they may have been to the work engaged in."

It has been held, however, that one who boarded workmen engaged in getting out railroad ties, at a hotel some miles from the place where they were working, was entitled to a lien under an early statute (since nullified) which gave a lien to those who furnished supplies to logging camps. Kellock v. Parcher, 52 Wis. 393, 9 N. W. 67.

Under a statute providing that "whoever labors at cutting, hauling, rafting or driving logs or lumber, or at cooking for persons engaged in such labor, . . . has a lien on the logs and lumber for the amount due for his personal services" and that "such liens . . . may be enforced by attachment" it has been held that a wife who brings an action for wages against her husband for her services as cook for him and others engaged in logging operation has no enforceable contract on account of her coverture and therefore no enforceable lien on the logs. Mott v. Mott, 107 Me. 481, 78 Atl. 900.

It has been held that a company authorized under its charter to improve a river for the purpose of facilitating the running of logs, lumber, timber, etc., and after spending at least five thousand dollars for the purpose, to collect tolls at a fixed rate on all logs, lumber, etc., floated down the river, for which and "for any other services" the company is to have a lien, has a lien on logs for the services of the company's foreman and men who assist another logger in getting his logs into a general drive as they pass down a river. Yellow River Imp. Co. v. Arnold, 46 Wis. 214, 49 N. W. 971.

Where an amendment to a general statute makes provision for the preventing of jams or obstructions above booms whenever navigation may be affected, and the general statute empowers "any person, company, or corporation" to perform the service which an owner of logs has neglected and which has resulted in a jam of logs, it has been held that a boom company has a lienable claim on logs for services rendered in preventing a jam of the logs above the booms as well as at the head or alongside of the booms. Hall v. Tittabawassee Boom Co. 51 Mich. 377, 16 N. W. 770.

BIRD

v.

STATE.

Georgia Supreme Court—October 14, 1914.)

142 Ga. 596; 83 S. E. 238.

Grand Jury — Power to Reassemble after Discharge.

Where a grand jury had been properly drawn, summoned, and impaneled to serve during a term of court continuing two weeks, and, having completed their work at or near the end of the first week, were discharged by the court for the term, and on the day following their discharge a homicide was committed in the county in which the court was being held, and the court by appropriate written order directed the sheriff and regular bailiffs sworn at the term of the court then being held to resubmon the same grand jury to reconvene during the second week of the court, for the purpose of investigating the case of the person charged with the murder of the person killed, and also to take into consideration any other matter that might legally come before the grand jury during the term, such reconvening of the grand jury was legal, and an indictment properly found by them against such person was also legal.

The order of the court reconvening the grand jury, after they had been discharged, had the effect of abrogating the former order of discharge.

[See note at end of this case.]

Continuance — Denial Held Proper.

Under the facts of this case, there was no abuse of discretion in overruling the motion for a continuance.

Jury — Qualification of Jury — Loan to Assist Prosecution.

One who loans money to another for the purpose of paying counsel to assist the solicitor general in the prosecution of a case of the state against one charged with murder is not disqualified to serve as a juror on the trial of such a case, where it does not appear that the juror has any interest in the prosecution or is otherwise disqualified.

Instructions — Requests Covered by General Charge.

The requests to charge the jury were substantially covered by the general charge of the court, and it was not error to decline them.

Homicide — Instructions — Offenses to Be Submitted.

Under the evidence in this case, voluntary and involuntary manslaughter were not involved, and the court did not err in failing to charge the jury the law applicable thereto.

Trial — Misconduct of Counsel — Necessity of Objection.

Where complaint is made that the solicitor general, during the trial of the case, indulged in improper remarks to the jury, but no objection was made thereto at the time, and no ruling was invoked, this will not require a new trial. Herndon v. State, 111 Ga. 178 (3) 181 (36 S. E. 634).

[Ann. Cas. 1916A 551.]

Verdict Sustained.

The remaining assignments of error are without substantial merit. The verdict is supported by the evidence.

(Syllabus by court.)

Error to Superior Court, Jasper county: PARK, Judge.

Criminal action. Will Bird convicted of murder and brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

A. Y. Clement, B. F. Leverette and H. T. Pope for plaintiff in error.

Warren Grice and Joseph E. Pottle for defendant in error.

[597] HILL, J.—Will Bird was indicted for the offense of murder, and the jury returned a verdict against him, without recommendation. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and he excepted.

1. Upon being arraigned in the court below the defendant filed his plea in statement to the indictment, alleging that because of the facts therein averred the indictment was illegal and void and wanting in the essential features of a legal indictment, by reason of the following: The February term, 1914, of Jasper superior court convened on the third Monday in February, 1914, being the 10th day of the month, and the grand jury regularly selected, chosen, and sworn for that term completed their work and return their presentments and recommendations into court, and were discharged for the term on Friday, February 20, 1914. On Saturday night, February 21, the homicide for which the defendant was indicted was [598] committed. The superior court of Jasper county may hold for two weeks, under the law. It being in session the second week, the presiding judge, on Wednesday, February 25, recalled the 21 members of the grand jury which had been discharged on Friday of the previous week, for the purpose of considering the return of an indictment against the defendant. It was alleged, that the grand jurors who returned the indictment were not legally drawn, summoned, or impaneled to investigate the case, but the presiding judge instructed the sheriff of Jasper county to summon the grand jurors who had been discharged for the term on Friday of the previous week to appear at court on Wednesday, February 25, for the purpose of taking action on the homicide which occurred since their discharge; that the jurors thus notified by telephone or verbal message assembled on the 25th, during the second week of court, and, without being sworn or taking the oath required to be administered to grand jurors, proceeded to return the indictment against defendant; that after the grand jury had been discharged it ceased to exist as the grand jury for the February term, 1914, of Jasper superior court, and the jurors had no legal right or power to return an indictment after their discharge; that section 866 of the Penal Code contemplates and requires that where the superior court is held for a longer term than one week, as in the case of Jasper superior court, the presiding judge shall draw separate panels of grand jurors for each week, if the public interest, in his opinion, requires a grand jury's services for more than one week, which requirement was not observed in the instant case; that a compliance with the requirements prescribed by law as to the selection, summoning, and swearing of grand jurors before they enter upon their service as such jurors is essential to constitute a legal grand jury, otherwise they are not legally qualified to act; and that the mere fact that the 21 men who returned the indictment had been grand jurors for the February term of court until they were discharged for the term did not ipso facto qualify them to act in the present case without being again selected, summoned, and sworn, for that their functions and qualifications as grand jurors for the February term, 1914, of Jasper superior court expired and ceased instantly upon their discharge for the term. An oral demurrer to this plea was sustained, and the defendant excepted. The order of the court (which by consent was considered a part of the plea) directed the sheriff and regular bailiffs [509] sworn at the February term of court to re-summon the grand jury to reconvene on February 25, 1914, "for the purpose of investigating the case of the State v. Will Bird, charged with the offense of murder. . . . And also to take into consideration any other matter that may legally come before during the present term of the court."

The exact question here raised seems never to have been decided by this court. But in several outside jurisdictions we find decisions directly in point. In State v. Reid, 20 Ia. 413 (7), it was held that "The district court has power to recall a grand jury to pass upon offenses committed after their discharge and before the adjournment of the term." See also the body of the opinion on pages 422-423, where the statement of the case by Wright, J., shows it to be very similar to the instant one as to the discharge of the grand jury and the reconvening of it. In Wilson v. State, 32 Tex. 112, a grand jury, after serving about two weeks, was discharged by order of the court. At a subsequent day of the same court the same persons who composed the grand jury were reassembled in court; and the court by order set aside its former order discharging the grand jury, and directed them to proceed to the discharge of their duties as originally charged. The indictment in this case was for murder committed at a time between the discharge of the grand jury and its reorganization, and was found by the grand jury after being so reorganized. It was held "that there was no error in the proceedings, and the indictment was found by a lawful grand jury." See, to the same effect, Newman v. State, 43 Tex. 525; Long v. State, 46 Ind. 582. In Green v. State, 60 Fla. 22, 53 So. 610, it was held that "A grand jury that has been discharged or dismissed may be recalled and reassembled during the same term of the court, and indictments then properly returned by them are valid; and it is not necessary in such a case for the judge to make a formal order vacating his order discharging such grand jury, since the order recalling them is tantamount to a vacation of the order discharging them." See also Cannon v. State, 62 Fla. 20 57 So. 240; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 1298; 20 Cyc. 1324.

We think the court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the plea in abatement. This ruling is based on the inherent power of the court to hold the organization of the court intact until the end of the term. Where the grand jury is properly drawn, summoned, [600] and impaneled for the term, the court may require them to serve for the term. And if they are discharged before the end of the term, the court may by appropriate order, as was done in this case, reconvoke them to appear and serve until the end of the term, or for any specified period within that term, and such order will be considered as a vacation of the discharge of the jury. No allegation is made that the jurors resummoned were not the same as those who had been previously drawn, summoned and impaneled, or that they were for any reason otherwise disqualified from serving a grand jurors.

2. Headnotes 2 to 7, inclusive, require no elaboration. The assignments of error not specially dealt with are without substantial merit. The verdict is supported by the evidence.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

NOTE.

Power of Court to Reassemble Discharged Grand Jury.

The purpose of this note is to consider the recent cases passing on the power of a court to reassemble a discharged grand jury. The earlier cases are reviewed in the notes to Haynes v. State, 17 Ann. Cas. 653, and Com. v. Green, 12 Am. St. Rep. 894, 904.

The recent cases are unanimous in holding that a court has power to reassemble a discharged grand jury at any time during the term. Green v. State, 60 Fla. 22, 53 So. 610, 615; People v. McCauley, 256 Ill. 504, 100 N. E. 182; Hayes v. State, 93 Miss. 670, 17 Ann. Cas. 653, 47 So. 522. See also Blakely's Petition, 23 Pa. Dist. 221. And see the reported case. In Cannon v. State, 62 Fla. 20, 57 So. 240, the court said: "In the case of Green v. State, 60 Fla. 22, 53 So. 610, we have held that a grand jury that has been discharged or dismissed may be recalled and reassembled during the term of the court, and that indictments then properly returned by them are valid." In State v. Heft, 148 Ia. 617, 127 N. W. 830, it was held that the court has power not only to reassemble a discharged grand jury but to reassemble the whole panel and select a new jury. The court said: "The court had equal power for proper reasons to recall the entire panel and to order a redrawing of a grand jury therefrom. This was so held in State v. Hughes, 58 Ia. 165; State v. Disbrow, 130 Ia. 19. Somewhat analogous also is State v. Hart, 87 Ia. 142. The general reasons underlying these cases are that the trial court has full power to discharge the grand jury for the term. It may also during the term set aside such order and recall the same grand jury. It has like power to let the order of discharge stand and to recall the grand jury panel and to select a new grand jury therefrom." In People v. McCauley, 256 Ill. 504, 100 N. E. 182, it was held that a grand jury when reassembled could consider any matter presented to it.

But in Braxley v. State, 143 Ga. 658, 85 S. E. 888, it was held that a grand jury once discharged cannot be reassembled after the expiration of the term of the court. It was said: "On the doctrine of Bird v. State, supra, the Court of Appeals recognizes that, if the court had not finally adjourned for the term the grand jury could be reconvened, but asks the question on the basis that the court had adjourned for the term. . . .

There is no express provision of law authorizing a judge of the superior court out of term time to call together persons who were grand jurors at a former term, so, as to act as grand juries, except at a special term. Civil Code, sec. 4876."

In U. S. v. Philadelphia, etc. R. Co. 227 Fed. 206, it was held that a grand jury which has been relieved from service provisionally can be recalled to duty during the same term of the court. The court said: "Upon the challenge to the array, Judge Dickenson held that he had not discharged the grand jury, so as to terminate its existence as a grand jury, and refused to sustain the challenge to the array, and, having them then in court before him, held that no other mandate was required to bring them into court. This was in effect an order at that time that they be recalled forthwith and proceed with their sessions."

And in Leech v. State, 63 Tex. Crim. 339, 139 S. W. 1147, wherein it appeared that a grand jury adjourned for one week with permission of the court, it was held that the court had power to reassemble the members thereof on the very day of the adjournment, the court saying: "Article 411, Code Criminal Procedure, provides: 'When a grand jury has been discharged by the court for the term, it may be reassembled by the court at any time during the term, and in case of a failure of one or more of the members to reassemble, the court may complete the panel by impaneling other qualified persons in their stead, in accordance with the rules prescribed in this chapter for completing the grand jury, in the first instance.' . . . It is our opinion that the grand jury, which did indict appellant, was the legally constituted grand jury of the District Court of El Paso County, at the time of the indictment; that the court and judge thereof had the power and authority to reassemble or reconvene the grand jury at the time it did."

MALIN ET AL.

LAMOURE COUNTY.

North Dakota Supreme Court—February 16, 1914.

27 N. Dak. 140; 145 N. W. 582.

Taxes — Probate or Administration Fee — Validity.

Chapter 119 of the Laws of 1909, which is entitled "An act to amend section 2589 of the Revised Codes of 1905, relating to the fees of county court," and which provides for an initial fee of $5 and an additional charge of $5 for each and every $1,000, or fraction thereof, in excess of the first $1,000 on the value of the estates, to be paid by the petitioner for letters testamentary, of administration, or of guardianship, is unconstitutional, in so far as the additional charge or fee of $5 for each and every $1,000, or fraction thereof, in excess of the first $1,000 is concerned, and violates section 11, art. 1, of the Constitution of North Dakota, which provides that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation" section 22, art. 1, which provides that "all courts shall be open, and every man for any injury done to him in his lands, goods, person, or reputation shall have remedy by due process of law, and right and justice administered without sale, denial or delay," section 61, art. 2, which provides that "no bill shall embrace more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title," etc., section 175, art. 11, which provides that "no tax shall be levied except in pursuance of law, and every law imposing a tax shall state distinctly the object of the same, to which only it shall be applied," and section 176, art. 11, which provides that "laws shall be passed taxing by uniform rule all property according to its true money value in money." The same is true of section 2589, Rev. Codes 1905, being chapter 87 of the Laws of 1905, and of chapter 127 of the Laws of 1913, and in so far as the fee or charge of $5 for each and every $1,000, or fraction thereof, in excess of the first $1,000 is concerned. Chapter 66 of the Laws of 1903 and section 2071 of the Revised Codes of 1899, being chapter 50 of the Laws of 1899, however, are invalid even as to the initial fee of $5, as such is not imposed upon all estates equally, but according to the value thereof. They are necessarily equally invalid as to the added fee of $5 for every $1,000 additional value.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The fees or charges provided for in chapter 119 of the Laws of 1909 are not inheritance taxes or analogous thereto. An inheritance tax is a tax or charge upon the privilege of succeeding to or inheriting property, and is paid out of that which is inherited, while the charges in question are levied, not only upon the estate as a whole, whether solvent or insolvent, but upon the estates of wards and incompetents.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Such charges cannot be regarded as mere court costs, as they are in no way proportionate to or based upon the work performed or the services rendered.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

They are taxes upon the property rather than taxes upon or charges for a privilege. As such they are invalid, as they are not levied according to the true value of such property, or to the uniform rule which is adopted in regard to similar property.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Section 22, art. 1, of the Constitution of North Dakota, which provides that "all courts shall be open, and any man for any injury done him in his lands, goods, or reputation shall have remedy by due process of law, and right and justice administered without sale, denial, or delay," is aimed, not merely against bribery and the direct selling of justice by magistrates and officials, but against the imposition of unreasonable restraints upon and charges for the use of the courts.

[See note at end of this case.]

Recovery Back of Invalid Tax — Payment under Protest.

Such charges, having in the case at bar been demanded of the plaintiff by an officer acting under color of law, and for public services which the plaintiff was entitled to have performed, and having been paid under written protest and under circumstances where injury to the estate and to third parties would have resulted from a refusal to pay such fees and a resort to legal remedies to compel the performance of the official duties, were paid under compulsion and duress, and can be recovered from the county upon a proper showing being made.

Statutes. — Partial Invalidity.

Where a part of a statute is unconstitutional, that fact does not require the courts to declare the remainder void also, unless all the provisions are connected in subject matter depending upon each other, operating together for the same purpose, or otherwise so connected together in meaning that it cannot be presumed the legislature would have passed the one without the other.

Taxes — Administration Fees — Validity.

A requirement for reasonable court fees will be sustained, and is not unconstitutional as being a denial or sale of justice, provided that the fee is reasonable, is uniform in its application, and has some reasonable connection with the services rendered. The portions of the statute before considered, therefore, which provide for an initial fee of $5, and for the expenditures for publishing and sending out notices, are valid, and are sustained.

[See note at end of this case.]

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, LaMoure county: COFFEY, Judge.

Action to recover money paid as statutory probate fees. A. B. Malin et al., administrators, etc., plaintiffs, County of LaMoure, defendant, and State Tax Commission intervenor. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. AFFIRMED.

[142] The plaintiffs herein as administrators of the estate of Gottlieb J. Dobler, deceased, paid under protest to the county treasurer of LaMoure county the statutory probate fees, amounting in the case to $335, and prescribed by § 2589, Rev. Codes 1905, as amended by chapter 119 of the Laws of 1909, and thereafter brought this action in the district court of LaMoure county to recover the sum so paid, alleging in their complaint that the act under which the same was paid was unconstitutional. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint and overruled. From the order overruling this demurrer this appeal is taken.

[143] Chapter 119 of the Laws of 1909 reads as follows: "An Act to Amend § 2589 of the Revised Codes of 1905, Relating to the Fees of County Court. Be it enacted by the legislative assembly of the state of North Dakota: § 1. Amendment Section 2589 of the Revised Codes of 1905 of the state of North Dakota is hereby amended to read as follows: § 2589. County to be Reimbursed. How. For the purpose of reimbursing the county for the salaries provided in the foregoing sections to be paid the judges of county courts, each petitioner for letters testamentary, or administration or guardianship, before filing the same in the county court, shall pay or cause to be paid into the county treasury, for the use and benefit of the county in whose county court proceedings are to be instituted to settle the estate of a deceased person or for the appointment of a guardian, the sum of five dollars, and when the value of said estate has been ascertained by the court, through the inventory and appraisement or upon hearing of same, as legally required, within thirty days after the issuance of letters testamentary, administration or guardianship, the judge of said court shall require an additional fee to be paid from said estate into said county treasury, of five dollars for each and every one thousand dollars or fraction thereof, in excess of the first one thousand dollars of value therein found, as shown by said inventory and appraisement, and in all cases in addition thereto, all sums necessarily expended in publishing or serving notices required by law. In all civil and criminal actions the same fees and costs shall be paid as in like actions in the district court, the same to be paid to the clerk of the county court, a record to be kept thereof, and the same turned over by him to the county treasurer."

Chapter 66 of the Laws of 1903 (§ 2589 of the Revised Codes of 1905), which chapter 119 of the Laws of 1909 amends, is as follows: "An Act to Amend § 2071 of the Revised Codes of 1899, Relating to Reimbursing Counties for Salaries Paid to Judges of County Courts. Be it enacted by the legislative assembly of the state of North Dakota: § 1. Amendment Section 2071 of the Revised Codes of 1899, Relating to Reimbursing Counties for Salaries Paid to Judges of County Courts. Be it enacted by the legislative assembly of the state of North Dakota: § 1. Amendment Section 2071 of the Revised Codes of 1899, relating to reimbursing counties for salaries paid to judges of county courts, is hereby amended so as to read as follows: § 2071. County to be Reimbursed. How. For the purpose of reimbursing the county for the salaries provided in the foregoing sections to be paid to the judges of [144] the county courts, each petitioner for letters testamentary, of administration or guardianship, before filing the same in the county court, shall pay or cause to be paid into the county treasury, for the use and benefit of the county in whose county court proceedings are to be instituted to settle the estate of any deceased person, or for the appointment of a guardian, a sum of money according to the value of the estate of such deceased person, or of such ward, as appears from the sworn statement in the petition of such applicant: Five dollars when the value of the estate does not exceed one thousand dollars; five dollars additional for each and every thousand dollars additional value thereto; and in all cases in addition thereto, all sums necessarily expended in publishing or serving notices required by law. In all civil and criminal actions the same fees and costs shall be paid as in like actions in the district court, the same to be paid to the judge of the county court, a record to be kept thereof and the same turned over by him to the county treasurer."

Assembly of the state of North Dakota: § 1 Amendment, Section 2071 of the Revised Codes of 1899, relating to reimbursing counties for salaries paid to judges of county courts, is hereby amended so as to read as follows: § 2071. County to be Reimbursed. How. For the purpose of reimbursing the county for the salaries provided in the foregoing sections to be paid to the judges of [144] the county courts, each petitioner for letters testamentary, of administration or guardianship, before filing the same in the county court, shall pay or cause to be paid into the county treasury, for the use and benefit of the county in whose county court proceedings are to be instituted to settle the estate of any deceased person, or for the appointment of a guardian, a sum of money according to the value of the estate of such deceased person, or of such ward, as appears from the sworn statement in the petition of such applicant: Five dollars when the value of the estate does not exceed one thousand dollars; five dollars additional for each and every thousand dollars additional value thereto; and in all cases in addition thereto, all sums necessarily expended in publishing or serving notices required by law. In all civil and criminal actions the same fees and costs shall be paid as in like actions in the district court, the same to be paid to the judge of the county court, a record to be kept thereof and the same turned over by him to the county treasurer."

Section 2071 of the Revised Codes of 1899, which is amended by chapter 66 of the Laws of 1903, is but a restatement of § 4 of chapter 50 of the Laws of 1890, which section is as follows: "Section 4. How County Treasurer to be Reimbursed. For the purpose of reimbursing the county treasurer for the salaries provided in the foregoing sections to be paid to the judges of the county courts, each petitioner for letters testamentary, administration or of guardianship, before filing the same in the county court, shall pay or cause to be paid into the county treasury, for the use and benefit of the county in whose county court proceedings are to be instituted to settle the estate of any deceased person or for the appointment of a guardian, the following sums, according to the value of the estate of such deceased person or [for the value of the estate of such deceased person or] of such ward, as appears by the sworn statement in the petition of such applicant, that is to say: Five (5) dollars when the value of such estate does not exceed the sum of five hundred (500) dollars; ten (10) dollars when the value of such estate does not exceed the sum of $1,500; fifteen (15) dollars when the value of such estate does not exceed $2,500; twenty (20) dollars when the value of such estate does not exceed $5,000, but does exceed

$2,500; twenty-five (25) dollars when the value of such estate exceeds the sum of $5,000, and shall not exceed $10,000; thirty (30) dollars when such [145] estate exceeds the sum of $10,000, but not $15,000; forty (40) dollars when the value of such estate shall exceed the sum of $15,000, but not of $20,000; fifty (50) dollars when the value of such estate exceeds the sum of $20,000, but not of $25,000; and seventy-five (75) dollars in all cases where the value of such estate shall exceed the sum of $25,000, and in all cases in addition, all sums necessarily expended in publishing or serving notices required by law. And in the adjudication of all civil and criminal actions the same fees and costs shall be paid as in like actions and matters in the district court, the same to be paid to the judge of the county court, a record [to] be kept of, and by him turned over to the county treasurer."

This act contained other provisions, and its title was: "An Act to Fix the Compensation of the Judges of the County Courts and Provide a Fund to Reimburse the County for the Same." Section 4 of chapter 50 of the Laws of 1890 copied verbatim into the Revised Codes of 1895, being § 2071 thereof. The same being true of chapter 50 of the Laws of 1890, with the exception that § 2 is amended as to the amount of salary of the clerk and § 3 as to the determination of the population upon which the salaries are based.

The petition placed the right to recover upon the proposition that the statute in question violated the following provisions of the Constitution of North Dakota:

(1) Section 11, article 1, "All laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation."

(2) Section 22, article 1, "All courts shall be open, and every man for any injury done him in his lands, goods, person or reputation shall have remedy by due process of law, and right and justice administered without sale, denial or delay."

(3) Section 61, article 2, "No bill shall embrace more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title, but a bill which violates this provision shall be invalidated thereby only as to so much thereof as shall not be so expressed."

(4) Section 175, article 11, "No tax shall be levied except in pursuance of law, and every law imposing a tax shall state distinctly the object of the same, to which only it shall be applied."

(5) Section 176, article 11, "Laws shall be passed, taxing by uniform rule all property according to its true value in money," etc.

L. E. Birdzell and Geo. E. Wallace as amici curiae.

[149] BRUCE, J. (after stating the facts).—The statute under consideration was adopted from Minnesota in 1890. Prior to its adoption by us, however, and in April 1889, it was declared invalid by the Minnesota courts. . . . If the rule were followed that a statute is presumed to have been adopted with the construction placed upon it by the state of its origin, the statute would have been stillborn in North Dakota. We are perfectly satisfied, however, that the North Dakota legislature had no knowledge of the Minnesota case. Since the decision of the Minnesota case, similar if not identical statutes, and under similar if not identical constitutional provisions, have been passed upon and declared invalid by the supreme courts of California, Washington, Minnesota, Illinois, Wisconsin and Missouri. See Fatjo v. Pfister, 117 Cal. 83, 48 Pac. 1012; State v. Case, 39 Wash. 177, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 152, 109 Am. St. Rep. 874, 81 Pac. 554; State v. Brophy, 38 Wis. 413; State v. Mana, 76 Wis. 469, 45 N. W. 526, 46 N. W. 51; Cook County v. Fairbank, 222 Ill. 578, 78 N. E. 895; Mearkle v. Hennepin County, 44 Minn. 546, 47 N. W. 165; State v. Switzler, 143 Mo. 287, 40 L.R.A. 280, 65 Am. St. Rep. 653, 45 S. W. 245. See also 37 Cyc. 713, and cases cited. In fact, we have yet to find a single instance in which a similar statute has been upheld, either in the adjudicated cases or the dicta of the text writers.

The conclusion of these authorities, indeed, is that the charges, being [150] arbitrary, and not in any manner proportionate to the work done, are taxes, and not fees. As taxes they are held to be taxes upon property, rather than taxes upon a privilege, and therefore void because not imposed by uniform rule according to the true value in money.

If the charges could be looked upon in the nature of inheritance taxes, they could perhaps be sustained, but they are not inheritance taxes, as an inheritance tax is a tax upon the privilege of succeeding to, or inheriting property, and is paid not out of the estate as a whole, but out of that part of it which is inherited. This is not the case with the present charge. It is an ad valorem charge levied upon the estate, whether solvent or insolvent and is imposed not merely upon the estates of decedents, but upon the estates of minors and incompetents under guardianship. It is either, indeed, a tax upon property, or, if a tax or charge upon a privilege, a tax or charge upon the privilege of administering an estate or of enjoying the protection of the courts as a ward. "But the sums required by this act to be paid into the county treasury," says the supreme court of Minnesota in State

v. Gorman, 40 Minn. 232, 2 L.R.A. 701, 41 N. W. 948, "must be regarded as taxes, in the ordinary sense of that word, and as it is used in the Constitution. They are not in any proper sense fees or costs assessed impartially, or with regard to the expense occasioned or services performed. The amounts are regulated wholly, but arbitrarily, with regard to the value of the estate. They have no proximate relation to the amount of the compensation to be paid to the probate judge, nor to the other expenses of the court, nor to the nature or extent of the services which may become necessary in the proceedings. There is no necessary, natural, or even probable correspondence between the sums to be paid (widely different in amounts with respect to estates of different values) and the nature of the proceedings, or the character or extent of the services, which may be required in the probate court. It cannot be assumed, upon any ground of probability, that these proceedings or services will be different or greater in the case of an estate of the value of more than $500,000 than in one of the value of from $35,000 to $50,000,—yet in the former case $5,000 must be paid, in the latter $100. . . . The purpose for which such payments are required is strictly public in its nature, being directly . . . and indirectly for the support of a court established by the Constitution, with exclusive [151] original jurisdiction in certain matters of great and general public concern. Nor is it practically optional with executors or administrators, or those interested in the settlement of the estates of deceased persons, as to whether they will pay these exactions or not. If the law is valid, payment is practically necessary in the great majority of cases; and the mode adopted by the statute of securing payment by making that a condition precedent to the exercise of the functions of the probate court is as really compulsory, and perhaps as effectual in general, as the means generally employed to enforce the payment of taxes." Again, in Fatjo v. Pfister, 117 Cal. 83, 48 Pac. 1012, we find the following: "It is perfectly plain that the legislature has attempted by that portion of § 1, above quoted, to levy a property tax upon all estates of decedents, infants, and incompetents. The ad valorem charge for filing the inventory is in no sense a fee, or compensation for the services of the officer, which are the same as respects this matter, in every estate, large or small. To call it a fee is a transparent evasion. And it is not merely an inheritance tax, or at all analogous to an inheritance tax, as counsel would contend; for, in the first place, it applies not only to the estates of decedents, but also to the estates of minors and incompetents under guardianship; and, as to the estates of decedents, it applies not to the distributable residue after payment of debts and expenses of administration, but to the whole body of the estate, and would be collectable, if the law were valid, from an insolvent estate, as well as from one of equal appraised value and with no liabilities. As an attempt to levy a property tax, the act is in this particular invalid for several reasons; 1. It violates § 1 of article 13 of the Constitution, in imposing an extraordinary tax upon the property to which it applies, in addition to the equal and uniform tax to which alone all property in the state is liable. 2. The subject of the act is not expressed in its title, and is in no wise germane thereto—a violation of § 24 of article 4 of the Constitution, which requires that every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title."

We realize fully that reasonable court charges have generally been sustained by the authorities. We also realize that the creditor had little protection under the ancient law, and that it was only after many centuries that he could seek reimbursement from the estate of the deceased. See Pulliam v. Pulliam, 10 Fed. 53; Brown's Bl. Com. pp. [152] 393, 394. We also realize that the property of the ward had originally but little protection. See Woerner, Am. Law of Guardianship, p. 3; 2 Bl. Com. 77. We realize therefore, that both wards and creditors have privileges which formerly they did not enjoy; that is to say, the privilege of the use of the machinery of the county and probate courts for the protection of their property and property rights. We realize that the clause of the Magna Charta to the effect: "Nulli vendimus, nulli negabimus aut differimus justitiam vel rectum," and which we have paraphrased in our Constitution, § 22, article 1, into: "All courts shall be open, and any man for any injury done him in his lands, goods, person, or reputation shall have remedy by due process of law, and right and justice administered without sale, denial or delay," has generally been construed not to prohibit the imposition of reasonable court costs, and was aimed rather against the selling of justice by magistrates themselves,—that is to say, bribery,—than the imposition of reasonable fees. See Northern Counties Invest Trust v. Sears, 30 Ore. 388, 35 L.R.A. 192, 41 Pac. 931; Harrison v. Willis, 7 Heisk. (Tenn.) 46, 19 Am. Rep. 604; Townsend v. Townsend. Peck (Tenn.) 15, 14 Am. Dec. 722. We are quite satisfied, however, that prior to the adoption of the North Dakota Constitution the meaning had extended its original boundary, and that the provisions which are to be found in the Constitutions of all of the states were aimed not merely against the selling of justice by the magistrates, but by the state itself; in other words, that a free and reasonable access to the courts and to the privileges accorded by the courts, and without unreasonable charges, was intended to be guaranteed to everyone.

In answer, also, to the contention that the right of the creditor to participate in the estate by means of the machinery of the county court is a privilege which he did not originally enjoy, we may say that the right to redress in a very large number of cases may be equally considered so. Until the invention, indeed, of the writ of trespass upon the case in England, there were a very large number of wrongs for which no redress could be had in the courts. Such a fact, however, would, we believe, hardly justify a imposition of extra court costs or fees in such cases.

The petitioner, we believe, is, under any and all of the authorities, entitled to recover his money in the case at bar; that is to say, the amount paid in excess of the initial fee of $5 and the amount expended [153] in publishing or serving notices. The fees in excess of these amounts, and which from the complaint we gather are all that are claimed in the action, were demanded of the plaintiff by an officer acting under color of law, and for public services which the plaintiff was entitled to have performed. The complaint discloses that they were paid under written protest, and under circumstances and at a state of the proceedings when a refusal to pay them and a resort to compel the performance of the duties by legal proceedings and without such payment, would have involved a delay which would have been injurious both to the estate and the third parties. Under such a condition of affairs, the payment was involuntary, and not voluntary. Mearkle v. Hennepin County, 44 Minn. 546, 47 N. W. 165; State v. Nelson, 41 Minn. 25, 4 L.R.A. 300, 42 N. W. 548; Cook County v. Fairbank, 222 Ill. 578, 78 N. E. 895; Chicago v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 218 Ill. 40, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 770, 75 N. E. 803; Trover v. San Francisco, 152 Cal. 479, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 183, 92 Pac. 1025; Fatjo v. Pfister, 117 Cal. 83, 48 Pac. 1012; State v. Case, 39 Wash. 177, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 152, 109 Am. W. 212.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

SUPPLEMENTAL OPINION.

BRUCE, J.—The opinion which is filed in this case is a substituted opinion, the one first filed having been corrected so as to make it clear that only the fees and charges of $5 for each $1,000 or fraction thereof in excess of the first $1,000 come within the constitutional inhibitions, and are held to be illegally required. We have made this correction as the result of an intervening petition for rehearing which was filed by the tax commission as amicus curiae. All that we strike out of the statute, in short, are the following words: "And when the [154] value of said estate has been ascertained by the court, through the inventory and appraisal or upon hearing of same, as legally required, within thirty days after the issuance of letters testamentary, of administration or guardianship, the judge of said court shall require an additional fee to be paid from said estate into said county treasury, of $5 for each and every one thousand dollars or fraction thereof [in excess of the first one thousand dollars] of value therein found, as shown by said inventory and appraisal." [Rev. Codes 1905, § 2589.] We find no fault with the remainder of the statute. We are quite satisfied, from the authorities and from an examination of the act, that the case is one in which the doctrine of "partial invalidity" may be applied, and that the clauses which are herein held invalid are not so essentially and inseparably connected in substance with the remainder of the act as to require a rejection of the whole statute. The rule is well established that where a part of a statute is unconstitutional, that fact does not authorize the courts to declare the remainder void also, unless all the provisions are connected in subject-matter depending upon each other, operating together for the same purpose, or otherwise so connected in meaning that it cannot be presumed that the legislature would have passed the one without the other. See Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. 246; Hirschfeld v. McCullagh, 64 Ore. 502, 127 Pac. 541, 130 Pac. 1131.

We are satisfied that the initial fee of $5, as well as the expenditures for publishing and sending out notices, can be sustained as reasonable court charges, being levied uniformly upon all estates. The right to require reasonable court fees, indeed, has been so generally conceded, that a discussion of the proposition hardly seems to be necessary. The imposition of such fees is not a denial or sale of justice, provided that they are uniform, are reasonable, and have a reasonable relation to the services rendered. See Perce v. Hallett, 13 R. I. 364; Merrill v. Bowler, 20 R. I. 226, 38 Atl. 114; Northern Counties Invest. Trust v. Sears, 30 Ore. 388, 35 L.R.A. 192, 41 Pac. 931; State v. Judges of First Judicial Dist. 21 Ohio St. 11; Lee County v. Abrahams, 34 Ark. 166; State v. Fogns, 19 Nev. 247, 9 Pac. 123; Comstock Mill, etc. Co. v. Allen, 21 Nev. 325, 31 Pac. 434; Baldwin v. Goldfrank, 88 Tex. 249, 31 S. W. 1064, affirming 9 Tex. Civ. App. 269, 26 S. W. 155; State v. Lancaster [155] County, 4 Neb. 537, 19 Am. Rep. 641; State v. Ream, 16 Neb. 681, 21 N. W. 398; Beebe v. Wells, 37 Kan. 472, 15 Pac. 565; State v. Frazier, 36 Ora. 178, 59 Pac. 5.

The same is true of § 2589, Rev. Codes 1905, being chapter 87 of the Laws of 1905, and of chapter 127 of the Laws of 1913, and in so far as the fee or charge of $5 for each and every $1,000 or fraction thereof in excess of the first thousand dollars is concerned. Chapter 66 of the Laws of 1903, and § 2071 of the Rev. Codes of 1899, being chapter 50 of the Laws of 1890, however, are invalid even as to the initial fee of $5, as such is not imposed upon all estates equally, but according to the value thereof. They are necessarily equally invalid as to the added fee of $5 for every $1,000 additional value. These acts are not strictly before us, but we mention the same in order that no confusion of administration may arise from this opinion.

NOTE.

Validity of Statute Fixing Probate or Administration Fees.

A statute imposing a probate or administration fee reasonably designed to compensate for the services of the court officers therein is valid. State v. Gorman, 40 Minn. 232, 41 N. W. 948, 2 L.R.A. 701; Hauser v. Miller, 37 Mont. 22, 94 Pac. 197; Northern Counties Invest. Trust v. Sears, 30 Ore. 388, 41 Pac. 931, 35 L.R.A. 188. And see the reported case. See also State v. Frazier, 36 Ore. 178, 59 Pac. 5; In re Taxes, etc. 19 Pa. Dist. 882. "The legislature has the power to require reasonable fees to be paid by the citizen for special services rendered to him from time to time by the public officers, according to a fixed schedule, such fees being intended to make up the compensation of the officers." Hawser v. Miller, 37 Mont. 22, 94 Pac. 197.

A statute imposing a probate or administration fee the amount of which is not dependent on the value of the services rendered by court officers in the proceeding, but which is dependent on the value of the estate to be administered is invalid as a tax on property which does not conform to the constitutional requirements of equality and uniformity. Fatjo v. Pfister, 117 Cal. 83, 48 Pac. 1012; Cook County v. Fairbank, 222 Ill. 578, 78 N. E. 895; State v. Gorman, 40 Minn. 232, 41 N. W. 948, 2 L.R.A. 701; Hauser v. Miller, 37 Mont. 22, 94 Pac. 197; State v. Case, 39 Wash. 177, 81 Pac. 554, 109 Am. St. Rep. 874, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 152; State v. Mann, 76 Wis. 469, 45 N. W. 526, 46 N. W. 51. And see the reported case. See also

Mearkle v. Hennepin County, 44 Minn. 546, 47 N. W. 165. In State v. Case, supra, the court, in holding that such a statute could not be sustained on the ground that the charges which it imposed were fees for services rendered, said: "Appellant further argues, that the . . . charge in question here may be regarded not as a tax upon property, but as a fee for services rendered; and that the legislature has the right to fix the amount of such fee. It is true the statute calls the charge a 'fee,' but if it is apparent upon the face of the statute that the charge is in fact not based upon actual and necessary services rendered or to be rendered, but is based entirely upon a property valuation, thereby partaking of the nature of a tax, it would seem to be wholly immaterial by what name the statute may designate it. The statute in terms shows that the charge is based upon the value of the estate, and shall we conclude that the legislature intended to say, in effect, that the amount of actual and required services varies according to the value of the estate only? If the legislature intended to so declare, it cannot be said that the declaration is supported by experience. Can the legislature arbitrarily say that greater service is required in the settlement of an estate valued at one thousand dollars than one valued at $999.99? We think not, and yet such is the exact effect of this statute, if it shall be held that these charges are fees for services only." In Hauser v. Miller, supra, the statute under consideration provided for the payment of a fee at the time of the filing of a petition for letters testamentary or of administration, and on the return of the inventory if the estate was appraised above a named sum another fee was required to be paid, the amount of the fee depending on the appraised value of the estate. It was contended that the effect of the statute was to impose a tax for revenue purposes and hence that it was repugnant to a constitutional provision prohibiting the legislature from levying taxes in any county, city, town or municipal corporation for county, town or municipal purposes, and to another provision declaring that taxes should be uniform and levied for public purposes only. The court in upholding these contentions said: "The impositions complained of cannot be deemed fees paid to the clerk for special services, because they do not go to him. . . . Nor can they be said to be designed to provide a fund to be devoted specially to the payment of his salary. The statute does not so declare. From any point of view, they can only be regarded as a means resorted to by the legislature to provide revenue for the respective counties. They are professedly imposed for the benefit of the counties. They are clearly a tax upon the property of certain classes of individuals. The amounts are regulated wholly and arbitrarily with regard to the appraised value of the estates of decedents, of minors and incompetents. The burdens fall not upon the residue of the estates of decedents to be distributed after debts and expenses are paid, but upon the whole of such estates, and at arbitrary and unequal rates. An estate of the value of three thousand dollars is required to pay five dollars, whereas all estates of a greater value, up to one hundred thousand dollars, are taxed at a greater and increasing rate. After that value is reached, the rate is the same, without reference to value. There is also a manifest inequality in the rates fixed for estates falling in the different classes; for an estate slightly in excess of the value of ten thousand dollars bears the same burden as one of twenty thousand dollars in value. . . . It is thus entirely clear that the act, levying a tax as it does upon the property of the people in the different counties for the benefit of the counties and at grossly unequal rates, as applied to estates of different values, is open to both the objections urged against it, and is void."

It has been held that a statute imposing a charge on the granting of letters testamentary, administration, guardianship or conservatorship, the amount of the charge depending on the valuation of the estate, cannot be sustained on the ground that it imposes a succession tax. Fatjo v. Pfister, 117 Cal. 83, 48 Pac. 1012; Cook County v. Fairbank, 222 Ill. 578, 78 N. E. 895. In the case last cited it was said: "Nor can the charge or burden imposed be sustained upon the ground that it amounts to no more than an inheritance or succession tax. The contention that it does amount to such tax is fully met by the fact that the statute in express terms applies not only to the estates of deceased persons, but also to the estates of infants, idiots, insane persons, lunatics, distracted persons, drunkards and spend-thrifts. The tax here imposed is levied upon the body of the entire estate, if it exceeds two thousand dollars in value, whether the estate is solvent or insolvent, while an inheritance or succession tax is imposed, not as a tax upon the estate, but upon the right of succession."

In State v. Gorman, 40 Minn. 232, 41 N. W. 948, 2 L.R.A. 701, it was held that a statute providing that no proceedings subsequent to the return of the inventory should be had in the probate court for the settlement of an estate until the payment has been made of charges the amount of which varied according to the appraised value of the estate, violated a constitutional provision guarantying free justice. The court said: "Suitors in this (probate) court of exclusive jurisdiction should not be required to pay, as a condition to their suits being entertained, a tax measured by the value of their property, and without regard to the nature or extent of the judicial proceedings which may be invoked or become necessary. That would be contrary to that clause of the constitution which guaranties justice 'freely and without purchase, completely and without denial.'"

In State v. Mann, 76 Wis. 469, 45 N. W. 526, 46 N. W. 51, it appeared that a statute applying to the administration of estates in any county having a population of more than 150,000 required administrators to "pay to the county treasurer of such county, for the use thereof, a sum equal to one half of one per cent. on five hundred thousand dollars of the appraised value of such estate, and one tenth of one per cent. of such value on the balance of said estate." It was held that the charge imposed by the act was a tax which could not be upheld under a constitutional provision that "the legislature shall impose a tax on all civil suits . . . which shall constitute a fund to be applied toward the payment of the salary of judges."

v.

COMMONWEALTH.

And Eight Other Cases.

Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court—
October 8, 1914.

218 Mass. 558; 106 N. E. 310.

Foreign Corporations — Excise Tax — Validity.

The Foreign Corporation Tax Law (St. 1909, c. 490, pt. 3) § 56 et seq., is valid, it imposing an excise or license, and not a tax upon the property of foreign corporations.

Taxes — Estoppel of Taxpayer to Question.

As St. 1903, c. 437, §§ 60, 73, 74, deny a corporation, which fails to file seasonably with the secretary of the commonwealth the certificate of its condition as a foreign corporation, the right to maintain actions in the local courts and impose severe penalties, the act of foreign corporations which maintained places of business within the state, in filing such certificate and appointing the commissioner of corporations their agent for the service of process in accordance with section

58, does not estop them from denying that they are liable to the excise tax imposed by Foreign Corporation Tax Law (St. 1909, c. 490, pt. 3), particularly as section 70 of that statute, which provides the exclusive remedy for recovering such taxes when improperly paid, does not require any preliminary protest or statement of objection before filing the petition.

Statutes — Re-enactment — Adoption of Prior Construction.

Where, although St. 1903, c. 437, imposing taxes on foreign corporations, was construed to be inapplicable to foreign corporations whose places of business within the state were maintained solely for use in interstate commerce, the legislature re-enacted it as St. 1909, c. 490, pt. 3, without substantial change, they must be held to have adopted the prior construction.

Interstate Commerce — What Constitutes.

Commerce within the federal Constitution is commercial intercourse between nations and the states, and includes not only navigation and transportation, but the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities, and hence the Foreign Corporation Tax Law of 1909 (St. 1909, c. 490, pt. 3), imposing an excise upon foreign corporations, does not apply to those engaged in foreign commerce, although it be a commercial business.

Power of State to Tax.

Where a foreign corporation which does an interstate commerce business within the state also does a domestic business, the state may levy an excise tax upon it.

[See Ann. Cas. 1913C 812.]

Same.

Where a foreign corporation does both an intrastate and interstate business, an excise levied by the state upon its intrastate business is not invalid because the profit on the intrastate business alone is not sufficient to meet it.

What Constitutes Commerce — Correspondence School.

The sending of means of education by correspondence through the mails is commerce.

Corporation Engaged Wholly in Interstate Commerce — License Tax.

A foreign wireless company which maintained within the state stations at which messages to and from ships on the high seas and foreign countries were received and transmitted, but which did not transmit any local messages, is engaged wholly in interstate commerce, and is not subject to the excise tax imposed by Foreign Corporation Tax Law of 1909 (St. 1909, c. 490, pt. 3).

[See Ann. Cas. 1914A 987; Id. 1913C 812.]

Same.

A foreign corporation which maintained a Boston office under a manager who had charge of the business in that vicinity, and under whom were a salesman and a stenographer, is not, where all orders had to be approved by the New York office, and no customers came to the Boston office, payments and shipments being made from outside the state, engaged in local business so as to be subject to Foreign Corporation Tax Law of 1909 (St. 1909, c. 490, pt. 3).

Same.

Where a Connecticut corporation maintained a Boston office, the sale and delivery of goods to citizens of Connecticut through the local office is not interstate commerce for that reason.

Same.

Where a Connecticut corporation maintained a Boston sales office where samples were kept and salesmen for the New England district had their headquarters, it is not wholly engaged in interstate commerce, it appearing that customers visited its local office, and hence is subject to Foreign Corporation Tax Law of 1909 (St. 1909, c. 490, pt. 3).

Same.

Where a foreign corporation maintained a local sales office where orders for the sale of machines were received subject to approval by the home office, but repair parts for the machines were kept at the local office and a large business in repairs was done, the corporation is not engaged wholly in interstate commerce, and is subject to the excise tax imposed by Foreign Corporation Tax Law of 1909 (St. 1909, c. 490, pt. 3).

Same.

A foreign corporation engaged in the automobile business, which maintained a local sales office where orders for machines were taken, the machines being sent as ordered, but not kept distinct for each customer, and where a large repair and used car business was carried on, is not engaged wholly in interstate commerce, and is subject to Foreign Corporation Tax Law of 1909 (St. 1909, c. 490, pt. 3).

Same.

A foreign flour manufacturing corporation, which maintained a local office from whence salesmen were sent through the country to secure retail orders for flour, which were delivered to the wholesale patrons of the company, is not wholly engaged in interstate commerce, particularly where a small stock was kept on hand for local sales, and is subject to Foreign Corporation Tax Law of 1909 (St. 1909, c. 490, pt. 3).

Same.

A foreign holding company whose articles of association named Boston as its business office without the state of its domicile, and which maintained a Boston office, where dividends from the stock it held for the benefit of its shareholders were received and were paid, is not engaged wholly in interstate commerce, and is subject to the Foreign Corporation Tax Law of 1909 (St. 1909, c. 490, pt. 3), particularly where its officers were citizens of the state of Massachusetts, and all of its records and accounts were kept in that state.

Same.

A foreign mining company whose property was located in another state, but which was authorized to maintain a Boston office, at which its directors' meetings were held, its policies shaped, and selling orders given, is not engaged in interstate commerce, although it had a general manager in charge of its mining business in the foreign state, and hence it is subject to the excise prescribed by Foreign Corporation Tax Law of 1909 (St. 1909, c. 490, pt. 3).

Foreign Corporations — Excise Tax — Validity.

Where a foreign corporation engaged in the automobile business purchased real estate and erected a substantial building for the carrying on of its repair trade, and trade in used cars, as well as a selling agency, Foreign Corporation Tax Law of 1909 (St. 1909, c. 490, pt. 3), which greatly increased the license taxes upon foreign corporations, does not deprive such corporation of equal protection of the laws; it not appearing that its real property was exclusively adapted to use for automobile business, that it was necessary for it to have purchased such property to carry on its business, or that the property could not be sold for a reasonable price.

Report from Supreme Judicial Court, Suffolk county.

Nine separate petitions to recover excise taxes paid. Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company of America, Pocahontas Fuel Company, Cheney Brothers Company, Lanston Monotype Machine Company, Locomobile Company of America, Northwestern Consolidated Milling Company, Copper Range Company, White Company, and Champion Copper Company, petitioners respectively, and Commonwealth, defendant in each action. Cases reported. The facts are stated in the opinion. All actions except by two petitioners first named, DISMISSED.

Chas. A. Snow and Wm. P. Everts for petitioners.

Thos. J. Boynton and Roger Sherman Hoar for defendant.

[561] Ruoc, C. J.—These are petitions brought by corporations organized under the laws of other States to recover excise taxes paid by each for the privilege of transacting business within the Commonwealth.

1. The foreign corporation tax law, St. 1909, c. 490, Part III, §§ 56, et seq., has been upheld as a constitutional exercise of the power of the State after extended argument and thorough deliberation. Atty.-Gen. v. Electric Storage Battery Co. 188 Mass. 239, 3 Ann. Cas. 631, 74 N. E. 467; Baltic Min. Co. v. Com. 207 Mass. 381, 93 N. E. 831; Keystone Watch Case Co. v. Com. 212 Mass. 50, 98 N. E. 1063; S. S. White Dental Mfg.

Co. v. Com. 212 Mass. 35, Ann. Cas. 1913C 805, 98 N. E. 1056. On writ of error the judgments in the last two cases were affirmed in 231 U. S. 68, 34 S. Ct. 15, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 127. The only question to be determined in the cases at bar is whether under the principles already established the several plaintiffs were subject to the excise laid upon each. The tax sought to be recovered is strictly an excise tax and in no sense a property tax. It is a license fee exacted from foreign corporations for the privilege of doing in this State business other than interstate commerce. So far as any of the plaintiffs' requests for rulings seek for a re-examination or reversal of the principles established in these decisions, they rightly were denied.

2. The Commonwealth urges that each of the plaintiffs is [562] estopped now from denying that it is within the scope and purview of this law. The ground for this contention is that each seasonably, voluntarily and without protest filed with the secretary of the Commonwealth the certificate of its condition as a foreign corporation required by § 54, and likewise appointed the commissioner of corporations its agent for the service of process in accordance with St. 1903, c. 437, § 58, and hence has acknowledged itself to be subject to the law. The principle invoked is that, where one of his own volition asks for a privilege or license, he cannot be heard to say afterward that his payment of the fee exacted was illegal and on that account seek to recover it. It relies upon Cook v. Boston, 9 Allen (Mass.) 393, 394, Emery v. Lowell, 127 Mass. 138, 141 and like cases, and especially upon Ficklen v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 145 U. S. 1, 24, 12 S. Ct. 810, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 601. But all these were cases where a fee was exacted in advance for a license issued for the transaction of a particular branch of business. In the Ficklen case the precise point decided was that a resident commission broker, who, after paying the required fee, had taken out a general license to do all kinds of commission brokerage for both foreign and domestic correspondents for 1887 and also had given a bond to pay in addition a percentage on all sales during that year, could not resort to the courts to compel the issuance to him of a license for the ensuing year by municipal authorities who refused because he had not complied with the bond of the earlier year on the ground that as the event had proved business had been done only for non-resident principals. The cases at bar in this respect come within the principle applied to a somewhat similar state of facts in Atchison, etc. R. Co. v. O'Connor, 223 U. S. 280, A. C. 1913C 1050, 32 S. Ct. 216, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 436, where it was held that a foreign corporation paying an excise tax was not acting voluntarily in a legal sense but was under implied duress when it was put to a serious disadvantage against the sovereignty by reason of liability to heavy penalties if in the end its contention for exemption should not be sustained. Severe penalties are provided by § 73 for each day's delay in filing returns, and by § 74 the business of the corporation may be enjoined, while by St. 1903, c. 437, § 60, the delinquent corporation is denied the privilege of maintaining actions in our courts. Somewhat summary remedies are given in the event of a failure to pay the tax. See St. 1909, c. 490, Part III, §§ 58, 62, 69. [563] The provision of § 70 under which these petitions are brought is that relief may be had by any corporation within six months after paying the tax, which shall be the exclusive remedy. It does not require any preliminary protest or statement of objection before filing the petition. From all these considerations the conclusion follows that the several petitioners are not prevented from maintaining these petitions because they complied with the requirements of the law as its scope was contended to be by the officers of the Commonwealth, in order to avoid the consequences of being mistaken in their own interpretation of it. The provisions of St. 1903, c. 437, §§ 58, 60, may apply in whole or in part to corporations engaged exclusively in interstate commerce. International Harvester Co. v. Kentucky, 234 U. S. 579, 34 S. Ct. 944, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 1479. But that question is not now before us and does not affect the point here decided.

3. It was said in the course of the opinion in Atty.-Gen. v. Electric Storage Battery Co. 188 Mass. 239, at pages 240, 241, 3 Ann. Cas. 631, 74 N. E. 467, "If the statute before us applied to the maintenance of a place of business solely for the purpose of engaging in interstate commerce it would be unconstitutional. . . . We are of opinion that the Legislature cannot have intended to include in this statute corporations whose usual place of business is established and maintained solely for use in interstate commerce." After that decision St. 1909, c. 490 was enacted without material change in this respect, from which the inference flows that the Legislature was content with the law as interpreted by that decision. In Baltic Min. Co. v. Com. 207 Mass. 381, 93 N. E. 831, at page 390 it was said, referring to the case last cited, "In our former adjudication upon it [the statute now under consideration] we expressed the opinion that it was inapplicable to cases where a foreign corporation had its place of business here only for use in interstate commerce. It is not to be inferred that the Legislature intended the statute to go beyond the constitutional authority of the Commonwealth." What was said in these two decisions was adverted to and apparently adopted in part as the basis of decision in Baltic Min. Co. v. Massachusetts, 231 U. S. 68, 34 S. Ct. 15, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 127, where it was stated at page 84, "and the statute, it is held, does not apply to corporations which have places of business for the transaction solely of interstate commerce." See also [564] S. S. White Dental Mfg. Co. v. Commonwealth, 212 Mass. 35, at page 46, Ann. Cas. 1913C 805, 98 N. E. 1056.

The contention of the Commonwealth that these sentences were not intended to apply to and do not apply to corporations doing a commercial or trading business, but only to transportation corporations, cannot be supported. The decisions in which they occur did not relate to transportation corporations but to purely business corporations. The statements cannot be treated as dicta, for they are used as essential links in a chain of reasoning by this court upholding the constitutionality of the statute. We regard ourselves as bound by them in interpreting and applying this statute.

The Attorney General has argued in substance that the maintenance of a local office solely for a purpose connected with interstate commerce is such a doing business within the State as subjects a corporation to the license fee required by this statute. Reliance in this regard is placed especially upon the words in Pembina Consol. Silver Min. etc. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 181, 8 S. Ct. 737, 31 U. S. (L. ed.) 650, at page 184, to the effect that the State has a right to exact a license fee of a foreign corporation for maintaining "an office in the Commonwealth for the use of its officers, stockholders, agents, or employees." But as was explained in McCall v. California, 136 U. S. 104, 10 S. Ct. 881, 34 U. S. (L. ed.) 392, at page 112, that decision was not intended to impinge upon the equally well settled principle that "the only limitation upon this power of the State to exclude a foreign corporation from doing business within its limits, or hiring offices for that purpose, or to exact conditions for allowing the corporation to do business or hire offices there, arises where the corporation is in the employ of the federal government, or when its business is strictly commerce, interstate or foreign. The control of such commerce, being in the federal government, is not to be restricted by State authority." Expressions to be found in Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York, 143 U. S. 305, 317, 12 S. Ct. 403, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 164; Wolff Dryer Co. v. Bigler, 192 Pa. St. 466, 43 Atl. 1092; Davis, etc. Bldg. etc. Co. v. Dix, 64 Fed. 406, 413 and Atty.-Gen. v. Bay State Min. Co. 99 Mass. 148, 153, 96 Am. Dec. 717, relied on by the Attorney General, must be regarded as subject to this limitation. In principle that question is concluded by Norfolk etc. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 136 U. S. 114, 10 S. Ct. 958, 34 U. S. (L. ed.) 394 and McCall v. California, 136 U. S. [565] 104, 10 S. Ct. 881, 34 U. S. (L. ed.) 392, when read in the light of the numerous definitions (presently to be examined) of commerce between the States given by that court. Such a place of business in common with all others, whether of citizens or aliens, perhaps might be required to pay a license fee, but that question is not presented. The conclusion is that the maintenance by a foreign corporation of a local office solely for use in interstate commerce does not render it liable to the excise tax of the statute under consideration.

4. What constitutes "commerce . . . among the several States" within the meaning of those words in the Federal Constitution has been defined by the Supreme Court of the United States. Said Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 189, 190, 6 U. S. (L. ed.) 23. "Commerce, undoubtedly, is traffic, but it is something more: it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations, and parts of nations, in all its branches." In Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 238, at page 702 occurs this definition: "Commerce with foreign countries and among the States, strictly considered, consists in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation and the transportation and transit of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities." In Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 203, 5 S. Ct. 826, 29 U. S. (L. ed.) 158, it was said, "Commerce among the States consists of intercourse and traffic between their citizens, and includes the transportation of persons and property, and the navigation of public waters for that purpose, as well as the purchase, sale and exchange of commodities. The power to regulate that commerce, as well as commerce with foreign nations, vested in Congress, is the power to prescribe the rules by which it shall be governed, that is, the conditions upon which it shall be conducted; to determine when it shall be free and when subject to duties or other exactions." In Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 7 S. Ct. 592, 30 U. S. (L. ed.) 694, at page 497, it was said that "the negotiation of sales of goods which are in another State, for the purpose of introducing them into the State in which the negotiation is made, is interstate commerce." Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 20, 9 S. Ct. 6, 32 U. S. (L. ed.) 346; Lottery Case, 188 U. S. 321, 352, 353, 23 S. Ct. 321, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 492; Swift v. U. S. 196 U. S. 375, 25 S. Ct. 276, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 518; Diamond Match Co. v. Ontonagon, 188 U. S. 82, 23 S. Ct. 266, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 394. It is apparent from this review of decisions that the interstate commerce regulation which is under the exclusive control [566] of Congress and which cannot be affected by any discriminatory State law, includes not merely transportation but the other inherently necessary incidents of purchase and sale of goods. Nor is it of decisive consequence in this connection where the contract is made or where the title passes. As was said in Dozier v. Alabama, 218 U. S. 124, at page 128, 30 S. Ct. 649, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 965, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 264, "But as was hinted in Rearick v. Pennsylvania, 203 U. S. 507, 512, 27 S. Ct. 159, 51 U. S. (L. ed.) 295, what is commerce among the States is a question depending upon broader considerations than the existence of a technically binding contract, or the time and place where the title passed." Caldwell v. North Carolina, 187 U. S. 622, 23 S. Ct. 229, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 336; Savage v. Jones, 225 U. S. 501, 520, 32 S. Ct. 715, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 1182; Crenshaw v. Arkansas, 227 U. S. 389, 33 S. Ct. 294, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 565; Rogers v. Arkansas, 227 U. S. 401, 33 S. Ct. 298, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 569; Stewart v. Michigan, 232 U. S. 665, 34 S. Ct. 476, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 786.

5. The petitioners have emphasized somewhat in argument the phrase in 231 U. S., at page 86, to the effect "that local and domestic business, for the privilege of doing which the State has imposed a tax, is real and substantial," and have sought to infer therefrom that a new limitation has been imposed upon the power of the States. This conclusion does not follow. The sentence probably was intended only as a reference to a fact which existed in the cases then before the court, although not one decisive in any respect as to the conclusion reached. But given its full force, it is nothing more than a statement that a shadow cannot be made the basis of an excise tax. But when the local and domestic business exists, then an excise may be levied. There is nothing to indicate that a comparison between the total business of the company and its local business was intended. Such a basis has never before been intimated. It is directly contrary to Ficklen v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 145 U. S. 1, 12 S. Ct. 810, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 601. See also Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. 220 U. S. 107, Ann. Cas. 1912B 1312, 31 S. Ct. 343, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 389. If such a principle exists in reference to any facts, it has no relation to any of the cases at bar. The test is whether the foreign corporation transacts domestic business substantial in its essence and not by comparison, and reasonably susceptible of separation from its interstate commerce. If it does, the State can fix its own terms so far as license fee is concerned.

6. The ratio of profits on the domestic business to the license tax is an immaterial circumstance. If the license fee imposed is general in its operation and is in other respects invulnerable, the mere fact, that some foreign corporation may not be able to make [567] profits enough to meet it, does not render the law unconstitutional as to that corporation. The opportunity to do business subject to the protection of our laws and with all the advantages which arise from our markets and our financial and other resources, is the thing which is made the subject of the excise. U. S. v. Singer, 15 Wall. 111, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 49; Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. 220 U. S. 107, 166, 167, Ann. Cas. 1912B 1312, 31 S. Ct. 343, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 389.

Both upon this point and the one last discussed the petitioners rely on the statement in U. S. Express Co. v. Minnesota, 223 U. S. 335, 348, 32 S. Ct. 211, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 459, to the effect that if the amount of the tax is "unduly great, having reference to the real value" of the property engaged in the business, and on that in Western Union Tel. Co. v. Kansas, 216 U. S. 1, 42, 30 S. Ct. 190, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 355, referring to a tax "not all disproportioned to such local business." See S. S. White Dental Mfg. Co. v. Com. 212 Mass. 35, 44, Ann. Cas. 1913C 805, 98 N. E. 1056. These tests well may be used as aids in determining whether the general scheme of an excise statute is an honest attempt to raise legitimate revenue, or whether it is "a mere device to reach and burden the interstate commerce of the company." But when the general scheme of the statute has been upheld as not out of harmony with the Federal Constitution, then it cannot be stricken down because in a particular instance the excise may seem large. New York v. Roberts, 171 U. S. 658, 661, 663, 19 S. Ct. 58, 43 U. S. (L. ed.) 323; Pullman Co. v. Kansas, 216 U. S. 56, 66, 67, 30 S. Ct. 232, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 378; Ohio Tax Cases, 232 U. S. 576, 592, 34 S. Ct. 372, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 738.

It remains to consider the several cases at bar in the light of these governing principles.

7. The Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company of America is organized under the laws of New Jersey. It maintains in Massachusetts near the ocean three wireless stations, each consisting chiefly of a high pole having at the top a wire or wires with bare ends, from which are sent through and taken from the air currents of electricity, whereby messages are transmitted and received. Connected with this apparatus are rooms similar to ordinary telegraph stations, for use of the wireless telegraph operators. At each station it transmits and receives wireless messages for hire to and from ships on the high seas and foreign countries. It neither transmits nor receives any messages whatever over land or in or through this Commonwealth. It has no property in the Commonwealth, except that above described. [568] It is plain that this petitioner is engaged exclusively in foreign commerce. Transmission of intelligence by means of the electric telegraph has been held to be commerce. Pensacola Tel. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. 96 U. S. 1, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 708; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 1067; Leloup v. Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 645, 8 S. Ct. 1380, 32 U. S. (L. ed.) 311; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Kansas, 216 U. S. 1, 30 S. Ct. 190, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 355. The sending of the means of education by correspondence through the mails also is commerce. International Text-Book Co. v. Pigg, 217 U. S. 91, 18 Ann. Cas. 1103, 3 S. Ct. 481, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 678, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 493. The same principle governs the transmission of ideas, thought and news by the recently discovered instrumentality which has harnessed in its service "the sightless couriers of the air" to perform between its stations without visible highway the functions previously executed by electricity only when confined to wire as a conducting medium. This petitioner transacts no business of a domestic or local nature, except such as is inseparable from and necessarily incidental to its foreign commerce. Hence it is not within the purview of the statute.

8. The Pocahontas Fuel Company is established under the laws of West Virginia. Its business is the buying and selling of coal and coke. At its office in Boston is a manager who has charge of New England business and who is paid by check from New York, a salesman and a stenographer. Records of sales are kept at the Boston office and an average deposit of $1,000 is kept in a local bank for the expenses of this office. Correspondence and telephoning respecting sales is done from this office. Customers do not come to the office, but are called upon by the salesman, who sends all orders to New York, where they must be accepted and approved before the sale takes place. Goods are shipped to customers f. o. b. Norfolk, Virginia. The local office, in making contracts for delivery in Massachusetts, arranges charter parties for boats in the customer's name. All payments by customers are made by remittances by check to New York. This company has none of its goods or property in the Commonwealth, except office furniture, and there is no treasurer here. The description of business done at the Boston office, as shown by the agreed facts, is somewhat meagre, but it does not appear to include anything more than interstate commerce. No stock of goods is kept here. There is no local shop or store as a general resort for customers and the conduct of the essential details of [569] trade. It does not manufacture nor mine but buys its stock from other companies and, although not distinctly stated, it may be inferred that such purchases do not occur in Massachusetts. Its business, so far as this Commonwealth is concerned, consists of selling by contracts made in New York coal bought in other States to customers in the New England States and arranging for its transportation to them over the high seas or by rail from Virginia, solely through the medium of a manager and a salesman who travel to see prospective purchasers or communicate with them by telephone or letter from its Boston office. That which this company does in Massachusetts seems to be rationally connected with interstate commerce. The sole business which this company appears to carry on is "commerce . . . among the several States" as that phrase has been defined in judgments by which we are bound. The keeping of an office and a local bank account and the employment of a stenographer are incidental instrumentalities reasonably necessary to the conduct of this interstate commerce, and hence inseparable from it. This is not a case where the corporation by the form of its contracts or the details adopted for the doing of its business has attempted to convert into a form resembling interstate commerce that which in its intrinsic substance is local business subject to State control. Hence, Browning v. Waycross, 233 U. S. 16, 34 S. Ct. 578, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 828, where that thing was essayed, is not in point. This case seems to be covered in principle by McCall v. California, 136 U. S. 104, 10 S. Ct. 881, 34 U. S. (L. ed.) 392; Norfolk, etc. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 136 U. S. 114, 10 S. Ct. 958, 34 U. S. (L. ed.) 394; Crenshaw v. Arkansas, 227 U. S. 389, 33 S. Ct. 204, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 565; Rogers v. Arkansas, 227 U. S. 401, 33 S. Ct. 298, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 569; Stewart v. Michigan, 232 U. S. 665, 34 S. Ct. 476, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 786; Singer Sewing Mach. Co. v. Brickell, 233 U. S. 304, 34 S. Ct. 493, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 974. It follows that it is entitled to prevail in this proceeding.

9. The Cheney Brothers Company is organized under the laws of Connecticut for the manufacture of silk and other fabrics and for the purpose of trade. It maintains in Boston an office and salesroom with one office salesman and four other salesmen who travel through New England. No bookkeeper is employed, no books are kept except copies and records of orders, and no collections are made. The only deposit of funds is for the expenses of the office, amounting usually to about $250, which is sent from the treasury in New York. The salaries of salesmen and rent of [570] office are paid directly from the Connecticut office. A stock of samples is kept, but no other goods. The salesmen take orders, which are subject to approval by the home office in Connecticut, and the goods are shipped directly from Connecticut to the customer. The contract of sale is completed in Connecticut, where the title passes. This description of the place maintained by the corporation in Boston, and the character of business transacted there shows something outside interstate commerce. A fixed abode has been established, which is used as the headquarters for its New England business. It is almost a necessary inference from the maintenance of an "office and salesroom" with one permanent salesman, that customers resort thither in considerable numbers for the purpose of examining samples and placing orders. It reasonably may be assumed that here also are fixed all the terms of a very substantial number of sales, and that the only thing required to complete the transaction is the bald approval by the company at its home office. It is not only a permanent home for the corporation for the carrying on of its New England sales business, but it has many of the characteristics of a local salesroom. The stock of samples kept on hand is large enough apparently to require the constant attendance of one salesman. It was said by Mr. Chief Justice Waite in Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, at page 500. 7 S. Ct. 592, 30 U. S. (L. ed.) 489, "I cannot believe that if Robbins had opened an office for his business within the Taxing District, at which he kept and exhibited his samples, it would be held that he would not be liable to the tax, and this whether he stayed there all the time or came only at intervals." These words were used in a dissenting opinion. But they embody a thought by way of hypothesis which evidently was regarded as too plain to be challenged.

Five salesmen are attached to these Massachusetts headquarters; one stationed there permanently; while four others also travel throughout New England. New England is a perfectly well understood geographical term which includes Connecticut, the domiciliary State of the corporation. Since the agreed facts show that the travelling salesmen attached to the Boston office "cover" Connecticut as well as the other New England States, it follows that this local domicile is used in part at least for the transaction of business between the Cheney [571] Brothers Company, domiciled in Connecticut, and other residents of Connecticut. Apparently the orders from residents of Connecticut are registered, copied and forwarded to the Connecticut office of the corporation through the Boston office. Such orders may be taken by the travelling salesmen from purchasers in Connecticut or at the salesroom directly from Connecticut customers who go there in person. Plainly, the sale and delivery of goods by a Connecticut corporation to a citizen of Connecticut does not become interstate commerce merely because the order may have been transmitted through a sales agency of the corporation located in Massachusetts. This especially is true where the sale is consummated in Connecticut by acceptance of the order and the passing of the title in Connecticut, as is said in the agreed facts to be the course of business. Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 145 U. S. 192, 12 S. Ct. 806, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 672; United States Express Co. v. Minnesota, 223 U. S. 335, 341, 32 S. Ct. 211, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 459. That there is nothing inconsistent with this conclusion in Hanley v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 187 U. S. 617, 23 S. Ct. 214, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 333, is established by Ewing v. Leavenworth, 226 U. S. 464, 33 S. Ct. 157, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 303.

Some of these circumstances singly are enough to show that the place maintained by Cheney Brothers Company in Boston was not used exclusively for interstate commerce. Combined together, they lead to the conclusion that it is not entitled to prevail in this proceeding. The recognition of the existence of the corporation in Massachusetts to the extent here shown, by permitting it to maintain an office for the general use of its employees, agents and customers and the storage and display of samples of its products, "was a matter dependent on the will of the State," who could afford to the favorable exercise of its volition the conditions set forth in the corporation excise tax law. Pembina Consol. Silver Min. etc. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 181, 186, 8 S. Ct. 737, 31 U. S. (L. ed.) 650; New York v. Roberts, 171 U. S. 658, 19 S. Ct. 58, 43 U. S. (L. ed.) 323; Reymann Brewing Co. v. Brister, 179 U. S. 445, 21 S. Ct. 201, 45 U. S. (L. ed.) 269; Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York, 143 U. S. 305, 12 S. Ct. 403, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 164; Atty.-Gen. v. Bay State Min. Co. 99 Mass. 148, 96 Am. Dec. 717. The record reveals nothing to bring this corporation within any of the exceptions to this general rule discussed in McCall v. California, 136 U. S. 104, 10 S. Ct. 881, 34 U. S. (L. ed.) 392; Norfolk, etc. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 136 U. S. 114, 10 S. Ct. 958, 34 U. S. (L. ed.) 394, and kindred cases.

10. The Lanston Monotype Machine Company, organized under the laws of Virginia, manufacturers machinery at its factory in [572] Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. It maintains an office in Boston, where there are a manager and office manager and four inspectors, all of whom act as salesmen. The machines are all sold on orders subject to cancellation within seven days sent to the home office in Philadelphia and accepted there before becoming operative, and thence the machines are shipped directly to the purchasers with a bill of lading delivered by the local bank to the purchaser when he makes his initial payment. Stock to replace and to repair broken parts of the machines is kept constantly on hand at the Boston office and is replenished weekly from Philadelphia. From this stock in Boston parts are supplied by direct sale for about half the repairs made on the company's machines in New England, amounting to about $12,000 per year. The keeping and sale of this stock in Boston is an inducement to the trade to buy these machines. The petitioner's competitors keep no such stock of parts. These facts show the transaction of a very considerable local or intrastate business as distinguished from its interstate commerce. While there may be economies of management or advertising advantages arising from it in conjunction with the interstate business of the company, there is no necessary or inherent connection between the two. Because the interstate commerce may not be profitable except in connection with local business does not so interlock the two that they are inseparable. The protection afforded by the Federal Constitution to interstate commerce against State excise taxation does not go to the extent of permitting one engaged in interstate commerce to compete in local business free from liability to an excise to the State merely for the sake of greater profit, or even of making the difference between profit and loss in the business as a whole. Plainly this local business of replacing broken parts is conducted in a manner wholly distinct from the interstate business. The distinction is not whether a profit is made by the conjoining and a loss suffered by separating the intrastate and the interstate commerce, but whether the nature of the business is such that the company is free to renounce the domestic business if it chooses and still conduct its interstate commerce. That which was said in Baltic Min. Co. v. Massachusetts, 231 U. S. 68, 34 S. Ct. 15, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 127, at page 86 is aptly expressive of the situation disclosed on this petition, namely, "It is apparent" that the corporation "is carrying on a purely [573] local and domestic business quite separate from its interstate transactions. That local and domestic business, for the privilege of doing which the State has imposed a tax, is real and substantial and not so connected with interstate commerce as to render a tax upon it a burden upon the interstate business." This case also is governed by Atty.-Gen. v. Electric Storage Battery Co. 188 Mass. 239, 3 Ann. Cas. 631, 74 N. E. 467, where the facts were nearly identical. It there was said by Knowlton, C. J., at page 241, "While the statute is inapplicable to any business or place which belongs entirely to interstate commerce, it is applicable to the defendant, a corporation engaged in interstate commerce, which has, at the same time, a place of business for other purposes. The principle has been recognized repeatedly by the Supreme Court of the United States in similar cases. Osborne v. Florida, 164 U. S. 650, 17 S. Ct. 214, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 586; Pullman Co. v. Adams, 189 U. S. 420, 23 S. Ct. 494, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 877." Singer Sewing Mach. Co. v. Brickell, 233 U. S. 304, 34 S. Ct. 493, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 974.

11. The Locomobile Company of America, a West Virginia corporation, is authorized to manufacture, buy, sell and deal in automobiles and to carry on general business. Its factory is in Bridgeport, Connecticut, where its business is the manufacture and sale of automobiles. In Boston it occupies an office, salesroom and repair shop for the purpose of repairing cars of its own make and second hand cars taken in exchange for its own make. It occupies a large building and employs thirty persons, ten of whom are in the sales and office department and twenty in the repair department. Its method of conducting its sales of new cars is for orders to be taken by its Boston agent and transmitted to Bridgeport, whence cars are shipped to the Boston agent, who makes deliveries in accordance with orders. It does not appear, moreover, that separation of an automobile for a particular purchaser is made until the car reaches Boston, although no shipments of cars are made into Massachusetts "except cars used in fulfilment of orders . . . previously given and approved." In two thirds of the sales of new cars the purchaser pays the entire price in cash on or before the delivery of the car, while in the remaining third "the company accepts, as a part of the consideration, a car of whatever make, previously used by the purchaser." The company maintains at its place of business in Boston a used-car department, where it sells cars of its own and other makes [574] taken as part consideration in the sale of new cars. A stock of such cars is constantly kept for sale. The business of the used-car department for the year during which the excise in question was levied amounted to $41,000 out of a total business of $246,000 done by the company in Boston during the same period. The petitioner also keeps in its Boston repair shop a stock of repair parts used in repairing its own make of cars whether sold in Boston or elsewhere. The repair stock kept on hand amounts to $6,000 and the repairs made annually to $7,500. Testimony was offered to the effect that this was the usual course of business of all automobile companies and that an abandonment of either the used-car business or the repair business would impair the sales of new cars. This narration of facts makes it plain that this petitioner is carrying on a very considerable local and domestic business quite separate and distinct from its interstate business. The petitioner contends that this domestic business is inseparable from its interstate commerce and hence that it is beyond the control of the statute. It was said in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Knight, 192 U. S. 21, at 28, 24 S. Ct. 202, 48 U. S. (L. ed.) 325, that "many things have more or less close relation to interstate commerce, which are not properly to be regarded as a part of it." The repair part of this company's business comes within the facts before the court in Atty.-Gen. v. Electric Storage Battery Co. 188 Mass. 239, 3 Ann. Cas. 631, 74 N. E. 467, and is concluded by that decision. Moreover, the sale of second hand automobiles is a business by itself. In effect the taking of a second hand machine as part payment for an new one is an investment of part of the proceeds of the sale of the new car. The keeping of these cars in stock and making sales from them is a domestic business and is not interstate commerce nor inseparably connected with it. There is ground for the argument that the transactions as to the new automobiles being shipped to its agent in Boston and separated and delivered to the several purchasers there and paid for there do not constitute interstate commerce, but sales from a local stock replenished by shipments. Apparently there is or may be no apportionment of any particular automobile until it is made by the agent in Boston, for the other may not identify a specific machine. See Caldwell v. North Carolina, 187 U. S. 622, 23 S. Ct. 229, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 336. But it is not necessary to discuss nor decide this point for the other branches of this company's business which have [575] been described are domestic and separate from this if it be assumed to be interstate. This case comes plainly within the principles established in S. S. White Dental Mfg. Co. v. Com. 212 Mass. 35, Ann. Cas. 1913C 805, 98 N. E. 1056, 231 U. S. 68, 34 S. Ct. 15, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 127.

12. The Northwestern Consolidated Milling Company is a corporation organized under the laws of Minnesota. It is authorized by its charter among other things to manufacture and sell flour. Its mills are located in Minnesota. It maintains a Boston office which has charge of the business of the company in New England and a part of New York. Sixteen travelling salesmen are connected with the office, seven of whom are devoted to the Massachusetts trade. These salesmen take orders for flour and other grain products from retailers. These orders are turned over to the nearest wholesale dealer, and the petitioner has nothing further to do with them. The situation is that the salesmen in the employ of the manufacturer are soliciting business for the wholesaler by whom they are not employed. The wholesaler fills from his stock the orders given by the retailer through these salesmen and the retailer pays him. These transactions are wholly between the domestic wholesaler and the domestic retailer. The wholesalers buy their stock from the petitioner by order to the Boston office. Such orders are sent to the petitioner in Buffalo or Minneapolis, and the goods are shipped to the wholesaler. In no case is there any approval of orders by the home office. One half of the sales from the Boston office are for delivery in Massachusetts. The petitioner keeps on hand in Boston a small stock from which it makes sales for delivery in Massachusetts. The major part of the petitioner's business in Massachusetts is furnishing salesmen to act as agents for the domestic wholesalers in soliciting orders from domestic retailers. This is in substance the business of providing agents for the wholesalers. The business done by the wholesaler and the retailer is a domestic business. The business of the petitioner is chiefly in aid of this domestic business, and partakes in no respect of interstate commerce. The motive which influences the petitioner in undertaking this business is inconsequential in determining whether it constitutes interstate commerce. The fact that a natural result may be to increase the sales of the petitioner to the wholesalers is an immaterial circumstance. It is too remote [576] from the actual business of the petitioner's salesmen to make that interstate commerce. Its sales of goods directly from local stock is also domestic, and not interstate in character. There is strong ground for the argument that this company also might be subject to the excise, because the orders from wholesalers are received and accepted, and the transaction in substance consummated at the Boston office. But is is not necessary to pass upon this point, because the manifestly domestic business of the petitioner of very considerable proportions renders it subject to the excise tax.

In none of the cases considered under paragraphs 9 to 12 both inclusive of this opinion is the intrastate business more intimately connected with interstate commerce than in Allen v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. 191 U. S. 171, 24 S. Ct. 39, 48 U. S. (L. ed.) 134; Pullman Co. v. Adams, 189 U. S. 420, 23 S. Ct. 494, 48 U. S. (L. ed.) 134; Osborne v. Florida, 164 U. S. 650, 17 S. Ct. 214; 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 585; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Knight, 192 U. S. 21, 24 S. Ct. 202, 48 U. S. (L. ed.) 325; Browning v. Waycross, 233 U. S. 16, 34 S. Ct. 578, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 828, in each of which it was held that the two were separable for purposes of a State excise on the domestic business.

13. The Copper Range Company is organized under the laws of Michigan. Its articles of association state that "the place where the business office of this corporation is located, without the limits of the State of Michigan, is Boston, Massachusetts." This petitioner is a "holding company" whose chief asset is stock in a foreign copper mining corporation, and it also holds the stock and bonds of a Michigan railroad and certain mineral lands. It transacts no commerce either here or elsewhere. Its activities in Massachusetts consisted in receiving monthly dividends from its stock in foreign corporations and depositing them in Boston banks, and the payment of these receipts, less officers' salaries and expenses, to its stockholders by way of dividends. Substantially its entire capital stock is owned by the Copper Range Consolidated Company, whose treasurer is also the treasurer of the petitioner. Its directors' meetings are held three or four times a year in Boston, and its annual stockholders' meeting is also held there. It declares and pays dividends several times annually. The president and treasurer are residents of Massachusetts, and it keeps its corporate records and financial books of account here. It does not appear expressly, but it fairly is inferable from the fact that its treasurer's office is here and its [577] accounts are kept here, that its assets also are kept here. The only question involved in this case is whether the petitioner is doing business in this Commonwealth. Apparently the main business of the corporation is conducted in Massachusetts. A holding company commonly has no business except the holding of its directors' and stockholders' meetings, the receipt of dividends and other income, the payment of its salaries and clerical and office expenses and the distribution of its profits among its stockholders. All of these functions are transacted in Massachusetts. It is significant of the view which the petitioner's incorporators had of its relation to Boston that they stated in their articles of association that its business office outside of Michigan was at Boston. It hardly could be contended that this was not a business corporation. It belongs to no other class of corporations known to the law. The performance of these functions in this Commonwealth constituted a doing of business within the Commonwealth. McCoach v. Minehill, etc. Haven R. Co. 228 U. S. 295, 33 S. Ct. 419, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 842, manifestly is distinguishable. The place where these activities are carried on property may be termed a usual place of business. Although the legal domicile of the petitioner is in Michigan, its substantial home appears to be in this State, where its essential corporate faculties are exercised. The exaction of a license fee for the transaction of these corporate functions is within the power of the State. Pullman Co. v. Adams, 189 U. S.

14. The Champion Copper Company is organized under the laws of Michigan, to mine, smelt and refine copper and other minerals, and to sell the same. Its articles of association state that the "place where the business office of this corporation is located, without the limits of the State of Michigan, is Boston, Massachusetts." It owns a copper mine in Michigan, where its copper is mined. Its product is sold exclusively through a selling agent in New York which represents the petitioner only with respect to making the contracts of sale and the collections from purchasers and remitting the proceeds to the treasurer of the petitioner. Deliveries under contracts of sale are exclusively under the direction of the petitioner's treasurer. The petitioner maintains its treasurer's office in Boston for the purpose of general [578] direction of the deliveries of copper in accordance with contracts made by its sales agent, and for the purpose of informing its sales agent as to amounts of copper to be sold and the prices, and for the necessary bookkeeping in connection with sales and deliveries, and for the deposit of funds received from all sources in Boston and other banks, the payment of its office expenses and salaries of its officers, and the distribution of dividends among its stockholders. The president and treasurer have their offices in Boston, and five of its seven directors reside in Massachusetts, where also directors' meetings are held during the year. At such meetings reports are submitted and dividends declared and votes passed authorizing the execution of deeds, conveying rights of way and other easements in land in Michigan. The company's mine in Michigan is by vote of its board of directors under the exclusive management of a general manager resident in Michigan. But the general management and control of all the business and property of the petitioner is vested in its directors. This summary of the transactions of the petitioner in Boston shows that it is transacting business there which is not interstate commerce. The articles of association manifest a purpose to maintain a business office in Boston. The functions performed by the president, treasurer and directors are such as commonly are essential to the operation of a business corporation. A considerable portion of the business transacted in Boston relates to matters quite unrelated to interstate commerce. It may be an interesting question whether a foreign corporation can select any place attractive from financial, economic, or other reasons, and establish there the management of all its interstate commerce, and seek immunity from any license for this privilege under the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, when there is no direct connection between such place and its interstate commerce. We do not understand that McCall v. California, 136 U. S. 104, 10 S. Ct. 881, 34 U. S. (L. ed.) 392 and Norfolk, etc. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 136 U. S. 114, 10 S. Ct. 958, 34 U. S. (L. ed.) 394, go to this extent. But it is not necessary to discuss this question nor to determine whether the exercise by the treasurer over the sales agent and the other instrumentalities of sale constitutes interstate commerce, Baltic Min. Co. v. Mass. 381, 387, 93 N. E. 831; U. S. v. E. C. Knight Co. 156 U. S. 1, 15 S. Ct. 249, 39 U. S. (L. ed.) 325, because apart from these considerations the corporate activities [579] conducted at Boston constitute a doing of business which has no direct relation to commerce. The entire corporate potentiality dwells in the Boston office. Its executive officers are there. The responsibility for its management as a corporation rests upon those whose headquarters are there. Respecting the effects of our excise law upon such a state of facts, the language of Pombina Consol. Silver Min. etc. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 181, 8 S. Ct. 737, 31 U. S. (L. ed.) 650, at page 184, is apposite: "It only exacts a license tax from the corporation when it has an office in the Commonwealth for the use of its officers, stockholders, agents, or employees. . . . The exaction of a license fee to enable the corporation to have an office for that purpose within the Commonwealth is clearly within the competency of its Legislature." Baltic Min. Co. v. Massachusetts, 231 U. S. 68, 34 S. Ct. 15, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 127.

15. The White Company is an Ohio corporation, organized to manufacture and sell automobiles. Its manufactory is in Ohio. It admits that it has a real and substantial local and domestic business. Its petition raises no question under the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, but it avers that it is denied the equal protection of the laws. Such protection is assured to it, by the Constitutions both of this Commonwealth and of the United States. Its contention rests on these facts. After 1903 (when St. 1903, c. 437, § 75, was in force) and before 1909 it acquired land in Boston, and built thereon a seven story building of steel, brick and concrete. It was especially adapted for use as a garage, and gasoline tanks, elevators and a turntable were installed, the total investment approximating $175,000. Adjoining property was acquired and remodelled and adapted for an automobile service station. This latter estate has not been occupied for several years, nor leased or sold, although it has been for lease or sale. The license fee exacted by the laws of the Commonwealth from foreign corporations has been made more onerous by the statute of 1909. The petitioner contends that these facts bring it within the principle established by Southern R. Co. v. Greene, 216 U. S. 400, 17 Ann. Cas. 1247, 30 S. Ct. 287, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 536.

The real estate acquired by this petitioner is of a kind adapted to a very considerable and increasing business, in which there is general competition. The storage and care of automobiles and the performance of necessary service for their repair, maintenance [580] and operation is a widespread business in which large amounts of capital are invested and considerable numbers of persons are engaged. Such establishments are frequent subjects for lease and sale. There is nothing to indicate or to warrant the inference that the petitioner's investment in real estate is not readily salable at reasonable prices. It is not property of a nature irretrievably devoted to a limited and monopolistic use, and not readily available either for other valuable uses or to other persons ready to devote it to the same uses at prices fairly equivalent, subject to the general vicissitudes of business conditions, to the original investment. The Greene case related to railroad property, which is not susceptible of use for any other purpose without great loss. In that opinion it was said, "It must always be borne in mind that property put into railroad transportation is put there permanently. It cannot be withdrawn at the pleasure of the investors."

The railroad must stay, and, as a permanent investment, its value to its owners may not be destroyed." 216 U. S. at page 414, citing Ames v. Union Pac. R. 64 Fed. 165, 177. In S. S. White Dental Mfg. Co. v. Massachusetts, 231 U. S. 68, 34 S. Ct. 15, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 127, at page 88, it was said respecting a similar contention: "The conditions existing in the Southern Railway Co. v. Greene case are not presented here. . . . We do not find in this situation an acquisition of permanent property, such as was shown in the Greene case." The facts in the case at bar are indistinguishable from those before the court in that case. "Permanent property," as these words were used in the opinion in the White Dental Company case referring to the Greene case, we interpret to mean at least a kind of property, ownership of which is inherently necessary for the establishment of the business, which must abide in the same ownership, and which cannot in the nature of things be sold in the general market so as to yield a fair return for the cost, less its normal depreciation. At all events, the Greene case does not exonerate this petitioner from liability to the excise.

Moreover, there is nothing to indicate that the purchase of real estate and the construction of a building were indispensable features of its initial admission to do business here. It is common knowledge that business like that of the petitioner often is conducted on leased property. There is a wide difference between [581] business of that sort and the operation of a railroad, which imperatively requires a roadbed and track.

The conclusion here reached seems to be supported also by Hammond Packing Co. v. Arkansas, 212 U. S. 322, 15 Ann. Cas. 645, 29 S. Ct. 370, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 530; Security Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Prewitt, 202 U. S. 246, 6 Ann. Cas. 317, 26 S. Ct. 619, 50 U. S. (L. ed.) 1013, and Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Texas, 177 U. S. 28, 20 S. Ct. 518, 44 U. S. (L. ed.) 657.

What has been said disposes of all the cases. It is not necessary to follow in detail the numerous requests for rulings. So far as they apply to any of the cases, the material principles to which they call attention have been discussed. Let entries be made for judgment in the several cases as follows:

NOTE.

Estoppel of Taxpayer to Question Validity of Tax.

The decisions discussing the estoppel of a taxpayer to question the validity of a tax turn, to a great extent, on the facts disclosed in each case. In the reported case, a company which had complied with one section of a law is held not to be estopped from contending that it did not come within the purview of another section of the same law which subjected certain corporations to an excise tax laid on them for the privilege of doing business in the state. There seems to be no other case similar in facts.

It has been held, however, that as the tax of each year is separate and distinct from that of previous years a person who has paid a certain tax is not estopped to deny the validity of the same tax in some subsequent year. Carpenter v. Central Covington, 119 Ky. 785, 81 S. W. 919, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 430; Matter of Wood, 24 Misc. 561, 54 N. Y. S. 30, reversed on other grounds 35 App. Div. 363, 54 N. Y. S. 978, reversal affirmed 163 N. Y. 605, 57 N. E. 1128. And where it appears that a person has no taxable property in a municipality he is not estopped to maintain an action to recover a tax paid under protest to the municipality merely because he failed to appear before a board of review to correct the assessment. Rice v. Muskegon, 150 Mich. 679, 114 N. W. 661. The same is true where the property on which taxes are paid under protest is later found not to be subject to taxation and the taxes therefore void. Woodmere Cemetery Assoc. v. Springwells, 130 Mich. 466, 90 N. W. 277, 9 Detroit Leg. N. 119.

It has been held that a person who in previous years has failed to make true statements to the taxing authorities as to the amount of his taxable property is not estopped by such conduct to maintain an action to recover taxes assessed wrongfully against him during a current year. Douglas County v. Lane, 76 Kan. 12, 90 Pac. 1092.

In Langworthy v. Dubuque, 13 Ia. 86, it appeared that by an amendatory act the limits of a city were increased by about six thousand acres, and the owners of certain lands included in this added area brought suit to restrain the city from collecting taxes which had been levied thereon. It was held that they were not estopped from contesting the right of the city to tax their property even though the testimony at the trial tended to show that the complainants had voted at the municipal election, and had paid taxes on the property assessed in prior years (sometimes with a protest) and also had prayed for improvements, some of which were granted.

It has been held, in an action by a collector of taxes of the city of C to recover taxes assessed on the personal property of the defendant's testator, where the defense was non-residence of the testator, that the defendants were not estopped to deny the residence of the testator in the city of C by reason of the fact that they had given a notice in writing to the assessors of the city, on which the latter in no way relied, that they had paid over the estate of the testator to the trustees appointed under the will and that they had no property whatever in their possession as executors, or because of the further fact that in offering the will of the testator for probate they had, in their petition to the court, described him as R who had dwelt in C and the decree of the probate court based on the petition described him as "late of" the same city. Dallinger v. Richardson, 176 Mass. 77, 57 N. E. 224.

In New York v. Thirty-Fourth St. Cross-town R. Co. 137 App. Div. 644, 122 N. Y. S. 344, it appeared that a street railway company had leased its line to a second company which operated the railway and paid a five per cent. gross tax yearly as required by law. The lessor company never ran any cars over the line after the lease but made reports to a city comptroller which indicated that it was still operating the road. In an action by the city to recover from the lessor company a tax of five per cent. of its gross business it was held that the company was not estopped to deny that it did not operate the road, because the city had not been induced in any way to change its position by reason of the action of the company in continuing to file reports after it had ceased to do any business.

In Leach v. Rolette County, 29 N. D. 593, 151 N. W. 768, it appeared that taxes had been paid to a county on land by the holder of a tax certificate, and that subsequently a suit by the United States government had resulted in a decree setting aside the taxes on the ground that the land in question belonged to it and not to the county from which the taxpayer had derived his title. In a suit by an assignee of the taxpayer for a refund of the taxes paid by him, under a statute which allowed a recovery in a case where a sale of land was declared void by a judgment of court, it was held that the plaintiff was not estopped to maintain the action because his assignor had not defended the suit by the federal government wherein the taxes were set aside.

Where a person pays taxes on a parcel of land, the description of which has been changed several times by the assessors, he is not estopped to question the validity of a tax on the land when described as lot 10 block 4 assessed in the name of "Nonresident" where it appears that at the time this assessment was laid he had paid taxes on land described as lots 8 and 9 block 4, even though at another subsequent time he had paid a tax on the land described as lots 9 and 10 block 4. Mayot v. Auditor General, 140 Mich. 593, 104 N. W. 19, 12 Detroit Leg. N. 279.

On the other hand it has been held that where a horse belonging to a delinquent taxpayer is seized to pay a tax, and the taxpayer brings an action of replevin to recover the animal, but pays the tax after the commencement of the suit, the doctrine of estoppel applies and he will not be allowed to assert at the trial that the tax is illegal. Bushby v. Noland, 39 Ind. 234.

So where a corporation reported to a state comptroller that its capital stock was $150,- 000, which includes $100,000 preferred stock, and the certificates representing the preferred stock might be considered either as obligations of debt or as contributions of capital to the company, it was held that in a proceeding to determine the liability of the corporation to a franchise tax the company was estopped to assert that the money represented by the preferred certificates did not constitute a part of its capital stock. People v. Miller, 180 N. Y. 16, 72 N. E. 525, affirming 94 App. Div. 564, 88 N. Y. S. 197.

In Phillips v. Payne, 92 U. S. 130, 23 U. S. (L. ed.) 649, it appeared that an act of Congress, which was in violation of the Constitution, authorized a plebiscite of the citizens of a certain county on the question as to whether they wished their county to be ceded from the United States to the state of Virginia. They voted in the affirmative and for a period of twenty-five years Virginia's title to and possession of the ceded territory had been undisputed, and she had exercised complete jurisdiction over it. In an action brought by a resident of the ceded area to recover taxes levied on him by the duly elected authorities therein, which he had paid under protest, it was held that he was estopped from raising the question as to the validity of the cession of the county to the state of Virginia as he could not, under the circumstances, vicariously raise a question, or force on the parties to the compact, an issue which neither of them desired to make.

It has been held that where a railroad company had done a telegraph business in connection with its railroad, but had a franchise to operate a railroad only, it would be estopped to deny that it had authority to do a telegraph business, in a suit brought by it to recover taxes paid by the company under a statute which provided that a State Board of Equalization "shall . . . in each year assess at its actual value the franchise and all other property within the state of all . . . telegraph or telephone companies." Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. v. Oppegard, 18 N. D. 1, 118 N. W. 830. To the same effect see Southern R. Co. v. Coulter, 113 Ky. 657, 68 S. W. 873, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 203. In Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. v. Oppegard, supra, the court said: "The plaintiff, having carried on a general telegraph business in connection with its railroad business, cannot be heard to now say it had no franchise or authority to do a telegraph business, for the purpose of defeating a tax levied upon its property that was used independently of any railroad business, and so used for compensation. The actual existence of a franchise from the state becomes immaterial, inasmuch as the plaintiff has actually assumed one. To permit it to defeat a tax now, on the ground that it has no franchise or authority, as a matter of fact, to do a telegraph business, would be permitting it to take advantage of its own wrong. The company will not now be heard to assert the fact that it had no authority to do a telegraph business. The company is estopped from showing such fact by reason of having assumed and asserted that authority. The tax will be upheld, not as levied upon an actual or assumed franchise, but upon the ground that the plaintiff has estopped itself from asserting that it had no franchise."

Where a company is permitted to operate steam cars along certain city thoroughfares and acquiesces in the view that the streets are public by dedication, and asserts no other right to use them than by the permission of the city, the company is estopped, in an action to test the right of the city to assess a tax on this right to use the streets as a special franchise, to claim that the streets are not public. People v. State Board of Tax Com'rs, 160 App. Div. 771, 146 N. Y. S. 112, affirming order 79 Misc. 124, 140 N. Y. S. 722.

COMMERCIAL NATIONAL BANK OF COUNCIL BLUFFS ET AL.

BOARD OF SUPERVISORS ET AL.

Iowa Supreme Court—January 22, 1915.

168 Iowa 501; 150 N. W. 704.

Taxes — Refund of Illegal Tax.

Under Code, § 1417, providing that the board of supervisors shall direct the treasurer to refund taxes erroneously paid or illegally exacted, the board must first ascertain whether the taxpayer is entitled to reimbursement, and, having done so, it is the treasurer's duty to repay from the particular funds into which the taxes have gone the amount of the illegal exaction.

Mandamus to Compel Refunding.

Code, § 1417, providing that the board of supervisors shall direct the treasurer to refund taxes erroneously or illegally exacted, is mandatory, and the board of supervisors may in a proper case be required by mandamus to order the treasurer to repay the taxes illegally collected.

Same.

Under Code, § 4341, providing for writ of mandamus to compel an inferior body or tribunal to execute a duty imposed by law, a writ of mandamus is the proper remedy to compel the board of supervisors to perform a duty imposed by law.

Voluntary Payment.

Under Code, § 1417, providing for the return of taxes erroneously or illegally exacted and paid, it is no defense that the taxes were paid voluntarily.

[See 94 Am. St. Rep. 425, 439.]

Payment under Unconstitutional Statute.

Taxes paid under a statute subsequently declared unconstitutional by the federal Supreme Court may be recovered back under Code, § 1417, providing for the return of taxes illegally exacted; for the statute was unconstitutional at the time of enactment, and the fact that it was not immediately declared so does not deprive the taxpayer of the right to reimbursement.

[See generally 6 R. C. L. tit. Constitutional Law, p. 117.]

Same.

Moneys collected as taxes under an unconstitutional statute may be recovered back under Code, § 1417, providing for the return of taxes illegally paid or exacted; such moneys being regarded as taxes.

Payment under Mistake of Law.

Under Code, § 1417, requiring the return of taxes illegally or erroneously exacted or paid, taxes paid under a mistake of law may be recovered.

Estoppel of Taxpayer to Recover Back Tax — Listing Property for Taxation.

Where plaintiff, pursuant to an unconstitutional statute, listed and paid taxes upon property which was not subject to taxation, the listing of the property does not estop plaintiff from asserting the illegality of the exaction and recovering the payment.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from District Court, Pottawattamie county: ARTHUR, Judge.

Action for mandamus. Commercial National Bank of Council Bluffs et al., plaintiffs, and Board of Supervisors, et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Frank J. Capell, D. E. Stuart, George Cosson and C. A. Robbins for appellants.

Reed & Robertson for appellees.

[502] LADD, J.—Plaintiff, as its name indicates, is a national banking association and sues for itself and in behalf of its stockholders. The stockholders also are made party plaintiffs. The shares of stock were regularly assessed under Sec. 1322 of the Code in each of four successive years beginning [503] with 1907 and taxes levied thereon and paid by the bank. On January 19, 1911, the statute mentioned was declared invalid for that it was in violation of Sec. 5219 of the revised statutes of the United States prohibiting any discrimination in favor of other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of the state, which comes in competition with the business of national banks. Easterville First Nat. Bank v. Easterville, 150 Ia. 95, 129 N. W. 475. In virtue of this decision, neither the shares nor the capital of national banks were assessable under the laws of this state. On May 9, 1912, and after the taxes had been distributed to the several funds for which collected, the plaintiff bank for itself and stockholders made a written demand upon the board of supervisors to direct the county treasurer to refund the several sums exacted and collected by him as taxes levied as aforesaid on the shares of capital stock; and as such demand was rejected, this suit in mandamus was begun to compel the said board to so direct the treasurer. Plaintiff relies on Sec. 1417 of the Code, providing that "The board of supervisors shall direct the treasurer to refund to the taxpayer any tax or portion thereof found to have been erroneously or illegally exacted or paid with all interest and costs actually paid thereon."

The defendant resisted on several grounds which will appear as we proceed.

I. The manifest design of this statute is that the board of supervisors first ascertain whether the taxpayer is entitled to be reimbursed for taxes illegally or erroneously exacted and if so, that the treasurer be directed to repay the same from the several funds to which these have passed. Such was the interpretation given in Iowa R. Land Co. v. Woodbury Co. 64 Ia. 212, 19 N. W. 915, where recovery against the county was denied, and this decision was followed in Eyerly v. Jasper County, 72 Ia. 149, 33 N. W. 609. It is the duty of the treasurer only to repay from the particular funds into which the taxes have gone and, when necessary, to ascertain by computation the [504] amount to be taken from each. Spencer Dist. Tp. v. Riverton Dist. Tp. 56 Ia. 85, 8 N. W. 784. The result attained is the restoration of the moneys illegally or erroneously paid by the taxpayer, and each fund continues as though these had never been collected. The remedy is perfect.

II. The duty of the board of supervisors is equally explicit. Having ascertained that the taxes have been illegally or erroneously exacted or paid, the statute prescribes precisely what shall be done, i. e., the board shall direct the treasurer to refund them to the taxpayer. Such an order is essential to repayment by the treasurer and to enter it, in a proper case, is the mandatory duty of the board of supervisors. That there is no adequate remedy at law sufficiently appears from the cases cited and as the contention is that the board of supervisors omitted a duty the performance of which the law enjoins, mandamus is the proper remedy. Section 4341, et seq., Code; Eyerly v. Jasper County, supra; See Beecher v. Clay County, 52 Ia. 140, 2 N. W. 1037; The Dubuque, etc. R. Co. v. Webster County, 40 Ia. 16.

III. The taxes were voluntarily paid as contended, but this furnishes no objection to refunding under this statute. Lauman v. Des Moines County, 29 Ia. 310; Richards v. Wapello County, 48 Ia. 507; Isbell v. Crawford County, 40 Ia. 102.

Nor is there anything in the argument that the decision declaring the taxing statute invalid should not operate retroactively. The statute was as vulnerable when enacted as when denounced as void in Estherville First Nat. Bank v. Estherville, supra, and nothing can be found in State v. O'Neil, 147 Ia. 513, Ann. Cas. 1912B 691, 126 N. W. 454, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 788, to the contrary. That the statute, though at all times void, had been unassailed up to that time does not render the previous exactions any the less illegal, but may excuse the plaintiff in acquiescing therein.

The suggestion that the moneys paid ought not to be [505] regarded as taxes within the meaning of the statute is without merit. They were levied and collected through the exercise of the taxing power of the state and to be used generally as other taxes. They were paid as such, and to hold that because illegally exacted moneys so paid are not contemplated as "taxes" in the statute quoted would involve a refinement of reasoning not to be indulged in. In referring to taxes as illegally exacted, reference necessarily is had to those which ought not to have been collected. Kehe v. Blackhawk County, 125 Ia. 549, 101 N. W. 281, relied on, contains nothing to the contrary, especially as there was no assessment of property in that case. The point is not well taken.

IV. Counsel argue that inasmuch as the taxes were paid under mistake of law, the suit cannot be maintained. That this is the general rule goes without saying. Ahlers v. Estherville, 130 Ia. 272, 104 N. W. 453. But Sec. 1417 of the Code heretofore quoted expressly declares that if illegally or erroneously exacted or paid, the treasurer shall be directed to refund. Surely if the assessment of the property and levy of taxes thereon was contrary to law, because not authorized by a valid statute, the exaction of the taxes so levied would be illegal, and so regardless of the view thereof entertained by public officers.

In Dubuque, etc. R. Co. v. Webster County, 40 Ia. 16, the taxes sought to be refunded had been properly levied but the plaintiff had paid them under the mistaken belief that it had title to the property taxed when in fact it belonged to another. In denying relief, the court, after saying that recovery might not be had but for Sec. 762 of the Revision, continued: "This section does not contemplate an error of judgment as to the law respecting the title to the land, committed by the taxpayer. It was not intended to protect him against errors or mistakes of law committed by himself but against errors and illegalities committed by the [506] officers of the law to whom is entrusted the duties of assessing, levying and collecting taxes."

In Kehe v. Blackhawk County, 125 Ia. 549, 101 N. W. 281, the amount for which Kehe would have been liable for taxes had he not withheld his property from taxation was settled by him with the tax ferret and paid to the county treasurer without an assessment having been made, and it was held that though the statute of limitations had run against a portion of it and payment might not have been enforced, still as payment was through no fault of the officers, but owing to an error on his part, the statute afforded him no relief. The precise point was decided in Lauman v. Des Moines County, 29 Ia. 310, where the court held that taxes paid on shares of the capital stock of a national bank should be refunded under Sec. 762 of the Revision, in substance like the present statute, a previous decision, Hubbard v. Johnson County, 23 Ia. 130, having declared statutes taxing the same invalid because inconsistent with provisions of the National Banking Act. The mistake of law which will not sustain an order for relief is that of plaintiff alone; the illegality or error which will sustain such relief must be that of the taxing officers; and if what they do appears to be illegal or erroneous, the statute, in the plainest terms requires the board of supervisors to refund taxes exacted or paid, by reason thereof. The collection or receipt of taxes on property which the law did not subject to taxation was illegal and such as the statute quoted contemplates shall be refunded.

V. Counsel contend that because of having listed the bank stock with and furnishing the assessor the information exacted by Sec. 1322 of the Code without objection, the plaintiff is estopped from asserting the illegality of the taxes subsequently paid. That such is the rule where the owner voluntarily lists taxable property for assessment and taxation appears from Slimmer v. Chickasaw County, 140 Ia. 448, 17 Ann. Cas. 1028, 118 N. W. 779. But such a submission of property not taxable confers no authority on the taxing [507] officers to assess or levy a tax thereon, and being without authority so to do, the taxpayer cannot be estopped by such listing from asserting such want of authority or the illegality of taxes levied and collected thereon. In such a case, the taxing officers cannot be said to have been misled by what the taxpayer may have done, for they are chargeable with knowledge of the law and must be assumed to have been aware of the invalidity of the taxing statute. As a fact, however, all were laboring under a misapprehension in construing the statute as valid, else the shares of stock would not have been assessed, and this statute affords a remedy to those who aid the assessor and promptly meet the apparent demands of the public by providing for refunding them if afterwards they are found to have been illegal.

We are of opinion that as the property was not taxable the doctrine of estoppel ought not to be applied. The decree has our approval and is Affirmed.

NOTE.

Estoppel of Taxpayer Returning Property for Taxation to Dispute Assessment Based on Return.

The cases passing on the question whether a taxpayer who returns property for taxation is estopped to dispute an assessment based on his return, since the decision in Skinner v. Chickasaw County, 17 Ann. Cas. 1028, assert the existence of such an estoppel. See In re Bushnell, 215 Fed. 651, 654; Dull v. Le Fevre, 222 Fed. 471, 474; Millsaps v. Traylor, 128 La. 1068, 55 So. 677. This rule is expressly recognized by the court in the reported case but is regarded as being inapplicable to the case of a complete lack of authority in the taxing officers to declare any assessment. In the case of In re Bushnell, 215 Fed. 651, 654, the rule was tersely stated as follows: "If there is no competent evidence from which it may be found that the assessed valuation was unjust or illegal, a taxpayer is bound and estopped by his own statements, as to the nature, title, and value of his property (Waterbury v. O'Loughlin, 79 Conn. 630, 66 Atl. 173; Union School Dist. of Guilford v. Bishop, 76 Conn. 695, 58 Atl. 13, 66 L.R.A. 989, 37 Cyc. 994, 5 Cyc. 341)." In that case it appeared that certain creditors of a bankrupt disputed the taxes assessed on the bankrupt's property on the ground that they were excessive. The court said: "It was shown that in each of the years mentioned (excepting 1912), the bankrupt returned his assessment lists to the board of assessors, subscribed and sworn to by him in person, as required by the statute laws of Connecticut, and that in all said lists so returned the amounts employed in merchandise and trade were set forth in the same amounts that the trustee now disputes. It was also shown that the original assessment lists, including the personal property of the bankrupt and the items and amounts employed in merchandise and trade, disputed by the trustee, were the same lists subscribed, verified and returned by the bankrupt. . . . If the bankrupt from 1906 to 1911, inclusive, had believed that the assessments were too high, the statute laws of the state afforded him ample remedy for a reduction of those assessments, and neither he nor his trustee can now complain that those assessments were excessive." And in Dull v. LeFevre, 222 Fed. 471, 474, it was said: "And the rule seems to be well established that a taxpayer is bound and estopped by his own statements as to the nature, title, and value of his property made in the list which he returns for taxation, although, of course, he can prejudice no one else by listing property which he does not own, nor can he make such a list a covenant for a title." In that case it appeared that a smelting company in its tax return listed certain improvements such as sawmill smelting plants erected on its lands as personal property. Defendant a purchaser at a tax sale contended that the improvements were real estate and that the assessment of such as personal property was void. But the court said: "These improvements having been fairly and honestly assessed as personal property by direction of the corporation, the assessment and sale must stand."

In French v. New Rochelle, 141 App. Div. 8, 125 N. Y. S. 8, 677, as in the reported case, it was held that a taxpayer was not estopped to assert the invalidity of an assessment which was so improper in manner and form as to be totally invalid. And in Slade v. Butte County, 14 Cal. App. 463, 112 Pac. 485, it was held that a person who listed certain property purchased from the state, but the title to which in fact remained in the United States government, was not estopped to dispute the validity of the tax. The court said: "One question only remains: Is plaintiff estopped from asserting the invalidity of the assessment because he filed with the assessor a verified statement of the property in question for taxation? The answer must be in the negative. The transaction lacks the necessary elements of estoppel. Besides, if the facts bear the semblance of estoppel, they show the state to be the greater offender, for it was through the promise of the state that the land could be acquired under lieu location that plaintiff and his predecessors parted with their money. If anyone was misled it was the plaintiff."

MAYOR AND CITY COUNCIL OF BALTIMORE ET AL.

Maryland Court of Appeals—March 19, 1914.

123 Md. 142; 90 Atl. 983.

Streets — Vacation — Right of Property Owner to Compensation.

Under Const. art. 3, § 40, forbidding the enactment of any law authorizing private property to be taken for public use without just compensation, Code Pub. Loc. Laws, art. 4, § 6 (Laws 1898, c. 123), authorizing the mayor and city council of Baltimore to provide for laying out, opening, closing, etc., any street in such city, and to ascertain the damages caused thereby to the owner of any ground or improvements for which he ought to be compensated, and section 175 et seq., providing the procedure for opening and closing streets, an owner of property abutting on a street one block of which was closed, but not abutting on the portion of the street so closed, and whose ingress to and egress from its property is not therefore affected, though the direct approach thereto from one direction is cut off, requiring a more circuitous route, is not entitled to damages.

Appeal from Baltimore City Court:
STUMP, Judge.

Condemnation proceeding. Mayor and City Council of Baltimore et al., plaintiffs, and German Evangelical Lutheran Saint Lucas Congregation of Baltimore City, defendant. From judgment rendered, defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Edicard L. Ward for appellant.

Joseph S. Goldsmith, Duncan K. Brent, S. S. Field and Benjamin H. McKindless for appellees.

[143] Boyd, C. J.—This is an appeal from the Baltimore City Court granting a motion of the appellees to dismiss the appeal of the appellant from the action of the Commissioners for Opening [144] Streets in the City of Baltimore. The Mayor and City Council of Baltimore passed an ordinance, known as No. 387, and approved on the 16th of August, 1909, which provided for the elimination of certain crossings at grade over the tracks of the B. & O. R. R. Co., between Camden and Ostend streets, for the construction and maintenance of bridges and approaches carrying Lee street, Hamburg street, Stockholm street and Cross street over the tracks of said railroad, and, amongst other things, for condemning and closing certain portions of a number of streets named, including Henrietta, between the east side of Eutaw and the west side of Howard street. It was the same ordinance which was before this Court in Walters v. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. 120 Md. 644, 88 Atl. 47, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1128, but a wholly different question is now presented.

The appellant owns a property on the southwest corner of Henrietta and Eutaw streets, which fronts 155 feet on the former and 75 feet on the latter—running from Eutaw street on the east to an alley 20 feet wide on the west. The lot is improved by a church, a school house and a parsonage. The appellant contends that this property will be greatly damaged by the closing of this part of Henrietta street, and it endeavored to have the Commissioners for Opening Streets allow it damages for the injuries thereby sustained. The Commissioners refused to allow any damages and that refusal resulted in the appeal to the Baltimore City Court. Considerable testimony was taken in the lower Court by the appellant, tending to show that its property was materially depreciated in value by the closing of the part of Henrietta street—although it was in direct conflict with that offered by the appellees. The motion to dismiss the appeal, which was granted by the lower Court, was as follows: "The City contends that the appellant has not proved any damage to its property as a consequence of the closing of Henrietta street, between the east side of Eutaw street and the west side of Howard street, of such nature as to entitle it to any award in this case, and therefore prays that the appeal be dismissed."

[145] The appellant's property does not abut on the portion of the street which was closed; but is on another square which is bounded on the north by Henrietta street, on the east by Eutaw street, on the south by Hamburg street and on the west by Warner street, there being also an alley 20 feet wide which runs from Hamburg to Henrietta street at the west side of the appellant's property. The part of Henrietta street which is closed is east of the intersection of Henrietta and Eutaw streets, both of which are 66 feet wide. The ingress to and egress from the property has not been affected, but the direct approach to it from the east by way of Henrietta street is cut off and requires a more circuitous route. There were 10 or 12 tracks of the B. & O. R. R. Co. which crossed Henrietta street at grade, between Eutaw and Howard, before Henrietta street was closed. The access from the north, south and west have not been affected, and there will be two overhead bridges crossing the railroad tracks within a few squares of the property when the proposed improvement is completed.

When the location of the appellant's property is borne in mind, and it is also remembered that this is a condemnation proceeding into which the appellant has come, there cannot be much difficulty in reaching a correct conclusion under the decisions of this and other Courts. The provisions of section 40 of Article 3 of our Constitution that the General Assembly "shall enact no law authorizing private property to be taken for public use, without just compensation," etc., have been before this Court many times, and although the Constitution does not declare what rights shall be regarded as property, or what shall constitute a "taking" within its meaning, there are decisions which are conclusive of those questions. In the familiar case of O'Brien v. Baltimore Belt R. Co. 74 Md. 363, 22 Atl. 141, 13 L.R.A. 126, Chief Judge Alvey, in delivering the opinion of the Court, said: "In such case as this, therefore, it would seem to be clear, both upon principle and authority, that there is no such taking of private property for public use as is contemplated by the Constitution of the State; and hence there [146] is no ground for any preliminary proceeding by way of condemnation." O'Brien was the owner of a lot of ground and improvements thereon, situate on the east side of Howard street, between Camden and Lee streets, and conducted there a livery stable business. His bill alleged that the railroad company was about to dig up the west half of the bed of Howard street, in front of his property, to a depth of from ten to twenty-four feet, below the then surface of the street; that it was an open cut and, when made, Howard street, between Camden and Lee, would be destroyed as a public highway to the extent of the cut, and devoted to the exclusive use of the railroad company. The plaintiff sought to enjoin the defendant, and the case was before this Court on an appeal from an order refusing to grant the injunction. The Court referred to the unquestioned right and power of the Legislature, through the agency of the municipal government, to change and alter the grades of existing streets, without liability to the abutting owners of property for the mere consequential damages that may be suffered by reason of the changed condition of the streets, but said that that reason, applicable to the change of grade and the improvement of streets for municipal purposes, did not apply in the case of a grant of power to change the grade of and occupy the street with steam railroad tracks, by a railroad company, having no connection with the municipal government. Notwithstanding the fact that that improvement was exclusively by and for the railroad company, the Court announced the conclusion stated above. In considering the question it said: "It is not charged that there will be any invasion of or physical interference with any part of the plaintiff's lot, in the construction of the road. The most that he claims for is that he will be deprived of the full use of the street, as it now exists, and that his property will be depreciated in value, by the construction of the road. This, however, is but an injury, to whatever extent it may be suffered, of an incidental or consequential nature. The construction of the railroad being authorized by competent authority, it cannot be treated as a [147] public nuisance, and no right of action can arise against the company before it is known whether, and to what extent damages may be sustained by the construction of the road in the bed of the street."

In the case of Garrett v. Lake Roland El. R. Co. 79 Md. 277, 29 Atl. 830, 24 L.R.A. 396, the same principles were announced by Judge McSherry. Mr. Garrett was the owner of unimproved lots fronting 436 feet on the west side of North street, which was 36 feet wide between the curbs and 60 feet between the building lines. The railroad company erected in front of Mr. Garrett's property a stone abutment, forming an incline plane, to carry on its highest side the iron superstructure for an elevated road, and to serve on its surface as the northern approach to that elevated road. It was 83 feet, 2½ inches in length and 15½ feet in width. It started at the street grade and gradually rose to a height of 9 feet—leaving a space between its western face and the curb line contiguous to Mr. Garrett's property of 9 feet, 8½ inches. The erection of that structure was held not to be a taking of private property for public use within the meaning of the Constitution. See also Poole v. Falls Road Electric R. Co. 88 Md. 533, 41 Atl. 1069.

Those cases should be sufficient to dispose of this appeal, unless there be some statute upon which the appellant can rely. In each of them the act complained of was exclusively for the benefit of the railroad company proceeded against, and the municipality had no such interest as it has in the execution of this ordinance. We will not now stop to consider the distinction between this case and those, by reason of the fact that this is a condemnation proceeding by the city, for even if the railroad company was conducting the proceedings, it could not be said that there was a taking of the appellant's property. Section 6 of Article 4, entitled City of Baltimore, of Code of Public Local Laws (Baltimore City Code, 1906, section 6, subsection 26), gives the Mayor and City Council power "To provide for laying out, opening, extending, widening, straightening or closing up, in whole or in part, any [148] street, square, lane or alley within the bounds of said city, which in its opinion the public welfare or convenience may require," and then continues: "To provide for ascertaining whether any, and what amount in value, of damage will be caused thereby, and what amount of benefit will thereby accrue to the owner or possessor of any ground or improvements within or adjacent to said city, for which said owner or possessor ought to be compensated, or ought to pay a compensation, and to provide for assessing or levying, either generally on the whole assessable property of said city, or specially on the property of persons benefited, the whole or any part of the damages and expenses which it shall ascertain will be incurred in locating, opening, extending, widening, straightening or closing up the whole or any part of any streets," etc. Then section 175 (Baltimore City Charter) provides that whenever the Mayor and City Council shall by ordinance direct the Commissioners for Opening Streets to lay out, open, extend, widen, straighten or close up, in whole or part, any street, etc., the Commissioners "shall ascertain whether any and what amount of value in damages will thereby be caused to the owner of any right or interest in any ground or improvements within or adjacent to the City of Baltimore, for which, taking into consideration all the advantages and disadvantages, such owner ought to be compensated."

Section 175 and the succeeding sections provide the procedure by which streets, squares, lanes or alleys can be laid out, opened, etc., and cannot be construed as intended to allow damages which were not previously allowed. The part of section 6 which is quoted above was passed in 1838, Chapter 226, and was codified as section 837 of Article 4 of Code of Public Local Laws of 1860. The same language was continued in section 806 of that Article of Code of 1888. The Mayor and Council of Baltimore had, under the authority so given, passed an ordinance prescribing the manner of proceeding in opening, closing, etc., streets, as early as 1841, [149] (Alexander v. Baltimore, 8 Gill (Md.) 383, 46 Am. Dec. 630), and when the present charter was adopted, the provisions of section 175 were in that ordinance; Baltimore City Code of 1893, Article 48, section 6; but notwithstanding the provisions of section 6 have been in the charter, and those of section 175, in the ordinance passed in pursuance of the charter, for so many years, we have been cited to no case, and are aware of none, which justifies the contention of the appellant that in a condemnation proceeding for opening, closing, etc., streets, damages can be allowed for a property situated as that of the appellant is. On the contrary, the cases of O'Brien v. Baltimore Belt R. Co. Garrett v. Lake Roland El. R. Co., and Poole v. Falls Road Electric R. Co., cited above, were decided while those provisions were in full force, and no reference to them was made. Moreover, by the terms of the statute, the Commissioners are only entitled to allow the damage "for which, taking into consideration all advantages and disadvantages, such owner ought to be compensated"—meaning, of course, such as he ought to be compensated for under the established rules of law and practice in such cases.

As illustrating how other Courts have regarded the provisions of statutes in such cases, we will refer to some of their decisions. Smith v. Boston, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 254; Castle v. Berkshire County, 11 Gray (Mass.) 26, and Davis v. Hampshire County, 153 Mass. 218, 26 N. E. 848, 11 L.R.A. 750, were decided when there was a statute in Massachusetts which provided that, "In estimating the damages sustained by any person in his property, by the laying out, altering or discontinuing of any highway, the jury shall take into consideration all the damages done to the complainant, whether by taking his property, or by injuring it in any way," but that language was not deemed sufficient by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts to entitle an owner to compensation for depreciation of his property which did not immediately abut upon the part of the highway which was vacated. In Cram v. Laconia, 71 N. H. 41; 57 L.R.A. 282, and 51 Atl. 635, the statute in force [150] was, "the damages sustained . . . by the discontinuance of a highway . . . may be assessed," etc. The Court said: "Taken literally, this statute is broad enough to allow damages for all injuries, whether special or general. But it has been limited by construction, in accordance with the principle already stated"—which was that only such damages as are not common to the public, but are peculiar and special, and the direct result of the discontinuance may be allowed. In Enders v. Friday, 78 Neb. 510, 15 Ann. Cas. 685, 111 N. W. 140, the statute had this provision: "Provided, that all damages sustained by the citizens of the city or village, or of the owners of the property therein, shall be ascertained in such manner as shall be provided by ordinance;" in East St. Louis v. O'Flynn, 119 Ill. 200, 10 N. E. 395, and 59 Am. Rep. 795, the statute provided: "Where property is damaged by the vacating or closing of any street or alley, the same shall be ascertained and paid as provided by law." Those Courts declined to allow damages to those whose property did not abut on the highways closed. In the Illinois case the Court cited Chicago v. Union Bldg. Assoc. 102 Ill. 379, 40 Am. Rep. 598, and Littler v. Lincoln, 106

Ill. 353, in the last of which it was said, "the rights or privileges of other proprietors in the plat, which the statute protects, are necessarily legal rights and privileges, and such parties cannot, therefore, be affected by the closing of streets not adjacent to their property, nor directly affording access thereto, and egress therefrom." In Howell v. Morrisville, 212 Pa. St. 353, 61 Atl. 932, the Court refused to allow damages for vacation of a public road under the Act of 1891 referred to in that case, because it contained no express grant to property owners of the right to damages for vacation, nor any clear implication of an intent to increase the obligations of the cities or enlarge the rights or claims of property holders, and went on to say: "Even if the purpose of the Act were less plain than it is, the Court would not be justified in stretching its terms by a loose construction to cover the exceptional case [151] of vacation of roads. The general rule is founded not only on sound reason, but also on sound policy and justice. While it may be admitted that substantial injury may occasionally result from the vacation of a street, yet it is exceptional, and confined to closely built cities. Even there, if damages are provided for, they should be most carefully hedged about to prevent the inevitable tendency to run off into speculative and shadowy claims that have no real foundation."

The appellant contended that what was said in Baltimore v. Smith, etc. Brick Co. 80 Md. 458, 31 Atl. 423, went far to sustain its position, but it seems to us, that in so far as it is applicable at all it has just the opposite effect. We held in that case that the appeal from the assessment of benefits did not bring up for review the damages allowed, under the statute as it then existed. After showing how the benefits are assessed, and the damages allowed, we said: "In other words, they take such property as is needed for the bed of the street and allow the respective owners compensation for it according to its then market value; they then direct that A, B, and C, as owners of ground or improvements somewhere in or adjacent to the city, will be directly benefited after the street is opened, determine how much, and so assess them. If there is a shortage in the benefit column, the account is balanced by the city. It matters not whether A's property thus to be benefited is adjoining to or a part of the property taken for the bed of the street, or whether it is on another square on the street to be opened or in some other locality; if it will be directly benefited he is assessed accordingly, and called upon to contribute to the payment for said street to the extent he is so benefited. It seems clear that the two transactions of fixing damages or compensation and of assessing benefits, are separate and distinct." It is implied as clearly as could well be that in allowing damages it does matter whether the property to be paid for "is adjoining to or a part of the property taken for the bed of the street, or whether it is on another square on the street to be opened, or in some other locality," [152] while in assessing benefits it does not matter. No case can be found in Maryland where damages have been allowed for property not "adjoining to or a part of the property taken for the bed of the street." When a part of a property is taken and damages are allowed for injury to the remainder, it is because by taking the part the value of the remainder is lessened, but damages are only allowed even for abutting property, not within the lines of the condemnation, when the owner is deprived of his right of ingress or egress, or there has been something done amounting to a taking of the property, as illustrated by the case of Walters v. Baltimore etc. R. Co. 120 Md. 644, 88 Atl. 47, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1128.

As the decisions are so numerous it will be convenient to refer to the textbooks which are one way, and it can be safely said that except in cases controlled by some special constitutional or statutory provision the decisions are practically unanimous against the appellant's contention. Where the vacation of the street is in front of the plaintiff's property or in the same block, so that his access is cut off entirely, the decisions hold either that it is a taking of the property, or at least that the owner is entitled to damages, and if under those circumstances his access is cut off in one direction, so as to put his property in a cul de sac, perhaps most authorities holds that he is entitled to damages. In 1 Lewis on Em. Dom. (3rd Ed.) sec. 203, that author, after having considered the other classes of cases, said: "The case now to be considered is where the vacation is in the next or some remoter block and the plaintiff has left access in both directions to the system of streets. To reach certain points in the direction of the vacation, the plaintiff must make a detour and this fact and the diversion of travel and the loss of a thoroughfare depreciate the value of his property. The decisions are nearly unanimous to the effect that in such case the plaintiff's property is not taken or damaged and that he cannot prevent the closing of the street or recover damages therefor. While this conclusion may be correct so far as the question [153] of a taking is concerned, its correctness may be questioned when, by virtue of the Constitution or a statute, compensation is given for property damaged or injured." In 2 Elliott on Roads and Streets (3rd Ed.) sec. 1181, it is said: "Owners of lands abutting on neighboring streets or upon other parts of the same street, at least when beyond the next cross street, are not, however, entitled to damages notwithstanding the value of their lands may be lessened by its vacation or discontinuance." In 3 McQuillin on Mun. Cor. sec. 1410, the rule is thus stated: "If the street directly in front of one's property is not vacated, but the portion vacated is in another block, so that he may use an intersecting cross street, although perhaps it is not quite so short a way nor as convenient, it is almost universally held that he does not suffer such a special injury as entitles him to damages. And this is so notwithstanding the new route is less convenient or the diversion of travel depreciates the value of his property."

In 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 116, it is said: "It is generally held that owners of property not abutting on the street vacated have no such property in the street as entitles them to damages for its vacation were there is still left means of communication with other streets, and whatever detriment or inconvenience they may suffer by the closing of the street they must bear in common with the community at large for the public convenience and welfare." In 37 Cyc. 193, it is said: "On the other hand many cases hold that the vacation of a highway in such a manner as to deprive an abutting owner of access to his property is a 'taking' of property within the Constitutional prohibition, for which compensation must be made. This right to damages does not extend to owners of land not abutting on the highway vacated, and accessible by other ways, unless the statute allowing damages is broad enough to include such persons." The summary of a note to the case of Enders v. Friday, 78 Neb. 510, as reported in 15 Ann. Cas. 685, 111 N. W. 140, is: "As a general rule property owners whose lands do not abut upon the portion of the [154] street vacated, and access to whose property is not cut off, are not entitled to compensation because of such vacation. This is especially true in the absence of a showing, on the part of the non-abutting owner, of a special and direct damage, instead of one merely suffered in common with the general public." In 3 Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) sec. 1160, on page 1842, that author says: "Many decisions declare that, as a general rule only property abutting on the portion of the street closed is specially damaged by the vacation, and that only such abutter can recover damages or compensation for the taking of this property. Hence, if the property of the abutter is located on another street or on a different part of the same street, he is not entitled to compensation or damages. In other States this limitation is not observed, and decisions are to be found to the effect that the owner of property which does not abut on the part of the street closed is entitled to compensation, provided he is able to prove special and peculiar damage." It will be well in passing to remark that the cases cited in the note in support of the last statement are Chicago v. Baker, 86 Fed. 753, 58 U. S. App. 569, 30 C. C. A. 364; Chicago v. Burcky, 158 Ill. 103, 42 N. E. 178, 49 Am. St. Rep. 142, 29 L.R.A. 568; In re Melon St. 182 Pa. St. 397, 38 Atl. 482, 38 L.R.A. 275, and Highbarger v. Milford, 71 Kan. 331, 80 Pac. 633, but it will be seen by an examination of them that the vacation left the property in a cul de sac and in some instances there were special statutes. The case of Henderson v. Lexington, 132 Ky. 390, 111 S. W. 318, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 20, cited in that note, is an instructive one, and after discussing various questions in connection with the subject we have been considering, it is said: "Therefore the equitable and practicable rule is to limit the persons entitled to compensation and to be made parties, to the property owners abutting on the street, alley or highway proposed to be closed between the nearest streets intersected by the street, alley, or highway to be closed."

The cases cited by the above authors are very numerous. Whatever apparent conflict there is between them is more apparent than real. There can be no doubt that most of the [155] decisions rendered in cases where the facts are similar to those before us hold that the owner is not entitled to damages. In Davis v. Hampshire County 153 Mass. 218, 26 N. E. 848, 11 L.R.A. 750, the Court said: "Although the doctrine may sometimes be rather harsh in its application to special cases, there are sound reasons on which it rests. The chief of these reasons are, that to hold otherwise would be to encourage many trivial suits, that it would discourage public improvements if a whole neighborhood were allowed to recover damages for such injuries to their estates, and that the loss is of a kind which purchasers of land must be held to have contemplated as liable to occur, and to have made allowance for in the price which they paid," and in Nichols v. Richmond, 162 Mass. 170, 38 N. E. 501, it was said: "The line has to be drawn somewhere, on practical grounds, between those who may and those who may not recover for damages caused by the discontinuance, in whole or in part, of a street or way; and it has been drawn so as to limit the right of recovery to damages which are special and peculiar and different in kind from those suffered by the public at large." The case of Smith v. Boston, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 254, is a leading one, and is relied on, not only in subsequent decisions in Massachusetts, but by many other Courts. In Cram v. Laconia, supra, the subject is thoroughly discussed and many of the cases considered. The Court after stating the facts in the case of In re Mt. Washington Road Co. 35 N. H. 134, said: "Here, as there, the damage claimed is not for the taking of the plaintiff's land, or any direct invasion of his property, but, as distinctly appears from the case, for loss of business and depreciation of property resulting from a diversion of travel occasioned by a legitimate public improvement." In both cases that Court refused relief. In the last one it said that it was helped to a correct understanding and application of the rule by the cases in that State relating to the set off of benefits where land was taken for highway purposes: that "it has been repeatedly held in this State that benefits from improved [156] facilities of communication, favorable diversion of travel, increased trade and appreciation of property, resulting from the establishment of a new highway, cannot be set off against damages, because they are general and not special benefits." After citing a number of authorities it said: "If favorable diversion of travel and consequent increase of trade and appreciation of property, resulting from the opening of a highway, are general benefits, why are not unfavorable diversion of travel, and consequent decrease of trade and depreciation of property, resulting from the discontinuance of a highway, general damages?" That question is peculiarly appropriate here because in Friedenwald v. Baltimore, 74 Md. 126, 21 Atl. 555, this Court said: "There can be no doubt about the general proposition that increased facilities for travel enjoyed by the appellant, in common with the community in general, is not a proper element to be considered by the jury in estimating benefits." Although we have not been heretofore called upon to pass the particular question involved in this case, we have in analogous cases announced the rule which is applicable. In Houck v. Wachter, 34 Md. 265, 6 Am. Rep. 332, which was an action to recover damages for the alleged obstruction of a highway, Chief Judge Bartol said: "All the authorities agree that to support the action the damage must be different, not merely in degree, but different in kind from that suffered in common, hence it has been well settled, that though the plaintiff may suffer more inconvenience than others from the obstruction, by reason of his proximity to the highway, that will not entitle him to maintain an action." The fact that that plaintiff "was obliged to proceed to his farm by a very circuitous route" was not sufficient to enable him to recover. In Bembe v. Anne Arundel County, 94 Md. 321, 51 Atl. 179, 57 L.R.A. 279, the narr. was sustained only because it distinctly alleged that the highway, with the bridge in question, was the only means by which the appellant had access to and egress from his farm, which consequently showed an injury differing in kind from that which other members of the community suffered [157] from the same cause, and the Court, through Chief Judge McSherry, in holding that the demurrer should have been overruled, took occasion to add: "Of course, if the appellant,—the plaintiff below—has any other way or road by which he can get to and from his premises, he cannot maintain this action even though he is put to more inconvenience, or is required to travel a much greater distance in using the other highway." So in Anne Arundel County v. Watts, 112 Md. 353, 76 Atl. 82, the recovery was sustained because it was alleged and proved that the plaintiff was deprived of the use of the only public road which passed the points between which the materials he was to use were to be hauled—he being under penalty to do the work within a limited time. Those and similar cases which might be cited were cases in which the defendants were not acting as authorized by the law, as the appellees are, yet the plaintiffs were required to show that the highways were the only ones they could use, in order to establish such special damages as entitled them to recover.

If the appellant's right to recover be on the theory that the closing of this part of Henrietta street has caused it to lose some of its church members, it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to fix such damages in dollars and cents by any known rule of law. A church member who would leave his church merely because he had to go a square or two further to get there than he formerly did would not, as a general rule, be a very serious loss to the church, but if any one did absent himself for that reason, how could the financial loss be estimated? Even if it could be proved that he had been paying so much per year, his death, removal or other change might deprive the church of that income at any time. Such loss would be of the most speculative character, and it is not perceived how the loss in membership could in other respects be considered as ground for damages. Moreover, it is an established fact in this case, that there are conditions existing in that part of the city which would necessarily affect this congregation. The uncontradicted evidence is that a considerable [158] part of the territory, on both sides of the railroad, from which this church would naturally have derived a good deal of its membership, is now mainly, and in some squares exclusively, occupied by colored people. It may be that the improvements made under this ordinance, of which this closing of Henrietta street is a part, is, to some, possibly a large extent responsible for the change in the class of residents living there, but surely no one will contend that in assessing damages for closing a block of Henrietta street, all that is done or to be done under this ordinance is to be taken into consideration. We speak of such matters to show how impossible it would be to allow damages to cover such injuries as the appellant claims to have sustained, if we are to be governed by established rules of law and not be led off into what is pure speculation and beyond definite ascertainment. So far as affecting the value of appellant's property is concerned, it may be different in degree, but is not different in kind, from that of the owners of other properties situated in this neighborhood. If the appellant is entitled to damages, every owner on both sides of Henrietta, from Eutaw to Warner street, and from Howard to Sharp, would be, and if they are those on cross streets, or a little further off on Henrietta or some parallel street might claim damages on the same ground. As said by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, supra, the line must be drawn somewhere, and unless there be some very unusual and extraordinarily peculiar conditions, we think that drawn by the great weight of authority, which we have stated above, is the safe and correct one.

In determining how far a dedication of an unimproved street extends, so as to relieve a municipality from paying damages, in a proceeding for opening, etc., such a street, we said in Hawley v. Baltimore, 33 Md. 280: "The doctrine of implied covenants will be held to create a right of way over all the lands of a vendor which may lie, however remote, in the bed of a street. The lands must be contiguous to the lots sold, and there must be some point of [159] limitation. The true doctrine is, as we understand it, that the purchaser of a lot calling to bind on a street, not yet opened by the public authorities, is entitled to a right of way over it, if it is of the lands of his vendor, to its full extent and dimensions only until it reaches some other street or public way. To this extent will the vendor be held by the implied covenant of his deed, and no further." The dedication in such cases is held to be co-extensive with the right of way acquired as an easement by the purchaser, and although the owner of the land has laid it out in lots and streets and sells lots, calling to bind on such streets, the dedication is limited as stated above, and in Baltimore v. Frick, 82 Md. 85, 33 Atl. 435, it was held that the street which limits the extent of the dedication is the next existing public street, whether the same be actually used as same or not. If, for example, Henrietta street was an unimproved street and it had been dedicated by the owner of the land selling lots to appellant and others, the implied covenant for the right of the appellant to use it would only have extended to Eutaw street. If the city had not accepted the dedication, and no lots had been sold east of Eutaw street, when it proposed to open that part of the street, it would have been compelled to pay for it and could not have been aided by the implied covenant for the benefit of the appellant and other purchasers of lots west of Eutaw street, as that only extended to Eutaw street. The theory of the rule of law is that the vendor only covenanted with the vendee that he could have the use of the street on which his lot fronts, to the next existing public street, because there he would have access to other ways. The law fixed the next cross street as the limit, just as it does in this character of cases, because the line must be drawn somewhere, and that was deemed a reasonable and just place to fix it.

We had intended to refer at some length to the cases cited by the appellant, but this opinion is already too long to admit of that, and we must be content with saying that we have [160] examined them carefully and find that they are for the most part, if not altogether, easily distinguishable from those which sustain the rule we have announced. The case of Howell v. Morrisville, supra, sufficiently explains that of In re Melon Street, supra, to avoid the necessity of further comment, and that of Dantzer v. Indianapolis Union R. Co. 141 Ind. 604, 39 N. E. 223, 50 Am. St. Rep. 343, 34 L.R.A. 769, is much more favorable to the contention of the appellees than it is to that of the appellant. But without mentioning others, an examination of them will show either that damages were allowed under some special statute construed by the Court to include such damages, or that the properties were by the closing left in a cul de sac or in some such shape as the Courts held had so affected the access to them as to come within an exception to the general rule.

We do not see the relevancy of the questions in the first and second bills of exception, but whatever the answers might have been they could not have affected our conclusion on the main question. So although it is greatly to be regretted if the property of the appellant has depreciated as indicated by the evidence of the witnesses produced by it—whether maybe the real cause or causes for the depreciation,—we are convinced that under the overwhelming weight of authority it is not entitled to damages in this case, and the action of the Court in granting the motion to dismiss the appeal taken to the Baltimore City Court must be affirmed.

Order affirmed, the appellant to pay the costs.

NOTE.Persons Entitled to Compensation for Vacation of Street.

Introductory, 238.

Abutting Owners, 238.

Nonabutting Owners, 239.

Introductory.

It is the purpose of this note to review the recent cases determining the persons entitled to compensation for the vacation of a street. The earlier cases on this subject will be found in the notes to Enders v. Friday, 15 Ann. Cas. 665; Freeman v. Centralia, Ann. Cas. 1913D 786 and Heinrich v. St. Louis, 46 Am. St. Rep. 490.

Abutting Owners.

It is the more general rule that an abutting property owner whose right of ingress and egress is cut off or substantially interfered with by the vacation of a public street or alley, has a right of action for any damage which he may sustain by the vacation. Louden v. Starr (Ia.) 154 N. W. 331; Hubbell v. Des Moines (Ia.) 154 N. W. 337; Jones v. Aurora, 97 Neb. 825, 151 N. W. 958; Galveston Commercial Assoc. v. Ort (Tex.) 165 S. W. 907. In Hubbell v. Des Moines, supra it was said: "The fee of the street is in the city. The peculiar right of the abutting property owners is limited to the use of the street in connection with his property. Of course, he has a common right with the public to the use of the street. As an abutting land owner, he may have a distinct and different right: The plaintiff, as an abutting property owner, has a right to a means of egress and ingress. The street or alley having been established by proper authority, the right, through that instrumentality of ingress and egress, is created. This is a substantial right, and, at certain points abutting his property, of great value; at other points of practically no value. To interfere with the free and convenient use of ingress and egress, to shut off access to his property entirely by the vacation of streets or alleys, would be, in some instances, to destroy the value of the property itself, at least until such time as aerial navigation has been perfected. There is no question, under the rule laid down in this state, and as the law now stands, that the vacation of a public street or alley may be a substantial injury to the owner of abutting property, by the destruction of his right to the larger and fuller enjoyment of his property, resting in the existence of the street or alley. . . . An abutting property owner, whose right of egress and ingress has been substantially interfered with by the vacation of a public street or alley, has the right of action for damages which may result to him personally by such vacation, and it does not matter whether you call it an easement in the street, a vested right to the use of the street, or a claim for damages. This court is committed to the doctrine that he is entitled to recover if the free access to his property, and the improvements thereon, through the street, and by means of the street has been substantially interfered with." In Jones v. Aurora, 97 Neb. 825, 151 N. W. 958, the owner of three adjoining lots brought an action to recover damages occasioned to the property by the vacation of a street. It was contended that no recovery could be had as to two of the lots because they did not actually abut on the vacated street. The court in disposing of this contention said: "In the instant case, the three lots are used as one tract, having common improvements, and, in assessing damages, must be treated as a single piece of property, abutting on the vacated portion of the streets. In closing these streets and placing plaintiff's property at the end of a pocket street, her damage is different from that of the general traveling public, and she suffered damage special and peculiar to this property, and different from that of the general public."

But in Walker v. Des Moines, 161 Ia. 215, 142 N. W. 51, it was held that a property owner is not entitled to compensation for the vacation of a street where the access to his lots has not been interfered with. See also the reported case.

In some jurisdictions the rule obtains that an owner of abutting property cannot recover compensation for the vacation of a street. Harrison Land Co. v. Crucible Steel Co. 82 N. J. Eq. 414, 89 Atl. 41. See also Chenault v. Collins, 155 Ky. 312, 159 S. W. 834. In the case first cited it was said: "So far as the municipality, the town of Harrison, is concerned, the complainant's right to a preliminary injunction depends upon the power of the municipality to vacate a portion of Cumberland street without first making compensation to complainant. The charter (P. L. 1873, p. 265, § 56) authorizes the common council by ordinance to lay out, alter, widen, or straighten, and also to vacate any street then or thereafter laid out, and to take and appropriate for such purpose any lands and real estate, upon making compensation to the owner or owners thereof, as is herein-after mentioned and provided." The subsequent section of the charter (59), defining the method of ascertaining and making compensation, extends only to the taking and appropriation of lands or real estate for 'opening or altering, widening or straightening streets,' and does not include 'vacating.'

Complainant's land is apparently damaged or injuriously affected by the vacation of the street, but its land is neither taken nor appropriated, and therefore does not seem to come within the provision in section 56 for compensation. Unless such provision is expressly directed by statute to be made, streets may under our Constitution be vacated without compensation. . . . In the vacation of streets, lands located on the street vacated are not in fact 'taken and appropriated' by the municipality; which, on the contrary, only releases a public right or easement over the lands, and therefore it may be well claimed that the provisions of section 56 as to the method of compensation and proceedings for 'lands taken' intentionally and properly excluded proceedings for the vacation of streets. And, in my judgment, this omission, construed in connection with section 56 extending the power for compensation only to 'lands taken and appropriated,' excludes complainant's lands from the protection of the provision." And in Chenault v. Collins, 155 Ky. 312, 159 S. W. 834, it was held that "a property owner, in the absence of statutory provision, is not entitled to damages on account of the discontinuance of a county road."

In some jurisdictions it has been provided by statute that landowners shall be entitled to compensation for the injury suffered by the vacation of a road. Highway Com'rs v. Klaus, 186 Ill. App. 431; Olinger v. Watson, 160 App. Div. 96, 145 N. Y. S. 173. In the case last cited it was held that a statute giving damages for the closing of streets did not relate to mere private ways, and that damages could not be recovered for the closing of a street as to which no duty of maintenance had been imposed upon the public. It was also held in that case that as to claims, relating to property included within a block wholly surrounded by new streets, for damage caused by the closing of old streets within the block the damage did not accrue until one of the new streets bounding the block had been actually and physically opened for public use so that unless the assignor of a claimant for damages had title when one of the new streets was actually opened he could not assign a claim for damages.

Nonabutting Owners.

Where the vacation of a street causes special injury to nonabutting property, the owner of the property injured may recover compensation. Hill v. Kimball, 269 Ill. 398, 110 N. E. 18; Hoyt v. Watson, 162 App. Div. 469, 147 N. Y. S. 599, affirmed 213 N. Y. 651, 107 N. E. 1079. See also Chambersburg

Shoe Mfg. Co. v. Cumberland Valley R. Co. 240 Pa. St. 519, 87 Atl. 968. Galveston Commercial Assoc. v. Ort (Tex.) 165 S. W. 907. "Property may be so specially and peculiarly injured, even though not immediately abutting upon the vacated street or alley, that damages can be recovered from the municipality for such vacation, and the damage to injured property so situated would differ in degree, and not in kind, from the damages incurred by property immediately abutting upon such vacated street or alley." Hill v. Kimball, 269 Ill. 398, 110 N. E. 18. In Hoyt v. Watson, 162 App. Div. 469, 147 N. Y. S. 599, it was said: "It would seem that property situated on a block upon an ancient public street is entitled to have access from each end of that block. . . . As the street has not only been discontinued for a portion of the very block upon which the petitioner's property is located, but has been permanently and physically obstructed by the wall erected a few feet to the north of her property and in said block, I am of the opinion that she has presented a case within the provisions of the Street Closing Act. . . . and that she is entitled to present her claim for damages to commissioners to be appointed, as provided by said act." In that case it appeared that after a street had been closed several feet beyond the property of the petitioner another street was constructed immediately adjacent to the property of the petitioner on property condemned by the city for bridge purposes. It was held that the opening of the new street did not defeat the right of the petitioner to compensation as he did not have an absolute right to the maintenance and continuance of the new street. In Chambersburg Shoe Mfg. Co. v. Cumberland Valley R. Co. 240 Pa. St. 519, 87 Atl. 968, it was said: "The purchasers of lots sold according to a plan showing streets, alleys and courts, acquire a right of property appurtenant to the lots, in the use of the streets, alleys and courts, thus dedicated. Such a right is sometimes called an 'easement of access' which means the right of ingress and egress to and from the premises of the lot owners. It is a property right appurtenant to the land which cannot be impaired or taken away without compensation."

But in Hill v. Kimball, 269 Ill. 398, 110 N. E. 23, it appeared that there was a statutory dedication of all the streets and alleys in a subdivision of the city and it was said that the owners of property in the subdivision could not "recover damages for the vacation of any of the streets or alleys in any part of said Hitch's Fairview subdivision unless as to the vacated alleys in the block in which appellants' property is located."

MAYOR AND ALDERMEN OF CITY OF SAVANNAH

v.

JORDAN.

Georgia Supreme Court—September 10, 1914.

142 Ga. 409; 83 S. E. 109.

Municipal Corporation — Liability for Tort in Cleaning Street.

The duty of keeping the streets of a municipality free from matter which, if allowed to remain, would affect the health of the public is a governmental function, the exercise of which would exempt the municipality from liability to a suit for damages to an employee without fault, who is injured by reason of a defective cart in which he is hauling "the sweepings of the streets" of such municipality, and which has been furnished him for that purpose by the agents of the municipality.

(a) This court will take judicial cognizance that the sweepings of the streets of a municipality contain matter which, if allowed to remain in the streets, will injuriously affect the health of the citizens of such municipality.

(b) And this is so notwithstanding petition describes "the sweepings of the streets" as "dirt and trash."

[See note at end of this case.]

Petition Insufficient.

The petition was subject to general demurrer, and should have been dismissed.

(Syllabus by court.)

Error to Superior Court, Chatham county: CHARLTON, Judge.

Action for damages. T. B. Jordan, plaintiff, and Mayor and Aldermen of City of Savannah, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. REVERSED.

[409] This action was brought against the City of Savannah by T. B. Jordan, who was an employee of the city engaged at the time of the injury in driving a street cart. It was alleged that he was engaged in duties under "the Street and Lane Department of the City," and that at the time of the injury he was "hauling the sweepings of the street." While driving the cart he noticed that the axle was not exactly straight, and not being a mechanic, and knowing nothing about the durability of metals, he called the attention of Mr. Deolan, [410] under whom he was working, to the condition of the axle, who told him to report the matter to the "inspector of carts and mules." The axle was worn, the point where it broke being thinner than the other part, and this made it too weak to stand the weight of the "dirt and trash" in the cart. The inspector who made an examination of the axle pronounced it safe, told the plaintiff to continue using it, and assured him that it would not break. At the point where it broke it was cracked and too weak to stand the weight of the dirt and trash in the cart, which was unknown to the plaintiff, but was known to the defendant, or could and should have been known if proper inspection had been made. On April 10, 1911, plaintiff was driving the cart on Farm Street, which is a rock-paved street; and while on the cart in the discharge of his duties, the axle broke and he was violently thrown to the pavement. This severely injured his elbow and caused a rupture from which hernia resulted, etc. He was entirely free from fault, did not consent or contribute to his injury, and relied upon the assurance of safety given him by "the defendant's mechanic." The axle was not manifestly dangerous. The injury was due directly and proximately to the negligence of the defendant, its servants and employees, in furnishing plaintiff an unsafe appliance with which to work, and in assuring him that the appliance was safe. A general and special demurrer to the petition were overruled, and the defendant excepted.

Twigg & Gazan for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts).—Exception is taken to the overruling of the demurrer to the petition as amended. The amendment sufficiently met the special demurrer. Is the petition as amended sufficient to withstand a general demurrer? This depends on the answer to the question, whether the act of hauling the sweepings from the streets of Savannah by the use of a cart operated under the direction of the department of streets and lanes in that municipality was the exercise of a governmental function, or was the exercise of a ministerial function. It seems to be well settled that where the municipality undertakes to perform for the State duties which the State itself might perform, but which have been delegated to the municipality,—such, for instance, as devolve upon the board of health of a city under its charter, for the protection of life and health and comfort of the community,—and in [411] the exercise of such function under the department a private citizen is injured by the negligence of the servants of the department while engaged in such work, no cause of action arises against such municipality. Love v. Atlanta, 95 Ga. 129, 22 S. E. 29, 51 Am. St. Rep. 64; Cook v. Macon, 54 Ga. 468; Gray v. Griffin, 111 Ga. 361, 368, 36 S. E. 792, 51 L.R.A. 131; Dakton v. Wilson, 118 Ga. 100, 101, 44 S. 101; 4 Labatt on Master and Servant (2d ed.) § 1615, p. 4928; 5 Thomp. Neg. § 5789. On the other hand, a municipality is civilly liable for damages arising "for neglect to perform, or for improper or unskillful performance of their duties" (Civil Code (1910) § 897); or for acts which are thus performed in its private character for business purposes, and for its own advantage or profit, although such act may enure to the ultimate benefit of the citizen. 5 Thomp. Neg. § 5789; 4 Labatt, M. & S. (2d ed.) § 1615; Dill. Mun. Corp. (5th ed.) § 1662, p. 2899. See Huey v. Atlanta, 8 Ga. App. 597, 70 S. E. 71; Savannah v. Spears, 66 Ga. 304; Smith v. Atlanta, 75 Ga. 110; Greensboro v. McGibbony, 93 Ga. 672, 20 S. E. 37. There is a diversity of opinion in outside jurisdictions as to the liability of municipalities while engaged in cleaning streets, for torts committed by its officers or agents. In some jurisdictions these duties are held to be governmental in their character, and the right to recover damages for torts thus committed is denied. See 4 Dill. Mun. Corp. 2899, and cases cited. In other jurisdictions municipalities have been held impliedly liable for the negligence of employees engaged in street cleaning. Ibid. Missano v. New York, 160 N. Y. 123, 54 N. E. 744; Quill v. New York, 36 App. Div. 476, 55 N. Y. S. 889; Barney Dumping-Boat Co. v. New York, 40 Fed. 50. A clear distinction between the governmental and ministerial functions of a municipal corporation is drawn in the case of Jones v. Williamsburg, 97 Va. 722, 34 S. E. 883, 47 L.R.A. 294, where Riley, J., says: "A municipal corporation has a dual character, the one public and the other private, and exercises correspondingly twofold functions, the one governmental and legislative, and the other private and ministerial. In its public character, it acts as an agency of the State, to enable it the better to govern that portion of its people residing within the municipality; and to this end there is granted to or imposed upon it; by the charter of its creation, powers and duties to be exercised and performed [412] exclusively for public, governmental purposes. These powers are legislative and discretionary, and the municipality is exempt from liability for an injury resulting from the failure to exercise them, or from their improper or negligent exercise. In its corporate and private character there are granted unto it privileges and powers to be exercised for its private advantage, which are for public purposes in no other sense than that the public derives a common benefit from the proper discharge of the duties imposed or assumed in consideration of the privileges and powers conferred. This latter class of powers and duties are not discretionary, but ministerial and absolute; and, Atl. Cas. 1916C.—16.

for an injury resulting from negligence in their exercise or performance, the municipality is liable in a civil action for damages, in the same manner as an individual or private corporation. The line of distinction . . . is clearly drawn by the courts and text-writers, and the exemption of the municipality from liability in the one case, and its liability in the other for an injury resulting from negligence, firmly established." Where a municipality is exercising an administrative function at the time an employee is injured, it owes its employee the duty of furnishing a safe place to work; and for a failure to do so, and where by reason of such failure an employee is injured without fault on his part, the corporation would be liable, under the same circumstances that a private individual or corporation would be. 4 Labatt on Master & Servant, § 1615; Omond v. Chicago, 249 Ill. 596, 94 N. E. 976. See Collins v. Greenfield, 172 Mass. 78, 51 N. E. 454; Hourigan v. Norwich, 77 Conn. 358, 59 Atl. 487, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 445; Bruhnke v. La-Crosse, 155 Wis. 485, 144 N. W. 1100, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1148. The authorities undoubtedly make a distinction between cases where injuries are occasioned by the agents of municipalities while engaged in the performance of governmental functions, or in private enterprises. Between the municipality and the public the question of liability depends upon whether at the time of the injury the municipality is engaged in a governmental or ministerial duty. The relation of a municipal corporation to its servants is the same as it is between any other master and servant, provided it is engaged in the performance of ministerial functions.

The question has been settled so far as this State is concerned, and the only difficulty is in applying the rulings made to a particular case. In Love v. Atlanta, supra, it was held that "The duty [413] of keeping the streets clear of putrid and other substances offensive to the sense of smell and which tend to imperil the public health devolves, under the charter of the City of Atlanta, upon the board of health of that city; and the functions of this department of the city government being governmental and not purely administrative in their character, it follows that if, in the exercise of such functions and in the discharge of the duties devolving upon this department thereunder, a private citizen is injured by the negligence of one of its servants in and about such work, no right of action arises against the city." And see, to the same effect, Watson v. Atlanta, 136 Ga. 370, 71 S. E. 664. In the body of the opinion in the Love case Justice Atkinson said: "With respect to matters concerning the public health, however, there is no serious conflict of reason, opinion, or authority upon the correctness of the proposition that the preservation of the public health in one of the duties that devolves upon the State as a sovereign power. It is such a duty as, upon proper occasion, justifies the exercise of the right of eminent domain and the demolition of structures which endanger or imperil the public health. In the discharge of such duties as pertain to the health department of the State, the State is acting strictly in the discharge of one of the functions of government. If the State delegate to a municipal corporation, either by general law or by particular statute, this power, and impose upon it within its limits the duty of taking such steps and such measures as may be necessary to the preservation of the public health, the municipal corporation likewise, in the discharge of such duty, is in the exercise of a purely governmental function, affecting the welfare not only of the citizens resident within its corporation but of the citizens of the commonwealth generally, all of whom have an interest in the prevention of infectious or contagious diseases at any point within the State, and in the exercise of such powers is entitled to the same immunity against suit as the State itself enjoys. Such a duty would stand upon the same footing as its duty to preserve the public peace, and its liability or non-liability would depend upon the same principle which relieves the city from liability for the misfeasance of a police officer in the discharge of his duty. It will be observed, however, that in order to exempt a city from liability, it is not sufficient to show that the particular work, from the negligent performance of which by the servants of the city a citizen was injured, was being performed under the direction of the health authorities; [414] but it must be shown that the particular work so being done was connected with or had reference to the preservation of the public health." It is a matter of common knowledge that the sweepings of the streets contain matter other than dirt and trash, which is offensive to the sense of smell, and which, if allowed to remain, will tend to affect not only the comfort but the health of the community as well. Even the English sparrows take cognizance of this, and act as scavengers in removing it. And it matters not that the duty of removing this cause of discomfort, inconvenience, and ill health to the community is delegated to the "Streets and Lanes Department" of a city. It is not the character or name of the agent who executes the duty of removing the cause of discomfort and ill health to the public which fixes the character of the duty performed, but it is the act itself which determines whether it be governmental or ministerial. It is immaterial whether the work is done under the supervision of the board of health of a municipality, or by the "Director of Public Works," or under the "Streets and Lanes Department." The duty is the same, and that is to remove from the streets all the sweepings and garbage and whatever would contaminate the atmosphere and breed pestilence and disease; and such a duty is a governmental and not a ministerial function. It is one that the entire public, living within or without the municipality, is concerned in,—the enforcement of laws for the preservation of the comfort and health of the citizen. The allegation that the cart was too weak to stand the weight of "the dirt and trash" in the cart cannot change the character of the contents of the cart. The petition also alleged that the plaintiff was hauling "the sweepings of the street." Counsel for both plaintiff and defendant cite the ordinances of the City of Savannah as throwing light on the question at issue; but the court cannot take judicial cognizance of the existence of the ordinances of a municipality, on demurrer, where such ordinances are not pleaded and set out. What is said in Collins v. Russell, 107 Ga. 423, 432, 33 S. E. 444, as to judicial cognizance of ordinances of the City of Savannah, has no application to a case like the present. But, without reference to the ordinances of the City of Savannah, which we cannot consider under the present record, we hold that the allegation in the plaintiff's petition that the cart contained the sweepings of the streets, which he was hauling at the time of his injury, means that the plaintiff, as an employee [415] of the city, was in the exercise of a governmental function; and this being so, he cannot recover of the municipality. The court erred in overruling the general demurrer to the petition.

Judgment reversed. All the justices concur.

RULE STATED.

A majority of the jurisdictions subscribe to the rule that the cleaning of the streets and the removal of ashes and garbage is a public duty performed for the protection of the general health of the community, in the discharge of which a municipality exercises a purely governmental function as distinguished from one which is municipal or corporate, and therefore it is not responsible for torts committed in the course of the work. Love v. Atlanta, 95 Ga. 129, 22 S. E. 29, 51 Am. St. Rep. 64; McFadden v. Jewell, 119 Ia. 321, 93 N. W. 302, 97 Am. St. Rep. 321, 60 L.R.A. 401; Kippes v. Louisville, 140 Ky. 423, 131 S. Compare Young v. Metropolitan St. R. Co. 126 Mo. App. 1, 103 S. W. 135 (disapproved in Cassidy v. St. Joseph, supra.)

Thus in Love v. Atlanta, 95 Ga. 129, 22 S. E. 29, 51 Am. St. Rep. 64, it appeared that while the plaintiff was passing along the streets of a city, in the exercise of proper care and without fault on his part, an animal attached to one of the garbage carts of the city was negligently permitted to run away, and while so running, collided with the buggy of the plaintiff causing serious injury. It was also alleged that the driver of the cart was a small negro boy, wholly incompetent to the discharge of the duty, and that the mule employed was vicious, dangerous, and liable to run away. It was shown that the mule and cart causing the damage were in use by the city under the direction of the health board of the city, and that the servant of the city charged with driving the cart was then employed in cleaning the streets and removing therefrom such putrid and offensive substances as usually accumulate in the streets of densely populated cities, and which were necessary to be removed because, remaining, they endangered the public health. The court said: "With respect to matters concerning the public health, . . . there is no serious conflict of reason, opinion or authority upon the correctness of the proposition that the preservation of the public health is one of the duties that devolves upon the state as a sovereign power. It is such a duty as, upon proper occasion, justifies the exercise of the right of eminent domain and the demolition of structures which endanger or imperil the public health. In the discharge of such duties as pertain to the health department of the state, the state is acting strictly in the discharge of one of the functions of government. If the state delegate to a municipal corporation, either by general law or by particular statute, this power, and impose upon it within its limits the duty of taking such steps and such measures as may be necessary to the preservation of the public health, the municipal corporation likewise, in the discharge of such duty, is in the exercise of a purely governmental function, affecting the welfare not only of the citizens resident within its corporation but of the citizens of the commonwealth generally, all of whom have an interest in the prevention of infectious or contagious diseases at any point within the state, and in the exercise of such powers is entitled to the same immunity against suit as the state itself enjoys, . . . it can make no difference in principle as to the character of the agents employed in the discharge of this duty with respect to the public health. The principle of nonliability rests upon the broad ground that in the discharge of its purely governmental functions, a corporate body to which has been delegated a portion of the sovereign power, is not liable for torts committed in the discharge of such duties and in the execution of such powers. It can be no more liable because of the failure to select competent drivers of garbage carts than a city could be held liable for failing to elect a wise, conservative and discreet mayor. . . . However incongruous it may appear to be to say that this diminutive dorky and this refractory mule were engaged in the performance of some of the functions of government, it is nevertheless true, and illustrates how even the humblest of its citizens, under the operation of its laws, may become in Georgia an important public functionary."

In Louisville v. Hehemann, 161 Ky. 523, 171 S. W. 165, L.R.A. 1915C 747, the court said, obiter: "In the collection and disposition of garbage, undoubtedly the city acts for the public health, and discharges a governmental function. In this regard, it is an agent or arm of the commonwealth, and, for that reason, is absolved from liability for the negligence of its employees."

In Condict v. Jersey City, 46 N. J. L. 157, the court said: "The removal of ashes and garbage placed by the inhabitants in boxes and barrels upon the sidewalks, is part of the duties of this board in their supervision over and care for the cleanliness of the streets. A dumping-ground and horses, carts and drivers, to carry the ashes and garbage to the place of deposit, are necessary to enable the board to carry into execution its public duties in this respect; and the board is supplied with horses and carts and authorized to employ drivers at public expense for this purpose. It is the settled law of this state that an action will not lie in behalf of an individual who has sustained a special damage from the neglect of a municipal corporation to perform a public duty, unless the right to sue for such an injury is given by statute. . . . In the execution of the duties of a municipal government the services of inferior officers having only ministerial duties to perform, and of workmen and other employees, are required for the transaction of its business. . . . It has been held that with respect to such officers and employees, the doctrine of respondeat superior does not apply. . . . To maintain in its integrity the doctrine of our courts that a municipal corporation is not amenable to actions for negligence in the performance of public duties, it is necessary to maintain also that persons employed by the corporation in the execution of public duties are mere agencies or instruments by which such duties are performed, and that the doctrine of respondeat superior does not apply to such employments. To impose upon the corporation liability for the negligence of such employees would indirectly fix upon the corporation a liability from which it is by law, on consideration of public policy, exempted."

APPLICATION OF RULE.

In Kippes v. Louisville, 140 Ky. 423, 131 S. W. 184, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1161, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured by the bursting of a hose in charge of the defendants' employees. The defendant alleged that at the time of the accident complained of the employees of the city, or one of its departments, in charge of the flusher, were engaged in flushing the streets of the city, and that for this service the city did not receive or charge any remuneration or profit, but did the work solely for the promotion of the health, safety and comfort of the inhabitants of the city and the general public; and that in using the flusher it was exercising a governmental function of the city. The plaintiff demurred to the answer and the demurrer was overruled. On appeal the court affirmed the judgment and held that the flushing of the streets of the city was a public duty undertaken by the city in the exercise of its governmental functions.

In Conelly v. Nashville, 100 Tenn. 262, 46 S. W. 565, it appeared that while the plaintiff was sitting in her buggy, which was standing near the sidewalk of one of the streets of a city, a driver of a sprinkling cart, engaged in the services of the city, negligently collided with the wheels of the buggy, so that the animal attached thereto taking fright, overturned the buggy and inflicted the injury complained of. A demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration was sustained and the court said: "An ordinance of the city directing the sprinkling of the streets . . . is one that is sanitary in its character, passed in view of the health and comfort of the general public. While engaged in doing work under such an ordinance, the municipality is discharging a governmental duty, and is not responsible for the carelessness of the agent or agencies so employed."

In Cassidy v. St. Joseph, 247 Mo. 197, 152 S. W. 306, it was held that there could be no recovery against a city for the death of the plaintiff's husband caused by a runaway team used by the city in the cleaning of its streets.

Likewise in Connor v. Manchester, 73 N. H. 233, 60 Atl. 436, the plaintiff offered to prove that the decedent was employed by the street and park commissioners of the city of Manchester, through their superintendent, to drive a horse hitched to a cart used in removing dirt, rubbish, and ashes from the streets of the city and from receptacles placed on or near the streets by abutters; and that while so employed, he was run over and killed by reason of the unsafe character of the horse. The defendants' motion for an order of nonsuit was granted, subject to exception. On appeal the exception was overruled and the order of nonsuit sustained.

In Bruhne v. La Crosse, 155 Wis. 485, 144 N. W. 1100, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1147, it was held that the defendant city was not liable for an injury to a child caused by the negligence of a driver of a city dump wagon which was being used for street cleaning purposes. The infant who was five years of age had followed the wagon and had come in contact with the chains forming constituent parts of the dumping device just as the driver, without notice or warning, negligently disengaged the dumping device, causing the chains to move and draw the infant into or against the pulleys through which these chains passed, with great force, seriously injuring the infant.

In Louisville v. Carter, 142 Ky. 443, 134 S. W. 468, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 637, it appeared that the plaintiff, an eleven-year-old boy, was run over by a wagon belonging to the city of Louisville and severely injured. One of the city's sprinkling carts was being driven through the streets, and another wagon used by the street cleaning department was attached to it. The latter wagon injured the boy. It was conceded that if the injury had been inflicted by the sprinkler while being used for sprinkling the street no recovery could be had. But it was argued that inasmuch as the sprinkler was not being used for sprinkling purposes, but to haul another wagon, a different rule applied. The court said: "We are unable to draw the distinction which appellee's counsel would make between an injury resulting from the negligent use of the sprinkler while actually sprinkling, and one while the sprinkler was being drawn through the city from one part thereof to another. In the numerous cases that have been decided by this and other courts, holding that a city is not liable for an injury that resulted through the negligence of its employees engaged in the discharge of any of those duties commonly called 'governmental functions,' the opinion in each is rested upon the idea that, as the city is a branch of the state government, an arm of the state, it is against public policy to permit it to be used for the negligence of those of its servants engaged in the discharge of some duty which has for its aim the protection of the lives, health, or property of the citizens."

In McFadden v. Jewell, 119 Ia. 321, 93 N. W. 302, 97 Am. St. Rep. 321, 60 L.R.A. 401, it appeared that an infant was injured by a mowing machine operated by an employee of the defendant who was engaged in cutting down a growth of weeds in one of the alleys of the city. The court said: "Certain it is that in the matter of control over the streets and alleys within the incorporate limits—and, to make the reference direct, in the matter of clearing the alley in question of weeds—the town was in the exercise of police powers possessed by it as an incident to its existence as a municipal corporation. It is well settled that where an act done by an officer or employee of a municipal corporation is essentially in the line of the performance of an official duty, public in character, the municipality cannot be made liable for a tort committed or wrong done by such officer or employee while engaged as such in the performance of the duty in question."

In Johnson v. Somerville, 195 Mass. 370, 81 N. E. 268, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 715, it was held that a city was not responsible for the action of its superintendent in dumping ashes on premises adjoining the plaintiff's premises, thereby filling up a natural watercourse, and causing the water to percolate through the soil into a cellar on the land of the plaintiff.

However, in Louisville v. Hans (Ky.) 180 S. W. 65, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured by falling over a garbage can which had been standing on the sidewalk for three days. It was the duty of the street cleaning department to remove all garbage placed in such receptacles on certain days, but an employee of that department had failed to do so. The court said: "In failing to remove this garbage when it should have done so, the city was not exercising any governmental function. It was simply guilty of negligence, as much so as if a man in the employ of the city whose duty it was to remove the garbage had himself put an obstruction on the sidewalk at this place and let it remain there three days. The city is under a duty to exercise ordinary care to keep its streets and sidewalks in reasonably safe condition for public travel, and when it fails to perform this duty by leaving an obstruction in the street or on the sidewalk that it knows, or in the exercise of ordinary care could have known, was present, and some person is injured by reason of the obstruction, the liability of the city grows out of its failure to perform the duty mentioned."

Minority Rule.

RULE STATED.

In some jurisdictions, however, a municipality is held liable for torts committed in cleaning its streets. In those jurisdictions the courts consider the cleaning of streets or the removal of garbage and rubbish to be a corporate function and the fact that its discharge may incidentally benefit the public health is deemed to be of minor importance. Barney Dumping-Boat Co. v. New York, 40 Fed. 50; Denver v. Maurer, 47 Colo. 209, 106 Pac. 875, 135 Am. St. Rep. 210; Flannagan v. Bloomington, 156 Ill. App. 162; Pass Christian v. Fernandez, 100 Miss. 76, 56 So. 329, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 649; Missano v. New York, 160 N. Y. 123, 54 N. E. 744, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 652; Quill v. New York, 36 App. Div. 476, 55 N. Y. S. 889, 5 Am. Reg. Rep. 423, reversing 21 Misc. 598, 48 N. Y. S. 141; Silverman v. New York, 114 N. Y. S. 59; Ostrom v. San Antonio, 94 Tex. 523, 62 S. W. 909, reversing (Tex.) 60 S. W. 591; San Antonio v. Mackey, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 210, 36 S. W. 760, on rehearing 22 Tex. Civ. App. 145, 54 S. W. 33. See also Denver v. Porter, 126 Fed. 288, 61 C. C. A. 168. Compare Davidson v. New York, 24 Misc. 560, 54 N. Y. S. 51 (the decision wherein was based on the holding in 21 Misc. 598, 48 N. Y. S. 141, which holding was later reversed on appeal, see Quill v. New York, supra). Thus in Ostrom v. San Antonio, 94 Tex. 523, 62 S. W. 909, the court said: "In what sense can it be said that the cleaning of the streets of San Antonio was a duty that primarily rested upon the state of Texas? We know of no principle of law upon which such duty can be based, nor any case which has so held, nor any instance in which such power has been exercised by the state for the benefit of the general public, and we must conclude that it does not fall within that class of cases which are specified as being powers to be exercised for the good of the general public imposed upon a municipal corporation for enforcement within its limits. The law imposed the duty of cleaning the streets upon the city of San Antonio within its own limits primarily and especially for the benefit of its own people. It is strictly a corporate function for the abuse of which by its agents in the course of their regular employment the city must be held liable." Likewise in Pass Christian v. Fernandez, 100 Miss. 76, 56 So. 329, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 649, wherein it appeared that a child was injured by the negligence of one of the drivers of the city's garbage carts engaged in hauling dirt and trash, the court said: "The only real defense is that at the time of the injury the cart and driver were engaged in a governmental duty, and on account of this no liability attaches on the part of the city. . . . It may be true, as an abstract proposition of law, that damage occasioned by the city in the exercise of a purely governmental duty does not render the city liable; but it must be a governmental duty, and the idea that a driver of a city cart, engaged in hauling trash and dirt for the city, is engaged in a 'governmental function' in any sense in which the word is used in the law, requires a stretch of the imagination that is beyond our power to make. It is a matter of no little difficulty to define what are and what are not purely governmental duties of a city. To a very large extent these questions can only be settled by the facts of each particular case, so variant are the conditions under which this question arises. The public or governmental duties of a city are those given by the state to the city as a part of the state's sovereignty, to be exercised by the city for the benefit of the whole public, living both in and out of the corporate limits. All else is private or corporate duty, and for any negligence on the part of the agents or employees of the municipality in the discharge of any of the private duties of the city the city is liable for all damages just as an individual would be. The use of the cart in hauling dirt or trash for the city is for no governmental purpose, as connected in any way with the sovereign duty of the state. The state does owe the duty to all its citizens of protecting the person from assault and the property from destruction, and all done by the city in furtherance of this duty of the state is done in a governmental capacity. But the hauling of dirt and trash is for the use and advantage of the city in its corporate capacity, is a corporate duty, and the city is liable for all damage done by any officer or agent so employed."

However, a municipality cannot be held liable for the tort of an independent contractor committed while cleaning the streets. Frank v. Rome, 125 App. Div. 141, 109 N. Y. S. 247. Compare Flannagan v. Bloomington, 156 Ill. App. 162.

In England, it seems that a municipality is liable for torts committed in the cleaning of its streets although the action must conform in all respects to the general rules of practice or particular statutes governing the same. Thus in Edwards v. St. Mary, Islington, 22 Q. B. D. 338, 58 L. J. Q. B. 165, 60 L. T. N. S. 725, 37 W. R. 347, 53 J. P. 180, it appeared that the plaintiff had been employed by certain contractors to drive a water cart for the sprinkling of the streets of the defendant, a metropolitan vestry. The water cart had been furnished by the vestry and while the plaintiff was engaged in his duties the axle broke, and the plaintiff was thrown from the cart and injured. The question of the defendant's negligence in furnishing the cart was submitted to the jury and a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. On appeal the judgment was reversed on the ground that proper notice of the action had not been given within the prescribed time.

In Canada, it has been held that a municipality was not liable for the negligence of a teamster engaged by the city at so much an hour for the purpose of removing filth and scrapings from the streets. Saunders v. Toronto, 26 Ont. App. 265, reversing 29 Ont. 273. The decision was based on the fact that under the terms of his employment the teamster was an independent contractor and the relation of master and servant therefore did not exist.

APPLICATION OF RULE.

In Denver v. Maurer, 47 Colo. 209, 106 Pac. 875, 135 Am. St. Rep. 210, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured by stumbling over or being struck by a hose stretched across the street by employees of the city in washing out street refuse collected in a storm sewer. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff the court said: "The authorities agree that two classes of general duties are imposed upon a municipal corporation. One is governmental, and the municipality is not liable for negligence of employees occurring in the performance thereof. The other is private and corporate, and the municipality is liable for negligence of employees occurring in the performance thereof. . . . The authorities are practically agreed in placing certain general duties in the class that is governmental, and among those is the general duty of the preservation of the public health. . . . There is considerable conflict among the authorities when it comes to the application of the general rule to specific cases. In reading the authorities, one is impressed with the fact that often some detail in the performance of one class of general duties, partakes partly or wholly of the nature of another class of general duties. Thus, frequently, details in the performance of the general duty of caring for the streets partake of the nature of duties performed in the preservation of public health. It also appears that a municipality may be immune from negligence occurring in the performance of a detail in one class of duties, while it would be liable for negligence in the performance of a like detail in another class; as, for instance, while it would not be liable for the negligence of its firemen in stretching a hose on a sidewalk while using it to put out a fire, it might be liable for the negligence of employees in stretching a hose on the sidewalk while using it in the care of its streets."

In Quill v. New York, 36 App. Div. 476, 55 N. Y. S. 889, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 423, reversing 21 Misc. 598, 48 N. Y. S. 141, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured while seeking to board a street car, by being struck by an ash and garbage cart belonging to the street cleaning department of the defendant city. The court held the city to be liable for the negligence of its employee and said: "The duty or labor imposed on the city . . . as to the removal of garbage and ashes, seems to us plainly not the governmental function of abating nuisances, but the private duty which would otherwise rest on residents and property owners within the municipality."

In Missano v. New York, 160 N. Y. 123, 54 N. E. 744, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 652, the defendant city was held to be liable for the death of a child, who was run over and killed by a horse attached to an ash cart of the street cleaning department. The court said: "At the time this alleged cause of action accrued it was the duty of the city of New York to keep its streets in repair and to see that they were thoroughly cleaned and kept clean at all times; also to remove the sweepings, ashes and garbage as often as the public health and use of the streets required it to be done. . . . The fact that the discharge of this duty might incidentally benefit the public health did not make the acts of the commissioner of street cleaning a public function. It is clear upon principle and authority that the city of New York, in the ordinary and usual care of its streets, both as to repairs and cleanliness, is acting in the discharge of a special power granted to it by the legislature, in the exercise of which it is a legal individual, as distinguished from its governmental functions when it acts as a sovereign."

In Silverman v. New York, 114 N. Y. S. 59, it was held that a municipality was liable for the negligence of a driver of a rubbish cart in running over the foot of the plaintiff while he was sitting on a park bench.

In Barney Dumping-Boat Co. v. New York, 40 Fed. 50, the United States circuit court, following the principle laid down by the New York courts, held the defendant city to be liable for damage caused by the negligent operation of a steam tug belonging to the city and used in removing refuse from the streets.

In Ostrom v. San Antonio, 94 Tex. 523, 62 S. W. 909, a city was held to be liable for the acts of cart drivers in the employ of the street cleaning department, in driving over the plaintiff's land.

In Flannagan v. Bloomington, 156 Ill. App. 162, it was held that a municipality was liable for the act of a cartman in its employ, in dumping garbage and refuse on a lot within the city limits to the damage of the plaintiff. The court said: "The determination by the council of the city of Bloomington as to how and in what manner the garbage and refuse matter might be removed from the streets, was for the determination of the city authorities but the selection of the place of the dumping ground and the dumping of the refuse matter in a place where it caused the injury or damage to another was an action for which city became liable and it must exercise its duty of disposing of this garbage and refuse matter in such a manner as not to injure or expose others to danger and a failure to do so renders it liable. The fact that the city provided an ordinance prohibiting the doing of the acts which it is complained of here were done, is no defense where the violation of the ordinance is permitted and committed by the servants and employees of the city; while there may be a penalty imposed upon a person for violation of the ordinance, this does not relieve the city from any liability for its negligence and wrongful acts."

In Stephenville v. Bower, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 384, 68 S. W. 833, it was held that a municipality was liable for the act of a city scavenger in repeatedly depositing refuse on a lot adjoining that of the plaintiffs, instead of on a dumping ground provided by the city beyond its corporate limits, to the damage of the plaintiffs.

In San Antonio v. Mackey, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 210, 36 S. W. 760, on rehearing 22 Tex. Civ. App. 145, 54 S. W. 33, the city was held to be liable for the dumping of refuse on the plaintiff's land, although the act may not have amounted to a nuisance.

In Clayman v. New York, 117 App. Div. 565, 102 N. Y. S. 661, it was held that the illegal arrest of a woman at the instigation of a street cleaner for an alleged violation of an ordinance declaring it to be a misdemeanor to sweep rubbish into the streets after certain hours, was the act of the police department and not that of the street cleaner, and that the city therefore was not responsible.

BURSON
v.
DOERR ET AL.

Nebraska Supreme Court—May 15, 1914.

96 Neb. 219; 147 N. W. 474.

Service of Process — Leaving at Residence.

Service of summons on defendant by leaving a copy "at his usual place of residence," held valid, within the meaning of that term as used in section 49 of the Code, on a record showing that the sheriff went into defendant's yard; that he handed a copy of the summons to defendant's wife, who was at the time not more than 20 feet from the house in which he resided; that he asked her to give the copy to defendant; that she said she would do so; and that she went into the house with it.

Appeal — Review — Verdict on Conflicting Evidence.

A verdict on substantially conflicting proof will not be set aside, where it is supported by sufficient competent evidence.

Damages — Excessiveness — Assault — Malicious Prosecution.

A recovery of $3,990 for assault and battery, and of $1,300 for malicious prosecution, held not excessive.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal — Necessity of Bill of Exceptions — Affidavits.

Affidavits purporting to show misconduct of counsel, to be available on appeal, must be included in the bill of exceptions.

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Saline county:
HURD, Judge.

Action for assault and battery and for malicious prosecution. Max Burson, plaintiff, and Solomon Doerr et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. The facts stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

James E. Addie and Brown & Venrick for appellants.

R. M. Proudfit and Hastings & Ireland for appellees.

[220] ROSE, J.—The petition contains two counts, one demanding $5,080 for assault and battery, and the other $2,075 for malicious prosecution. In the answers defendants deny that any unlawful assault was made upon plaintiff, and allege that he shot the wife of defendant Kelly, and that the latter thereupon assaulted plaintiff, but used no more force than was necessary to protect her from further injury and to preserve his own life; that no one assaulted plaintiff but Kelly, who was justified in doing so. The allegation that the prosecution of plaintiff was malicious and without probable cause is denied. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $3,990 on the first count, and for $1,390 on the second. From a judgment on the verdict defendants appeal.

The jurisdiction of the court is challenged by defendant Doerr on the ground that the sheriff never served a summons upon him by delivering a copy to him personally, "or by leaving one at his usual place of residence," as required by section 49 of the code, containing those words. Doerr's residence was with his wife and children in a house on a farm in Saline county. The sheriff went into their yard and handed a copy of the summons to Doerr's wife, who was at the time not more than 20 feet from the house. He testified that he asked her to give the copy to Doerr; that she said she would do so; and that she went into the house with it. The contention is that the copy was not left "at" his usual place of residence, within the meaning of that word as it appears in the language copied from the statute. It is argued that "at" means "in," as used by the legislature, and that the sheriff was required to leave the copy in some part of the house. In the general use of the word there is a diversity [221] of meaning, owing to the context. Had the lawmakers intended to limit the meaning to "in," they would have used that word. "At," in the language quoted, has a wider signification, referring evidently to a point in space. In this sense, some of the definitions given by the Standard Dictionary are: "In proximity to; in the vicinity or region of; close to; by; near." "At" includes "in," because leaving a copy in the house occupied by Doerr as a residence would comply with the statute, but it is used in a broader sense. For the purpose of imparting notice, leaving a copy by or near the residence, with the wife, who was in the yard, within 20 feet of the house, and who took it into the house, was as effective as leaving it in the house would have been. It not only means "in," but it also means "by" or "near," in a situation like that described. In this view of the statute, the objection to jurisdiction was properly overruled.

On the merits of the case the principal discussion relates to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict. Plaintiff was assaulted, seriously injured, prosecuted criminally, and kept in the custody of a constable five days. The examining magistrate found that the prosecution of plaintiff was without probable cause and released him. These facts are not disputed, but evidence that defendants were the aggressors is contradicted. The assault occurred early in the morning, November 21, 1910. Plaintiff had come from Poland five years earlier, and was deficient in the use of the English language. When assaulted, he was 26 years old and unmarried. He was small of stature, compared with defendants. He had rented 15 or 20 acres of land in Saline county, with an orchard, a pasture, a barn, a corral, and a windmill. There was also on this land a frame house which he occupied as a residence with a family consisting of Adolph Suesz and his wife and children. The house was in an open yard between the orchard and the pasture, with a public road in front. Plaintiff, under a lease, had been farming an unfenced 80-acre tract across the road. Part of it was in corn, which plaintiff had been husking. Adjoining the [222] cornfield, defendant Doerr, a neighboring farmer, had an open field of wheat growing across the road from the house occupied by plaintiff, who, earlier in the season, had farmed the land on which the wheat was growing. Horses owned by plaintiff had been in the wheatfield two or three times, and he had been reminded of the fact. Defendant Kelly had been in the neighborhood four or five days only, and was an employee of Doerr. The material parts of the story told by plaintiff and his witnesses may be summarized as follows: On the morning of the assault plaintiff had hitched a team to a wagon and had driven to his cornfield to husk corn. A mare and two colts had broken away from him at the corral before he left, and had run across the road into Doerr's wheatfield. Plaintiff could not catch them at the time, but, thinking he could do so a little later, went to his cornfield. When there he saw Doerr, his two daughters, Emma and Alma, and Kelly, and the latter's wife. They had three teams and wagons. They drove onto Doerr's wheatfield. The men chased the mare and the colts and tried to drive them off. Plaintiff immediately returned with his team and wagon and left them at the windmill back of his house by the corral. In the meantime Mrs. Kelly and Emma Doerr left their wagons, went to a private lane in plaintiff's yard between the road and the corral, and tried to prevent the mare and the colts from going in, the intention of defendants being to drive the trespassing animals away for the purpose of impounding them. The women were near plaintiff's house. He protested against their driving his stock away from his premises. The men approached hurriedly. Observing that they meant mischief, plaintiff crawled through the fence into his pasture and tried to escape by flight. Doerr followed him, and Kelly attempted to intercept him. He changed his course to avoid Kelly and ran into Doerr, who beat him severely. Kelly came up, knocked him down and pounded him. Plaintiff was helped up by defendants, and went to his house pursuant to their orders. In the meantime the mare and the colts returned to the corral. Defendants started to take them away, and plaintiff protested, [223] complaining bitterly. Again apprehending danger, plaintiff went into his house. Defendants and the women came up. Mrs. Suesz went to the front door, said she was sick, and told the assailants not to come in. They went to the back door, which had been locked, broke it open, and entered. Plaintiff ran up stairs, got a shotgun belonging to Suesz, and threatened to shoot. The stairway door below was opened. To frighten the intruders, plaintiff fired without stopping them, the shot striking the casing near the top of the stairway door. He again threatened to shoot, and pulled the trigger, but the second cartridge did not explode. He was dragged down stairs and beaten into insensibility. Defendants took him to Doerr's in a wagon, and from there to Friend, where they had him arrested. Plaintiff was unable to give an account of his injuries, but it is shown by physicians or by other witnesses that there was a deep wound in one of his legs; that blood ran from his nose, from his mouth, and from one of his ears; that an eye was closed; that a lip was cut; that his head and face were bruised; that his skull was fractured; that his brain was injured; that one side of his body was partially paralyzed, temporarily interfering with his speech and with his sight; that his hearing in one ear was permanently injured, if not destroyed. The interior of the house, after the assault, as described by witnesses, bore marks of violence. This is the substance of the story told by plaintiff and his witnesses.

On the other hand, defendants testified that plaintiff was the aggressor; that he had been warned to keep his horses out of Doerr's wheatfield; that defendants were pursuing the advice of counsel in attempting to impound the trespassing animals; that when plaintiff came back from his cornfield he used profane language and threatened to shoot Kelly's wife and Doerr; that defendants were not in his pasture or house; that he came out of his house and shot Mrs. Kelly; that he aimed at Doerr, the gun failing to go off; that he was assaulted by no one except Kelly, who did not strike him until after he shot Mrs. Kelly.

[224] The jury evidently believed plaintiff's version of the controversy. It is supported by ample evidence. The proofs are conflicting, and the verdict settled the issues of fact. There is no substantial ground for setting aside the verdict on either count as excessive. Plaintiff was permanently injured. While partially paralyzed and at times unconscious, he was in the custody of a constable for five days. He was comparatively a stranger in a strange land. Suffering and mental anguish were inevitable results of the assault and of the prosecution. No sufficient reason for disturbing the judgment as unsupported by the evidence or as excessive has been suggested or found.

Some complaint is made of rulings in admitting and in rejecting evidence, and in giving and in refusing instructions, but it is clear that in these respects no ruling properly assailed is prejudicially erroneous.

An assignment of error is directed to alleged misconduct of an attorney for plaintiff in treating jurors to cigars. The bill of exceptions contains no evidence of such misconduct, and for that reason the assignment is overruled.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment is Affirmed.

2. Malicious Prosecution of Civil Action, 265.

3. Malicious Prosecution of Criminal Action, 265.

I. Introductory.

It is the purpose of this note to collect those cases which have determined the excessiveness or inadequacy of verdicts in actions for malicious prosecution. The treatment is confined strictly to the actions for malicious prosecution, the cases involving verdicts in actions for the malicious abuse of process being excluded. For the distinction between malicious abuse of process and malicious prosecution, see the note to Malone v. Belcher, Ann. Cas. 1915A 830. Likewise, verdicts in actions for false imprisonment have been excluded, except in instances where an award for false imprisonment is inseparably connected with a verdict for malicious prosecution.

For convenience in reference, the cases have been arranged in an ascending scale according to the amount of the recovery, and where the number of cases renders it appropriate, alphabetically according to the crime that was the subject of the malicious prosecution. In the statement of the facts adjudged to be material by the court in passing on the verdict attacked as excessive or inadequate, the exposition will be found to be complete though condensed and concise in form.

While the infinite variety of the possible combinations of the facts in the adjudged cases makes it improbable that two cases should be identical, the awards in analogous cases are of practical value in the ascertainment of the justice of the verdict in the particular case under consideration, and the courts sometimes avail themselves of the aid of the recoveries in other cases as an elastic standard of comparison. See Billingsley v. Maas, 93 Wis. 176, 67 N. W. 49.

II. Excessiveness of Verdict.

1. GENERALLY.

The ascertainment of the damages in an action for malicious prosecution being largely a matter for the unbiased judgment of the jury, a verdict is not excessive in the legal sense so as to require that it should be set aside or remitted in part unless it appears it has not been fairly obtained or the damages awarded are so obviously disproportionate to the injury shown to have been sustained as to warrant the belief that the jury must have been influenced by passion, partiality or prejudice, or have been misled by some mistaken view of the merits of the case.

Thus in Black v. Canadian Pac. Ry. 218 Fed. 239, supra, in sustaining a large verdict in an action for malicious prosecution, the court laid down the rule in general terms as follows: "The elements of compensatory damage include, among other things, loss of time, peril to life and liberty, injury to fame, reputation, and health, mental suffering, and decrease in earning capacity. . . . This case belongs to a class where the jury is peculiarly the proper judge of the amount of damages, and, before a verdict may be set aside or remitted in part, the court, under well-known rules, must be satisfied that the result was influenced by passion or prejudice, or that the amount was grossly disproportionate to the wrong inflicted. Neither on the evidence, nor because of the manner and method of the trial, can I say that the verdict was arrived at by other than calm, orderly processes. The extraordinary story of plaintiff turned out to be true, and was told in quiet, dignified fashion, without any attempt on the part of himself or his attorney to be dramatic, as sometimes happens in a courtroom. The jury, if observation of faces and manner counts for anything, was an attentive, sober-minded, and hard-headed set of men." Likewise in Gilbert v. Burtenshaw, 1 Cowp. (Eng.) 230, Lord Mansfield said: "The verdict is taken upon two counts: upon the first, 'for maliciously indicting the plaintiff of perjury,' and upon the second, for calling him 'a perjured rascal, and saying he would prove it.' There was evidence in support of both counts. Therefore, the whole ground of the application rests on the point of excessive damages. I should be sorry to say, that in cases of personal torts, no new trial should ever be granted for damages, which manifestly show the jury to have been actuated by passion, partiality, or prejudice. But it is not to be done without very strong grounds indeed; and such as carry internal evidence of intemperance in the minds of the jury. It is by no means to be done where the court may feel, that if they had been on the jury they would have given less damages, or where they might think the jury themselves would have completely discharged their duty, in giving a less sum. Of all the cases left to a jury, none is more emphatically left to their sound discretion than such a case as this; and unless it appears that the damages are flagrantly outrageous and extravagant, it is difficult for the court to draw the line." So in Kinsey v. Wallace, 36 Cal. 462, in holding the award in an action for the malicious prosecution of a civil suit to be excessive, the court said: "The only remaining point worthy of consideration is, whether or not the damages awarded by the jury are excessive, and appear to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice. Whilst there was much in the conduct of the defendants, and particularly of the defendant Wallace, as disclosed by the evidence, which was in a high degree reprehensible, and might well have justified the jury in awarding a considerable sum as punitive damages beyond the actual pecuniary loss of the plaintiff, nevertheless, in our opinion, the large sum of seven thousand six hundred dollars, at which the damages were assessed, is out of all just or reasonable proportion to the damages, pecuniary or otherwise, suffered by the plaintiff, or to the offense committed by the defendants. . . . There is no inflexible or definite rule by which courts can be governed in reviewing verdicts in such cases; and each case must, in the nature of things, depend more or less on its own circumstances. But whilst we do not desire to restrict juries within very narrow limits, in assessing damages in this class of cases, the ends of justice demand that we should not allow verdicts to stand which so far exceed all reasonable bounds as to raise a just presumption that they proceeded from passion to prejudice. We think this verdict is of that character, and we deem it to be our duty to reverse the judgment for that reason, unless the plaintiff shall remit the excess." So in Walker v. Martin, 43 Ill. 508, the court said: "That the courts have power to set aside verdicts, for the reason that the damages assessed are excessive, is not, and cannot be, questioned. It has been exercised, without challenge, for more than two hundred years, which we are not at liberty to disregard. Cases are numerous in which this court has exercised this power, always reluctantly, yet, in every case, where it appeared probable, from the amount of damages assessed, that the jury had acted under the influence of prejudice or passion. In such cases, it would be a severe reflection upon the law, and a stigma upon the trial by jury itself, to say that no redress could be afforded—to admit that a jury is 'a chartered libertine,' free to indulge their worst passions, and through their influence, victimize every man who may be so unfortunate as to have a case before it, in which his conduct does not show to the best advantage. A jury has the power, in a proper case, to visit a tortfeasor with heavy damages, but it has no right to crush him. While great latitude must be and is allowed juries in all actions for personal torts; yet, it must be confined within some limits, no less for justice's sake than for the protection of the citizen. In these kinds of torts it is impossible to estimate precisely the measure of damages which would repair the alleged injury. To a great extent it is a matter of sentiment and feeling, under the guidance of sound judgment, duly weighing all the circumstances of the case. . . . We make no attempt now to find circumstances to mitigate the wrong done by the appellants to appellee, but have taken it in all its magnitude, and admit that appellants did, maliciously, without probable cause, prosecute appellee, on a charge of larceny of coal belonging to appellants; that they did imprison him for some days, and that the accused was discharged from imprisonment, and from the charge by a court of competent authority, and that Walker boasted of what he had done, and declared his ability to pay any damages a jury might find against him, and this in a public tavern, at the time the trial of his case was going on. But there is one fact, which the jury do not seem to have heeded, in estimating the damages—that is, the plaintiff's character. The weight of evidence is, that it was bad, and that should have had much weight with the jury. This action of malicious prosecution, is of kin to the action of slander, and as in that, the damage consists in part in injury to character by a criminal charge, and not wholly in the mere physical injury consequent on the imprisonment on the charge. There is a vast difference between men in society, although theoretically they are all equal. He who has a fair character among his acquaintances and in community generally, is entitled, in an action for defaming it, to greater damages than one suing on a doubtful character; but it must be a very strong case indeed, in which any man, no matter how high may be his social position, no matter how unsullied his character, can be accorded the right to receive for defaming it the enormous sum given in this case. It is a handsome fortune, and places the receiver of it at once on high and independent ground. 'It is a golden shower, and pour'd, not on the head of purity and innocence.' Its parallel cannot be found in such an action in the judicial annals of any country in the civilized world. Though damages in such cases are very much a matter of sentiment and feeling, and no rule can be prescribed by which they shall be measured, still, the judgment of the jury must be exercised in every case, and all the circumstances duly weighed by them. It seems to us, the jury did not give proper weight to the evidence of respectable men, that the plaintiff's character was not good; that he was not an object on which they should lavish so much generosity; that nothing which the appellants did, however maliciously, demanded at the hands of the jury such a vengeful bolt as they hurled at the appellants. The conduct of one of them, while attending the trial of the issue in Will county, though evincing a high degree of malice, though it manifested a reckless disregard of the feelings of appellee; and a spirit of bravado and persecution, not to be tolerated, and most unjustifiable, yet, with all this, the verdict for the wrong is outrageous. No impartial and unprejudiced mind can, for a single moment, indulge the supposition, that appellee was entitled to twenty thousand dollars. . . . What then shall be said of this verdict, dwarfing as it does all previous verdicts ever rendered in a like case? Can we say less, than that it is the result of prejudice and passion, in which the judgment of the jury did not participate? Believing thus, we have no hesitation in setting it aside, and awarding a new trial, on the ground alone that the damages are outrageous."

In the federal courts the correction of an excessive verdict is solely a question for the trial court on a motion for a new trial, the granting or refusing of which will not be reviewed by the appellate court. Black v. Canadian Pac. Ry. 218 Fed. 239.

The primary duty to guard against an excessive verdict devolves on the trial court and great weight is given to its judgment. Williams v. Casebeer, 126 Cal. 77, 58 Pac. 380; National Surety Co. v. Mabry, 139 Ala. 217, 35 So. 698; Abingdon Mills v. Grogan, 175 Ala. 247, 57 So. 42; Gray v. Fanning, 73 Conn. 115, 46 Atl. 831; Mexican Cent. R. Co. v. Gehr, 66 Ill. App. 173; Farrell v. St. Louis Transit Co. 103 Mo. App. 454, 78 S. W. 812; Oreflee v. Savaree, 61 Misc. 88, 113 N. Y. S. 176; Morgan v. Duffy, 94 Tenn. 696, 30 S. W. 735. See also Evansville, etc. R. Co. v. Talbot, 131 Ind. 221, 29 N. E. 1134; Sexson v. Hoover, 1 Ind. App. 65, 27 N. E. 106; Price v. Minn. etc. R. Co. reported in full, post, this volume, at page 267; Walser v. Thies, 56 Mo. 89; Eggett v. Allen, 119 Wis. 265, 94 N. W. 803. Thus in Gray v. Fanning, supra, in sustaining the action of the trial court in setting aside a verdict in an action for malicious prosecution, the court stated the rule as follows: "Upon a careful examination of the entire evidence there appears to be nothing that would or should have necessarily led any reasonable jury to give punitive damages in this case; and certainly there is nothing in the record to indicate that the jury in this case included, or intended to include, such damages in their verdict, or to show that they intended to give other than compensatory damages. Regarded as compensatory merely, the damages given in this case are manifestly excessive and unreasonable; and even if the verdict can be regarded as including punitive damages, looking at the entire record, and applying to the questions involved the principles stated in Loomis v. Perkins

[70 Conn. 444] supra, we cannot say that the trial court erred in holding that the damages were so unreasonable and excessive as to justify it in setting aside the verdict. In such a matter a large discretion is of necessity vested in the trial court, and only in cases where that discretion is unreasonably exercised ought the action of the trial court to be set aside. In this case the record does not show that the discretion vested in the trial court has been unreasonably exercised." Likewise in Mexican Cent. R. Co. v. Gehr, 66 Ill. App. 173, in sustaining a verdict in an action for malicious prosecution the court said: "The judge before whom the cause was tried required nothing to be remitted from the verdict as a condition that it should not be set aside altogether, and it would be a mere assumption of superior wisdom in such respect for us to measure out a less sum and say that it is sufficient. We might think that a less judgment would be enough but it would be a guess that we are not called upon to make." In Farrell v. St. Louis Transit Co. 103 Mo. App. 454, 78 S. W. 312, the court said: "The rule of law . . . has been announced with incessant repetition, that the function or duty of granting a new trial rests peculiarly and specially within the sound discretion of the trial court, and unless it is manifest and apparent that its judicial discretion has been abused or that injustice has been done, its ruling in that regard will not be disturbed by an appellate court. . . . Circuit courts are vested not only with the authority, but are charged with the duty, to supervise the verdicts of juries, and to grant new trials, if in their judgment the verdict is improper or not sustained by the evidence. . . . While the case under consideration appears to be distinguished from the above cases by circumstances of weightier aggravation inflicting more serious wrong on the plaintiff, yet we cannot dissent from the opinion of the circuit court that the verdict was excessive, and the circuit court performed its duty in setting it aside."

It has been held, nevertheless, that where the damages awarded are grossly excessive and indicative of passion and prejudice on the part of the jury the proper course of the trial court is not to order a remittitur of more than half of the verdict but to order a new trial. Bell v. Morse, 48 Kan. 401, 29 Pac. 1086, wherein the court said: "The most serious objection to the rulings of the court is the denial of the motion for a new trial. One of the statutory grounds for a new trial is the award of excessive damages, appearing to have been given under the influence of passion and prejudice. The action of the court in finding that the greater part of the award made by the jury was excessive, and requiring the plaintiff below to remit the same, clearly indicates the view of the court. It is evident from this finding and the proceedings in the case that the jury were influenced by passion and prejudice in rendering the verdict which was so grossly excessive, and within the authority of the cases already decided a new trial should have been granted." And in Vinal v. Core, 18 W. Va. 1, it was held that in an action for malicious prosecution, the proper practice for the trial court is to award a new trial when the damages are excessive in the legal sense and not to order a remittitur as a condition of refusing a new trial, but that if the plaintiff consents to the reduction he cannot complain. The court said: "I am therefore of the opinion, that the circuit court in no suit for a malicious prosecution, if it deemed the damages awarded by the jury were so enormous as to furnish evidence of prejudice, partiality, passion or corruption on the part of the jury, should refuse to grant a new trial, if the plaintiff would remit so much of the verdict, as in the opinion of the court exceeded what was just. If the damages assessed by the jury were so enormous as to furnish such evidence of impropriety on the part of the jury, the defendant is entitled to have the verdict set aside and cannot be compelled in lieu of the verdict of a new and fair jury to accept the judgment of the court; and if in our judgment the verdict of the jury was so enormous as under the circumstances of this case to furnish evidence of such impropriety, we would set aside both the judgment and verdict and award a new trial. But a careful examination of the case has led us to the conclusion after giving due weight to the opinion of the circuit judge, that this verdict of the jury in this case is not so enormous, as on the principles we have laid down would have justified the circuit court, or would justify us, in setting aside the verdict, had the circuit court done what it should have done, rendered a judgment for the full amount of the verdict. But this error of the circuit court cannot be complained of by either party in this court."

2. ILLUSTRATION OF VERDICTS ATTACKED AS EXCESSIVE.

a. Malicious Prosecution of Civil Action.

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of civil suits have been sustained as not excessive:

$200—Ives v. Bartholomew, 9 Conn. 309 (malicious attachment, defendant knew at commencement of civil suit he had no cause of action, plaintiff's pecuniary loss $70);

$450—Walser v. Thies, 56 Mo. 89 (malicious attachment, business of plaintiff interrupted, lost boarders, credit destroyed, ultimately forced to sell out and quit business, jury awarded $800, trial court ordered remittitur of $350);

$750—Nelson v. Danielson, 82 Ill. 545 (suit in attachment instituted maliciously and without probable cause, levy made wantonly on exempt property even "clothing of half-dressed babe" in spite of remonstrance of mother);

$750—Bump v. Betts, 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 85 (malicious prosecution of attachment on paid judgment, court said damages undoubtedly large);

$825—Burt v. Place, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 591 (man, sued maliciously and without probable cause, arrested, imprisoned, thereby rendered unable to secure evidence for defense, civil suit went against him but reversed on appeal, court thought damages liberal but not excessive in law);

$15,000—Weaver v. Page, 6 Cal. 681 (drawer of set of bills of exchange in favor of defendants maliciously sued on second of set but first to arrive, protested for non-payment, at time of suit first of set had been paid, suit accompanied by attachment of property).

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of civil suits have been declared excessive:

$100—Farrar v. Brackett, 86 Ga. 463, 12 S. E. 686 (man, maliciously sued in bail-trover, remittitur of $80 ordered);

$1,500—See Tuckett v. Eaton, 6 Ont. 486 (execution on goods after debt to defendant had been paid, plaintiff was at time conducting auction of goods which were about to become unseasonable);

$1,500—Wheeler, etc. Mfg. Co. v. Barrett, 70 Ill. App. 222, affirming 172 Ill. 610, 50 N. E. 325 (woman, sued maliciously and without probable cause in replevin, sewing machine valued at $60 taken from her, later suit dismissed, appellate court affirmed action of trial court in ordering remittitur of $1,200);

$3,250—Bosch v. Miller, 136 Mo. App. 482, 118 S. W. 506 (woman, sued maliciously and without probable cause by heir of person who had conveyed real property to her in trust, jury awarded $1,620 actual and $1,630 punitive damages, appellate court on rehearing ordered remittitur of punitive damages);

$6,000—Stalker v. Drake, 91 Kan. 142, 136 Pac. 912 (man employed by number of railway companies in various capacities, as freight brakeman, conductor, switchman, and yardmaster, fell into clutches of loan shark by borrowing $25, wilful and malicious acts of oppression and coercion in litigating groundless and fraudulent claims, wages tied up, positions lost, $5,000 punitive damages not excessive, but actual damages reduced from $1,000 to $448);

$7,200—Jacobs v. Crum, 62 Tex. 401 (attachment sued out maliciously and in law at least without probable cause, jury awarded $3,000 actual and $6,000 exemplary damages, remittitur of $1,800 filed, appellate court said verdict for exemplary damages not supported by evidence and ordered new trial);

$7,600—Kinsey v. Wallace, 36 Cal. 462 (civil suit maliciously instituted and attachment procured by defendant, dismissed on stipulation of attorneys, remittitur of $4,600 ordered).

b. Malicious Prosecution of Criminal Action.

(1) Arson or Similar Crime.

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of incendiarism or arson have been sustained as not excessive:

$5,000—Spear v. Hilea, 67 Wis. 350, 30 N. W. 506 (man, charged with others with incendiarism in setting fire to two warehouses belonging to defendant, plaintiff brought before justice, waived examination, committed to jail for lack of bail, detained several weeks, finally procured bail, information filed against him by district attorney, tried, acquitted);

$12,500—See Carp v. Queen Ins. Co. 203 Mo. 295, 101 S. W. 78 (man, charged with arson in setting fire to and burning stock of goods, bonded for appearance at term of court, mistrial as jury disagreed, discharged, court said verdict was large but not excessive, reversed on other grounds).

The following verdict in an action for the malicious prosecution of a charge of burning an unoccupied dwelling house has been declared excessive:

$3,000—Davis v. Seeley, 91 Ia. 583, 60 N. W. 183, 51 Am. St. Rep. 356 (man, of bad moral character, reputation for truth and veracity bad, charged with having burned unoccupied dwelling house, property of defendant, in custody but not incarcerated short time until bailed, discharged at preliminary hearing, admission of evidence of condition of family sustained as bearing on mental anguish, punitive damages recoverable).

(2) Assault.

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of assault have been sustained as not excessive:

$70—Peterson v. Toner, 80 Mich. 350, 45 N. W. 346 (man, arrested for assault after defendant consulted prosecuting attorney, lay in jail ten days, at trial before jury question of jurisdiction raised and sustained by justice, jury thereupon rendered verdict of not guilty, plaintiff discharged, court said amount was large, but jury did not act entirely without evidence in arriving at result);

$750—Fiola v. McDonald, 85 Minn. 147, 88 N. W. 431 (man, arrested for assault in second degree, complaint dismissed at preliminary hearing upon motion of prosecuting attorney, plaintiff taken from work at railroad station, locked up in county jail for two or three hours, lost position with railway company but subsequently reinstated, put to considerable expense);

$4,000—Clarke v. American Dock, etc. Co. 35 Fed. 478 (respectable woman, wife of ship carpenter and mother of six daughters, some adult and away, some small and at home, arrested at instigation of defendants on false charges of forcible entry into house, assault, and gross breach of peace, taken before police court, committed to jail with disorderly women, in default of bail immediately required under pretence of awaiting trial, and afterwards required to give sureties of peace without trial, for purpose of getting and keeping her away from house until defendants could put out her things and tear down house, actual pecuniary damages small).

The following verdict in an action for the malicious prosecution of a charge of assault has been declared excessive:

$4,000—Phelps v. Cogswell, 70 Cal. 201, 11 Pac. 628 (man, arrested on charge of simple assault, never put in jail or subjected to any real hardship or act of oppression, deposited cash bail, appeared for trial twice and on default of appearance of prosecutor charge dismissed, social and business reputation seemingly uninjured, awarded $7,500, trial court ordered remittitur of $3,500, and appellate court further sum of $3,000).

(3) Breach of Peace.

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of threatened breach of the peace have been sustained as not excessive:

$1,200—Shea v. Cloquet Lumber Co. 97 Minn. 41, 105 N. W. 552 (man, arrested on charge that he had threatened to shoot and kill defendants' employees who had been sent to land, title of which was in dispute, to cut and remove timber, discharged at hearing before municipal court, defendants consulted attorney before institution of proceedings, jury returned verdict for $3,000, trial court ordered remittitur of $1,800).

$4,000—Clarke v. American Dock, etc. Co. 35 Fed. 478 (respectable woman, wife of ship carpenter and mother of six daughters, some adult and away, some small and at home, arrested at instigation of defendants on false charges of forcible entry into house, assault, and gross breach of peace, taken before police court, committed to jail with disorderly women, in default of bail immediately required under pretence of awaiting trial, and afterwards required to give sureties of peace without trial, for purpose of getting and keeping her away from house until defendants could put out her things and tear down house, actual pecuniary damages small).

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of breach of the peace have been declared excessive:

$2,000—Ruth v. St. Louis Transit Co. 98 Mo. App. 1, 71 S. W. 1055 (business man, arrested on charge of disturbing peace by refusing to pay fare on street car except with nickel worn on one side, detained for short while, but not put in jail, discharged by police justice, expended $3.50 for bail bond and $10 for attorney's fee, lost less than one day, no damage to reputation shown, jury awarded $1,000 actual and $1,000 punitive damages, appellate court ordered remittitur of $1,000);

$2,500—Farrell v. St. Louis Transit Co. 103 Mo. App. 454, 78 S. W. 312 (man, peaceable, law-abiding citizen of high character, without cause for suspicion, unjustly denounced and subsequently prosecuted by employees of street railway company on charge of disturbing peace in throwing rock through car window, detention prior to arrest by officer attended by rough, insulting and offensive conduct on their part toward him, wholly unprovoked and in no way palliated, justified or explained by company, bailed after detention at police station for one hour, arraigned, tried, and acquitted in police court, jury awarded $1,500 actual and $1,000 punitive damages, order of new trial by trial court affirmed);

$3,825—Shea v. Cloquet Lumber Co. 92 Minn. 348, 1 Ann. Cas. 930, 100 N. W. 111 (man, arrested on charge that he had threatened to shoot and kill defendants' employees who had been sent to land, title of which was in dispute, to cut and remove timber, discharged at hearing before municipal court, defendants consulted attorney before institution of proceedings, jury returned verdict for $4,000, reduced by trial court to $3,825 on ground of failure of evidence to establish one item, court thought damages excessive but reversed on another ground).

(4) Burglary or Similar Crime.

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of burglary or similar crime have been sustained as not excessive:

$1,000—Neys v. Taylor, 12 S. D. 488, 81 N. W. 901 (married woman, returning to premises right of possession of which her husband claimed, found dwelling locked and two men inside, entry refused, she became ill and begged husband to take her into house where she could lie down as she was not able to go back to town, husband broke window, entered and admitted wife, defendant procured arrest of husband and wife on charge of having wilfully, maliciously, and unlawfully broken into a dwelling house by tearing down and breaking windows of house while occupied by hired man, plaintiff waived examination because too ill to attend, bailed, state's attorney refused to file information);

$1,200—Hirsch v. Feeney, 83 Ill. 548 (man, local householder and resident for seventeen or eighteen years, of good character, employed by wholesale house and trusted with goods and key to their establishment, arrest made without grounds for least suspicion, house searched, after trial court had entered remittitur judgment stood for $1,200);

$14,500—Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. Craddock (Tex.) 174 S. W. 965 (switchman, earning $100 a month, charged with burglary and theft from railroad car, information filed in district court against him and then remanded to justice court, tried on second information in district court and acquitted, shot in foot at time of arrest, expended $250 for attorneys' fees and $100 for doctors' bills).

The following verdict in an action for the malicious prosecution of a charge which the court spoke of as burglary at one point in the opinion has been declared excessive:

$750—See Cartwright v. Elliott, 45 Ill. App. 458 (man, between thirty and forty years of age, local resident for many years, good reputation for honesty, arrested on charge of larceny (or burglary?) of harness of defendant, no actual malice, disclosure to counsel, jury awarded $1,000, trial court ordered remittitur of $250, appellate court remanded for new trial on ground of excessiveness of judgment).

(5) Embezzlement.

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of embezzlement have been sustained as not excessive:

$150—Coyle v. Snellenburg, 30 Pa. Super. Ct. 246 (boy, arrested on charge of embezzlement of $10.20, detained for about two hours, closely interrogated, mother appeared and insisted on his discharge, no hearing before magistrate);

Ann. Cas. 1916C.—17.

$300—Eggert v. Allen, 119 Wis. 625, 96 N. W. 803 (man, charged with embezzlement and subsequently with obtaining money under false pretenses, difficulties arose out of real estate deal, discharged because evidence insufficient to convict, jury awarded $300 for malicious prosecution on charge of embezzlement and $700 for subsequent prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses);

$1,500—Rule v. McGregor, 115 Ia. 323, 88 N. W. 814 (man, arrested on charge of embezzlement, while in custody of officer driven around through neighborhood where he was well acquainted during part of afternoon and whole of night, at trial next day dismissed by justice, arrested second time while attending political convention as delegate just as members were about to separate, detained over night, special damages of $100 for attorney's fees and $6 for time lost proved, verdict not excessive as compensatory damages);

$6,500—Evansville, etc. R. Co. v. Talbot, 131 Ind. 221, 29 N. E. 1134 (man, prosecuted on charge of embezzlement, acquitted);

$7,500—National Surety Co. v. Mabry, 139 Ala. 217, 35 So. 698 (plaintiff, at instigation of defendant surety company arrested and indicted for embezzlement of $432.60 by overdraft while acting as agent of packing company, released few hours after arrest on giving bond, attended court for trial two or three times, nol. pros. entered after several continuances, disclosure to counsel by defendant not full and fair);

£2,000—Hewlett v. Cruchley, 5 Taunt. (Eng.) 277 (man, of unimpeached character, clerk for fourteen years to defendant who was deputy prothonotary of marshalsea court, on suspension of defendant from office plaintiff was appointed in his place, plaintiff refused to deliver books or permit inspection showing entry of fees in favor of defendant, latter secretly preferred charges before grand jury which found seven indictments for embezzlement, at trial of first indictment it was announced on behalf of defendant that he was mistaken, acquitted on other six indictments, expended £100 in his defense);

$10,000—Ross v. Innis, 35 Ill. 487, 85 Am. Dec. 373 (young man of good character and uniform integrity, charged with embezzlement of $166, money taken and appropriated as due him from defendant as balance of salary as cashier, disclosure to counsel by defendant not full and fair, heavy damages awarded in two previous trials);

$25,000—Rawson v. Leggett, 97 App. Div. 416, 90 N. Y. S. 5, reversed 184 N. Y. 504, 77 N. E. 662 (man, fifty-five years of age, holding honorable position in community, in employ of defendants between twenty and twenty-five years, for several years prior to arrest at salary of $4,500 a year, charged with embezzlement after confession of alleged co-embezzler, matter allowed to drop after six indictments, Appellate Court held award not excessive, Court of Appeals held that as matter of law defendant had probable cause in instituting criminal proceedings).

The following verdict in an action for the malicious prosecution of a charge of embezzlement has been declared excessive:

$3,500—Billingsley v. Maas, 93 Wis. 176, 67 N. W. 49 (cashier and bookkeeper of corporation, arrested on charge of embezzlement of $35, bailed on depositing $40, in custody but not confinement one hour, prosecution dismissed for want of prosecution, compelled to pay $50 to secure discharge, defendants consulted attorney before instituting prosecution, appellate court ordered remittitur of all except sum of $1,000).

(6) False Pretenses.

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of obtaining property under false pretenses have been sustained as not excessive:

$500—Morgan v. Duffy, 94 Tenn. 686, 30 S. W. 735 (man, arrested on charge of having obtained goods under false pretenses, placed in jail about five o'clock one evening, released about ten o'clock next morning, total want of probable cause, prosecution for purpose of forcing payment of debt);

$700—Eggett v. Allen, 119 Wis. 625, 96 N. W. 803 (man, charged with embezzlement and subsequently with obtaining money under false pretenses, difficulties arose out of real estate deal, discharged because evidence insufficient to convict, jury awarded $300 for malicious prosecution on charge of embezzlement and $700 for subsequent prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses).

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of obtaining property under false pretenses have been declared excessive:

$3,000—Wilson v. Winnipeg, 4 Manitoba 193 (man, charged with conspiracy to obtain money from municipal corporation by false pretenses, informed against by mayor, fees for conducting prosecution paid by city, detained only few hours and in considerate way, no evidence of express malice, very little damage to reputation, court ordered reduction to $500 or new trial);

$4,000—Davis v. McMillan, 142 Mich. 391, 7 Ann. Cas. 854, 105 N. W. 862, 113 Am. St. Rep. 585, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 928, 12 Detroit Leg. N. 771 (man, arrested on charge of obtaining property under false pretenses, under claim that he represented to defendant that president of company had authorized plaintiff's brother to take certain tools and stock of company away, thereby obtaining property with intent to cheat and defraud, prosecuting attorney advised discharge on inability to prove that plaintiff's brother had not so told plaintiff, no dispute that property was obtained by this false representation and removed from state, at former trial verdict for $2,800 set aside as excessive and on another ground).

(7) Forgery.

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of forgery or similar crime have been sustained as not excessive:

$500—Thomas v. Kerr, 137 Ill. App. 479 (man, arrested on charge of intent to cheat and defraud by certain false writing and mortgage on property, in custody of officer and in imprisonment several hours, discharged on hearing before justice of peace who issued warrant, disclosure by defendant to counsel consulted not full and fair, actual malice proved);

$1,000—Scholl v. Schnebel, 8 N. Y. S. 855 (man, wheelwright, arrested on charge of forgery of indorsement of defendant's name on note, done by authority of defendant, locked in cell for nearly four hours, bailed, subsequently proceedings dismissed, disclosure to counsel by defendant not full and fair);

$1,000—Thorp v. Carvalho, 14 Misc. 554, 36 N. Y. S. 1 (man, arrested on charge of attempting to get money by forged order, locked up about hour and half).

The following verdict in an action for the malicious prosecution of a charge of forgery has been declared excessive:

$4,500—Wright v. Hagerman, 42 S. W. 917, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1032 (man, charged with forgery in filling in blank above signature of defendant, arrested and held under bond, grand jury refused to indict, defendant negro ignorant and owning property not exceeding $500 in value, unable to write or read, attorney wrote affidavit for warrant, jury seems to have been prejudiced by evidence not objected to at trial to effect that plaintiff while awaiting action of grand jury was prevented from going to his wife who had been burned by explosion).

(8) Larceny.

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of larceny have been sustained as not excessive:

$100—Clark v. Baldwin, 25 Kan. 120 (man, accused of felony in keeping express package of money after getting it by mistake, disclosure to counsel by defendant as to reputation of plaintiff not full and fair, actual expenses of $20 incurred, confinement in jail ten days, contraction of severe cold while imprisoned, suffering ill health in consequence, court said if jury had returned much larger verdict it would not be at liberty to interfere);

$400—Haas v. Powers, 130 Wis. 406, 110 N. W. 205 (man, charged with larceny of fence material and with threat to commit larceny, acquitted by jury on first charge and second charge was dismissed on motion of district attorney, prosecution arose out of dispute of right to take wood and stumps from fence in highway, defendant did not make full disclosure to counsel, jury awarded $100 punitive and $400 compensatory damages, appellate court held latter not excessive);

$550—Martin v. Coracadden, 34 Mont. 308, 86 Pac. 33 (man, charged with grand larceny of two hogs, result of disagreement as to effect of contract between parties, not committed to jail or required to give bond, tried and acquitted by justice);

$1,000—Callahan v. Kelso, 170 Mo. App. 338, 156 S. W. 716 (man, arrested for petit larceny of turkeys, acquitted at trial, incurred expense and loss of time in amount of $50, jury awarded $400 as actual and $600 as punitive damages);

$1,000—See Johnson v. Comstock, 14 Hun (N. Y.) 238 (man of family, holding respectable position among neighbors, humiliated by search made under warrant preliminary to charge of larceny, no stolen property found);

$2,000—Williams v. Casebeer, 126 Cal. 77, 58 Pac. 380 (married woman charged with grand larceny in stealing with aid of husband deeds and other property, detained in county jail three days before admission to bail, acquitted two days afterward, actual pecuniary loss alleged to be $87.50, at trial of criminal action defendant concealed fact he had found some of property alleged to have been stolen, consulted police justice, a practitioner of law, before institution of prosecution);

$2,500—See Doane v. Anderson, 60 Hun 586, mem. 15 N. Y. S. 459, 39 N. Y. St. Rep. 913 (woman, charged with theft of diamonds, defendant procured search warrant as preliminary to prosecution for larceny, constable invaded plaintiff's apartments, compelled her to undress before him, and to suffer him to put his fingers through her hair in searching for diamonds, "plaintiff could not have been subjected to coarser indignity if she had been a thieving prostitute." defendant admitted that he could not honestly believe plaintiff stole diamonds);

$4,000—Cartwright v. Elliott, 45 Ill. App. 458 (young man of unquestioned honesty, employed by jeweler as packer, charged with purloining watches merely on ground of their passage through his hands before loss though equally accessible to another employee, suffered great indignity, incarcerated in cell at police station for three days, afterward for several days in county jail, told he was thief, efforts made to compel confession, opportunities for advancement in life jeopardized);

$5,000—See Vinal v. Core, 18 W. Va. 1 (man, charged with larceny of large quantity of oil, arrested and carried before justice, investigation lasted two days, discharged by justice, expended $56 for witnesses' fees, paying fare and hotel bills, attorney's fee $25 and time lost worth $25, prosecution arose out of transactions relating to oil-wells, jury awarded $10,000, remittitur entered for $5,000, court said $10,000 damages awarded not excessive);

$25,000—Black v. Canadian Pac. Ry. 218 Fed. 239 (station agent, earning $90 to $100 a month, while on leave of absence arrested in United States as fugitive from justice on charge of larceny in Canada, extradition proceedings dismissed on condition that he was to go voluntarily and without process as ordinary passenger to the place of trial about 2,400 miles away to go over his accounts, agreement trick to get him across border, in Canada thrust in jail, not permitted to communicate with attorney or American consul, not able to obtain medical service for injured hand, compelled to undergo physical hardship and mental distress, then haled through streets handcuffed, taken in day coach with no sleeping accommodations, both wrists handcuffed and not removed until pain of sore hand was so great that he threatened to appeal to passengers whereupon he was chained to seat day and night, missed many meals, at trial charge dismissed on showing of crown without calling him to stand and on admission of auditor of defendant of mistake, refused return transportation, some evidence that sister offered to deposit amount of alleged defalcation pending re-examination of accounts, person exercising slightest degree of intelligence after examination of books would conclude that mistakes were clerical errors or omissions without intent to do wrong; unable to get work after prosecution, jury charged to award compensatory but not punitive damages as actual malice had not been shown).

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of larceny have been declared excessive:

$750—Cartwright v. Elliott, 45 Ill. App. 458 (man, between thirty and forty years of age, local resident for many years, good reputation for honesty, arrested on charge of larceny (or burglary?) of harness of defendant, no actual malice, disclosure to counsel, jury awarded $1,000, trial court ordered remittitur of $250, appellate court remanded for new trial on ground of excessiveness of judgment);

$1,000—Bell v. Morse, 48 Kan. 601, 29 Pac. 1086 (young man, after leaving employment of defendant on his farm charged with larceny of missing harnesses, defendant on advice of counsel procured search-warrant but property not found, no arrest made, proceedings abandoned, jury awarded $1,000 trial court ordered remittitur of $600, appellate court held new trial should have been granted);

$1,000—Cointement v. Cropper, 41 La. Ann. 303, 6 So. 127 (man, charged with larceny of cow, parties had been on bad terms, arrested, bailed, three days at court place during session of grand jury, bill ignored, appeared that cow had been detained in stable lot of property owned by plaintiff but under management of relative to keep her out of cane field, defendant consulted counsel but full disclosure not made, judgment reduced to $500);

$6,000—Loewenthal v. Streng, 90 Ill. 74 (man, charged with larceny of property taken under claim of ownership, in custody few hours, held for appearance to criminal court, grand jury failed to find true bill, defendant proceeded on advice of counsel, trial court ordered remittitur of $4,000 of $10,000 awarded, appellate court granted new trial);

$20,000—Walker v. Martin, 43 Ill. 508, Walker v. Martin, 52 Ill. 347 (poor man, apparently of bad character, charged with larceny of coal, at preliminary examination ordered to give bail for appearance at next term of court, in default of bail committed to jail remaining nine days until release on habeas corpus, defendant, wealthy man, evinced reckless disregard of feelings of plaintiff at trial of issue in criminal proceedings; on retrial jury awarded $25,000, trial court ordered remittitur of $5,000, appellate court ordered new trial).

(9) Libel.

The following verdict in an action for the malicious prosecution of a charge of criminal libel has been sustained as not excessive:

$1,250—Provident Sav. L. Assur. Soc. v. Johnson, 99 S. W. 1159, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 1031 (man, prosecuted for criminal libel, expenses in criminal prosecution about $700).

(10) Malicious Mischief.

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of malicious mischief have been sustained as not excessive:

$800—Merchant v. Pielke, 10 N. D. 48, 84 N. W. 574 (married woman, charged with malicious mischief, growing out of civil dissension, expended $30.15 in making her defense, acquitted and discharged day after arrest, disclosure to counsel by defendant not full and fair, plaintiff not committed to jail);

$2,000—Price v. Minnesota, etc. R. Co. reported in full, post, this volume, at page 267 (man, arrested again after being bailed on another charge, for malicious mischief, statutory felony for dynamiting pier in river above railroad bridge, complaint dismissed by committing magistrate).

The following verdict in an action for the malicious prosecution of a charge of malicious mischief has been declared excessive:

$800—See Seabridge v. McAdam, 119 Cal. 460, 51 Pac. 691 (man, prosecuted for malicious mischief in breaking gates and for entering tract of enclosed land, acted under claim of subtenancy, acquitted, defendant claimed to have acted under advice of counsel).

(11) Nuisance.

The following verdict in an action of the malicious prosecution of a charge of criminal nuisance has been sustained as not excessive:

£250—Farmer v. Darling, 4 Burr. (Eng.) 1971 (man, prosecuted under two indictments for nuisance, acquitted, expended £140 in defense).

(12) Perjury.

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of perjury have been sustained as not excessive:

$1,000—Montross v. Bradsby, 68 Ill. 185 (man, indicted at instigation of defendant for perjury, nolle prosequi entered at same term);

£400—Gilbert v. Burkenshaw, Lofft, 771, 1 Cowp. 230 (plaintiff maliciously indicted for perjury; after fair trial and acquittal defendant was guilty of repeated defamation of plaintiff);

$3,000—Plath v. Braunsdorff, 40 Wis. 107 (young girl, previously of sound mind, physically strong, healthy, arrested on charge of perjury in giving false testimony in action between her father and defendant's father, brought before justice, duly examined, discharged, alleged false testimony on immaterial point, prosecution greatly injured health, rendered her insane, created predisposition to mental aberration);

$8,000—Gulf, etc. R. Co. v. James, 73 Tex. 12, 10 S. W. 744, 15 Am. St. Rep. 743 (man, charged with perjury in testifying for person injured in wreck in suit against railroad, criminal prosecution instituted with advice of counsel, court said verdict for $15,000 actual damages would not furnish ground for setting aside as excessive).

The following verdict in an action for the malicious prosecution of a charge of perjury has been declared excessive:

$10,000—Indianapolis Traction, etc. Co. v. Henby, 178 Ind. 239, 97 N. E. 313 (woman arrested on charge of perjury, bailed on giving bond for appearance, acquitted, insane at time of giving false testimony as result of personal injuries sustained in collision on defendant's line, remittitur of $3,000 ordered).

(13) Robbery.

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of robbery have been sustained as not excessive:

$500—Paukett v. Livermore, 5 Ia. 277 (man, charged with robbery, discharged by justice);

$40,000—Mexican Cent. R. Co. v. Gehr, 66 Ill. App. 173 (young man of excellent family and social connections, of high personal character and presumably of fine sensibilities, earning $115 a month and expenses as assistant to paymaster of defendant railroad company, arrested and prosecuted on charge of robbery of $8,000 or $9,000, rigorous and extremely loathsome imprisonment in Mexican prison for about eight weeks, after remaining at police station about twenty-five hours in a room barren of furniture, with brick floor, solid door and no window, health permanently impaired, reinstatement in defendant's service refused, actual pecuniary loss less than $3,000).

(14) Statutory Offense of Enticing Away Laborer.

The following verdict in an action for the malicious prosecution of a charge of committing a statutory offense consisting in enticing away laborers has been sustained as not excessive:

$4,000—Abingdon Mills v. Grogan, 175 Ala. 247, 57 So. 42 (employee of cotton mill, charged with statutory crime of enticing away laborers and of carrying on business of immigration agent without license, waived preliminary examination, grand jury refused to indict on former charge, indicted on latter charge but acquitted, defendant consulted reputable attorney before instituting prosecution, at trial $2,000 of $6,000 award remitted).

(15) Statutory Offense against Railroad.

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of committing a statutory offense against a railroad have been sustained as not excessive:

$200—See Hagerty v. Great Western R. Co. 44 U. C. Q. B. 319 (man, arrested on charge of driving spike between rails of railroad bridge with intention to obstruct traffic, kept nine days in jail, acquitted at trial, court thought verdict moderate in view of nature of evidence leading to criminal prosecution);

$500—Toomey v. Delaware, etc. R. Co. 4 Misc. 392, 24 N. Y. S. 108 (elderly man, arrested with son after dispute on train as to whether tickets offered for passage entitled them to ride, arrested, prosecuted under New Jersey statute providing for fine of five dollars of any person who attempts to travel on railroad without having paid his fare and with intent to avoid payment thereof, discharged by magistrate, son recovered $.06 which recovery General Term sustained as not inadequate in legal sense, verdict in favor of father said to be substantial but not excessive).

(16) Statutory Offense Relating to Timber.

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of committing a statutory offense relating to the cutting of timber or interference with timber booms have been sustained as not excessive:

$600—Charlton v. Markland, 36 Wash. 40, 78 Pac. 132 (old man, charged with having unlawfully cut timber and cordwood from public lands of United States for purpose of selling it, arrested, tried, acquitted, no evidence that United States court commissioner advised prosecution, plaintiff in custody less than hour but accusation of crime and arrest greatly humiliated him, caused much loss of sleep and some grief);

$1,250.—See Price v. Minn. D. & W. R. Co. reported in full, post, this volume at page 267 (man, arrested for a statutory felony, blowing up with dynamite a pocket boom at mouth of river, bound over to grand jury, released on bail, grand jury found no bill, jury awarded $750 as compensatory and $500 as exemplary damages);

$2,097.25—Proctor Coal Co. v. Moses, 40 S. W. 681, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 419 (man, charged with crime of feloniously cutting and removing timber from a certain tract of land, prosecution not only in law and in fact malicious but also cruel and oppressive).

The following verdict in an action for the malicious prosecution of a charge of cutting timber contrary to statute has been declared excessive:

$1,000—Gray v. Fanning, 73 Conn. 115, 46 Atl. 831 (man, charged with violating the statute (§ 1445, Gen. Stat.) making it a criminal offense to cut standing wood and timber on mortgaged premises with intent to defraud the owner of the mortgage and to lessen the value of the premises, not taken into custody or put under bond, tried and acquitted, total pecuniary loss not exceeding $25).

(17) Statutory Offense Relating to Execution of Written Instrument.

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of committing a statutory offense relating to the execution of a deed or mortgage have been sustained as not excessive:

$2,500—Spencer v. Cramblett, 56 Kan. 794, 44 Pac. 985 (man, arrested on charge that he had given chattel mortgage to bank of which defendant was president on certain personal property which was subject to prior mortgage without referring to it in later instrument, defendant was indebted to bank in considerable sum, mortgage given to secure existing indebtedness, some evidence that bank was fully informed as to existence of prior mortgage before execution of latter, and that criminal prosecution designed to extort payment of indebtedness, prosecution dismissed. $200 for damages to business, $2,300 for reputation, court said damages somewhat liberal but evidence established proper case for exemplary damages);

$5,000—Bowers v. Walker (Mo.) 182 S. W. 116 (practicing lawyer in good standing, incarcerated in jail for half hour, charge of committing statutory felony of fraudulently executing deed of conveyance of lands without mentioning prior deed, dismissed at preliminary hearing).

(18) Stealing or Theft Not Technically Described.

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of theft or stealing not specifically described in the reports in technical terms have been sustained as not excessive:

$450—Orefice v. Savarese, 61 Misc. 88, 113 N. Y. S. 175 (man, twice arrested at instance of defendant on charge of theft of valise containing $800, some evidence of probable cause in instituting prosecution, at trial at General Sessions plaintiff acquitted and discharged);

$500—Stephens v. Gravit, 136 Ky. 479, 124 S. W. 414 (man, charged with horse stealing, defendant claimed vendor's lien on horse, disclosed situation and acted on advice of magistrate);

$500—McIntosh v. Wales, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 273 (married woman, arrested on charge of stealing unbranded calves, deprived of liberty about five hours, taken before magistrate, compelled to give bond for $500, at hearing prosecuting attorney refused to prosecute, charge dismissed, evidence of attorneys' fees amounting to about $250, but petition claimed only $100);

£500—Abell v. Light, 12 N. Bruns. 240 (woman, boarding-house keeper, arrested on charge of unlawfully as bailee detaining and converting property to her own use, property held under claim of lien, right of possession in litigation at time of institution of criminal proceedings, put to large expense and liabilities in defending herself against charge, detained at police office one day, subsequently imprisoned in jail for several hours, bail in large amount required, credit injured, sworn estimate of actual pecuniary loss amount of verdict);

$2,500—Scott v. Dennett Surpassing Coffee Co. 51 App. Div. 321, 64 N. Y. S. 1016 (man, cashier in restaurant, charged with theft of $5.95 on basis of shortage of cash with checks for night, tried and acquitted at Special Sessions, about two weeks intervened between arrest and charge, evidence that during pendency of proceedings agent of defendant acknowledged that "they" had made a little mistake and would withdraw charge if plaintiff would release them);

$3,500—Cuthbert v. Galloway, 35 Fed. 466 (plaintiff, agent for selling photographs for defendant, refused to pay balance to company on ground of infringement of exclusive agency rights in territory, arbitration proceedings broken off by defendant, arrest and commitment on Friday procured on ground that balance received by plaintiff in fiduciary capacity, order vacated on Saturday and released on Monday, ultimate termination in favor of plaintiff, instituted by advice of counsel but complete disclosure not made);

$14,500—Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. Craddock (Tex.) 174 S. W. 965 (switchman, earning $100 a month, charged with burglary and theft from railroad car, information filed in district court against him and then remanded to justice court, tried on second information in district court and acquitted, shot in foot at time of arrest, expended $250 for attorney's fees and $100 for doctors' bills);

£10,000—Leith v. Pope, 2 W. Bl. (Eng.) 1327 (man of family, baronet, officer in army, member of Parliament, charged with horse-stealing, capital offense, house and stables broken open under authority of search warrant, arrested, bailed, defendant admitted on trial of indictment that prosecution was for purpose of getting rid of actions for usury; defendant wealthy).

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of theft or stealing not specifically described in the reports in technical terms have been declared excessive:

$350—Lee v. Taylor. 6 Ont. W. Rep. 332 (man, charged with theft of horse, no warrant issued, two attendances in police court, acquitted, actual outlay and loss of time trifling);

$7,000—Russell v. Dennison, 50 Cal. 243, modifying on rehearing 45 Cal. 338 (man, charged with stealing two mules valued at $100 each, placed in jail overnight, then taken in irons to another jail and kept overnight, imprisoned in another jail four days, became quite sick, illness continued for more than a week, requiring services of physician and nurse, at preliminary hearing discharged, remittitur of $3,500 ordered).

(19) Treason.

The following verdict in an action for the malicious prosecution of a charge of treason has been declared excessive:

$9,000—See McConnell v. Hampton, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 234 (man, "back and forth trader," of liberal education with annual income above $60,000, private citizen, arrested on charge of treason at instance of defendant, man of large fortune who was commander of army of United States at point at which plaintiff came to make some communication relative to enemy, confined about five days, lay on floor of guardhouse, without bed, allowed to procure own provisions, rations of soldier, permitted to speak to others in presence of officer but not to leave guardhouse, defendant declared he should have been justified to have hanged him immediately for giving information to British officers, some personal difference between parties prior to arrest, acquitted at court martial).

(20) Trespass.

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of criminal trespass have been sustained as not excessive:

$250—See Olmstead v. Williams, 89 Ga. 144, 15 S. E. 31 (man, arrested and prosecuted for criminal trespass arising out of dispute of right of possession of real property, acts relied on in justification as shown by evidence did not constitute any violation of penal laws);

$600—Henderson v. McGruder (Ind.) 94 N. E. 530 (man, arrested and prosecuted for violently taking possession of certain real estate, bailed, tried, and convicted by justice of peace on false testimony, on appeal tried and acquitted, not put to any serious inconvenience or expense, court said that measured by standard of compensation judgment seemed large but in that punitive damages were recoverable could not say the amount excessive).

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of criminal trespass have been declared excessive:

$500—Sasse v. Rogers, 40 Ind. App. 197, 81 N. E. 590 (man, arrested for trespass in mowing meadow under claim of license, bailed in sum of $25 for appearance, venue changed, then bailed in sum of $50, prosecuting attorney without any trial dismissed prosecution, discharged four days after arrest, loss of his own services and services of his team $12, attorney's fee $8, nothing claimed for physical or mental pain);

$800—Seabridge v. McAdam, 119 Cal. 460, 51 Pac. 601 (man, prosecuted for malicious mischief in breaking gates and for entering tract of enclosed land, acted under claim of subtenancy, acquitted, defendant claimed to have acted under advice of counsel).

(21) Crime Not Specifically Described.

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a charge of crime not specifically described in the reports have been sustained as not excessive:

$500—Seidler v. Burns, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 266 (man, arrested about five o'clock in afternoon on criminal charge, taken through public streets of city to police station, kept in cell until next morning, case adjourned to next day when he was acquitted, evidence of wantonness and actual malice);

$1,300—See the reported case (man, comparative stranger in community assaulted and then charged with criminal offense, in custody of constable for five days while partially paralyzed and at times unconscious, $3,990 awarded in same action for assault and battery);

$2,000—Finigan v. Sullivan, 65 Wash. 625, 118 Pac. 888 (man, charged with crime, arrested without warrant, incarcerated and kept in jail over night, suffered in body and mind but no injury to reputation shown, paid $200 in defending himself).

III. Inadequacy of Verdict.

1. GENERALLY.

It is a general rule that a verdict in an action for malicious prosecution will ordinarily not be regarded as inadequate in the legal sense, that is, it will not be set aside, merely on the score of the smallness of the damages awarded; subject to the qualification that a verdict will be considered inadequate where the damages are so small as to induce the conviction that the verdict was the result of passion, prejudice, or partiality or that the verdict was the result of mistake or oversight on the part of the jury in failing to take into consideration the proper elements of damage in assessing the amount of the recovery, or that the verdict was the result of the failure of the jury to decide the issues submitted to them, or that the verdict was the result of misapprehension on the part of the jury as to the proof or as to the charge of the court. Paul v. Leyenberger, 17 Ill. App. 167; Gregory v. Chambers, 78 Mo. 294; Wauffe v. McLellan,

51 Wis. 484, 8 N. W. 300. See also Linitzky v. Gorman, 146 N. Y. S. 313. Thus in Paul v. Leyenberger, supra, the court said: "The actual damage was shown with such definiteness as to be capable of being classified under a particular head and determined by a legal measure. There was then that element of damage not only involved in the case, but clearly established. But, from the evidence establishing such actual damage and the verdict, it is perfectly obvious that the jury omitted, for what reason we cannot say, to take that element of damage into consideration in making up their verdict. As a matter of principle, important in the due administration of justice, that omission constituted a sufficient ground for granting a new trial, and the court erred in refusing it. . . . The injury to the plaintiff below from the arrest and imprisonment, cannot justly and properly be said to have been trivial. It was serious and substantial. In such case the rule is that the plaintiff is entitled to substantial compensation; and in case of trivial injury, or even without any actual injury, to merely nominal damages. . . . Where a rule of damages can be discovered, the jury are bound to follow it. . . . It is within the province of an appellate court to revise and set aside a verdict for insufficiency, as well as for excessiveness of damages." Similarly in Wauflie v. McLellan, 51st Wis. 484, 8 N. W. 300, the rule was stated by the court as follows: "There is no room to attribute the smallness of the verdict to errors of judgment. Neither is it necessary to find that it is a corrupt or even a prejudiced verdict. The probability is, that the jury supposed they had unlimited discretion in the assessment of compensatory as well as punitive damages; and hence, for reasons satisfactory to them, but which do not appear in the record, made the assessment at a nominal sum. The fact remains, however, that the verdict is against the undisputed evidence and the instructions of the court, and is therefore, in that sense, a perverse verdict. If the plaintiff recovers less than fifty dollars, he recovers no more costs than damages; whereas, if he recovers fifty dollars or more, he is entitled to full costs. This is the statutory rule of costs in actions for malicious prosecution. R. S. 771, sec. 2918, subd. 4. Because of this rule, the error of the jury in assessing merely nominal damages, when damages exceeding fifty dollars were pleaded and conclusively proved, was a grievous wrong to the plaintiff. This court would not be disposed to disturb a verdict for unliquidated damages because it is a few dollars less or more than the proof and instructions warrant, especially if the costs were not affected by the error; yet under the special circumstances of this case we think this verdict should not be sustained. The motion for a new trial should have been granted, and we cannot regard the denial of it as a proper exercise of the discretion of the court." Likewise in Linitzky v. Gorman, 146 N. Y. S. 313, the court stated the rule as follows: "This is a motion made by the plaintiff to set aside a verdict rendered by the jury in his favor for the sum of six cents damages. The motion is made by the plaintiff on the ground that the verdict is inadequate and the result of a compromise, that the damages awarded are clearly shown to be entirely too small to compensate him for his injury, and on the further ground that the jury in rendering their verdict wholly disregarded the law of damages as laid down by the court. The action was brought against the defendant to recover damages for malicious prosecution. . . . The damages awarded to the plaintiff are, in the mind of the court, inadequate. The plaintiff, as injured, is entitled to adequate compensation covering all the elements of the particular injury. Such elements of damage include loss of time, peril to life and liberty, injury to fame, reputation, character and health, mental suffering general impairment of social and mercantile standing, actual loss or injury to property, interest, and credit, decrease in earning capacity, and all losses sustained in business. Such damages must be direct, natural, and proximate results of the former suit. . . . The plaintiff was entitled to at least compensatory damages for the suffering and humiliation as aforesaid, but the jury, believing that the plaintiff would be amply compensated by a verdict in his favor, found for him for six cents. The charge lodged against the plaintiff by the complainant was done maliciously and without probable cause. . . . But in the case at bar the defendant knew, or should have known, that the charge of grand larceny pressed against the plaintiff herein before the magistrate, when he had but forty cents in his pocket, which he charged that the plaintiff attempted to steal, was made with the intent to do wrong to the plaintiff. This in itself is sufficient to convince the court that it was maliciously intended and without want of probable cause. Therefore the essential elements in a case for malicious prosecution have been shown by the evidence, and the court would, without hesitancy, set aside the verdict of the jury for a nominal sum found, but unfortunately there is an objection which prevents the court from so doing, and that is that the plaintiff should have asked the court to charge that the uncontroverted evidence was that the damages that the plaintiff had sustained were substantial and not nominal, which the court would have done, and charged the jury that if they believed the facts in the case, and that the charge lodged against the plaintiff before the magistrate was done maliciously and without want of probable cause, they should have awarded the plaintiff substantial damages. But the plaintiff failing to request the court to charge, therefore the question of damages was left to the jury for their determination; the court is not without power to set aside the verdict or grant a new trial herein on the question of damages as found by the jury. . . . And as the court has said in the Toomey Case, taking an elderly man into custody and marching him through a crowded thoroughfare in charge of an officer, depriving him of his liberty, away from friends and facilities for bail, putting him on trial, causing fear and suspense, are acts sufficient to call for substantial rather than the mere nominal damages sometimes awarded for a mere technical trespass or wrongdoing. For the failure to request the court to charge as above stated, the motion for a new trial must therefore be denied."

In England, however, it was said in two early cases that the courts will never grant a new trial on the ground of the smallness of the damages awarded in an action for malicious prosecution. See Mauricet v. Brecknock, 2 Dougl. 509; Barker v. Dixie, 2 Stra. 1051. On the other hand, it seems that in Canada the appellate court has the power to increase the amount awarded in an action for malicious prosecution when the damages have been assessed without a jury. See Kalmanovitch v. Muller, 1 Dominion L. Rep. 628, 18 La. Rev. de Jur. 159; Montreal v. Hall, 12 Can. Sup. Ct. 74. And in Louisiana the appellate court possesses the power to increase the damages in an action for malicious prosecution when the verdict is inadequate. Deslonde v. O'Hern, 39 La. Ann. 14, 1 So. 286. See also Maille v. Lacassagne, 35 La. Ann. 594. Thus in Deslonde v. O'Hern, supra, which was an action for the damages growing out of the malicious prosecution of a civil suit, the court said: "It seems that the jury in the court below and the judge likewise reached the conclusion we have announced touching the conduct and acts of the defendant and as being of a character to render him liable for damages, but the judge, by his decree, evidently limited the damages to the actual pecuniary loss or expense sustained by the plaintiff from the acts and proceedings complained of. He made no allowance for the trouble, mortification, mental anxiety and distress caused thereby to the plaintiff, which this court in the case of Byrne v. Gardner, 33 La. Ann. 6, held to be actual damages, although of that nature that could not be precisely measured or determined by money or a money value, and that they were of that kind of damage, the estimate of which is left largely to the discretion of the judge or jury, under art.

1934 of the Civil Code. We think the judge erred in thus restricting the liability of the defendant. To a man of average sensibility, under the circumstances attending this case, the expense or pecuniary outlay to which he was subjected by the acts complained of, would doubtless seem of little significance when weighed with the inconvenience, mental suffering and humiliation experienced by the plaintiff from the causes stated, aggravated as they must have been, by the serious domestic trouble which, according to the evidence, was weighing upon him at the time. These considerations induce us to grant the prayer for the amendment of the judgment, and to increase the same by the additional sum of $250 to that awarded by said judgment, making the entire amount $350."

2. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION OF CIVIL ACTION.

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of civil or quasi-civil proceedings have been sustained as not inadequate:

£5—Mauricet v. Brecknock, 2 Dougl. (Eng.) 509 (damages awarded by jury in execution of writ of inquiry after default of defendant for malicious suing out of commission of bankruptcy against plaintiff and maliciously holding to bail for £1020, bill of costs in superseding commission amounted to £30, trial court granted new trial on ground of inadequacy but Lord Mansfield discharged rule);

$3,000—Montreal v. Hall, 12 Sup. Ct. 74 (defendant maliciously and without reasonable or probable cause instituted legal proceeding with view to dismissal of plaintiff from office of commissioner on false charges of corruption, partiality and improper conduct in making award for expropriation of property required for widening street, one judge thought damages should be increased to $10,000).

The following verdict in an action for the malicious prosecution of a civil proceeding has been declared inadequate:

$100—Deslonde v. O'Hern, 39 La. Ann. 14, 1 So. 286 (man, sued maliciously in ejectment, provisional seizure of household goods, in serious domestic trouble at time, had already paid rent far in advance, suffered inconvenience, mental suffering, and humiliation, on appeal award increased to $350).

3. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION OF CRIMINAL ACTION.

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a criminal charge have been sustained as not inadequate:

$1—Gregory v. Chambers, 78 Mo. 294 (man, arrested on charge of embezzlement of $86.50, confined in jail one day, defendant suggested points throughout trial of criminal case, some evidence of bad character of plaintiff, some testimony that defendant acted in good faith, on advice of counsel and with probable cause, plaintiff expended $101 for counsel fees);

5s.—Barker v. Dixie, 2 Stra. (Eng.) 1051 (malicious indictment for felony, court said new trial could not be granted on ground of smallness of damages);

$250—See Wood v. Newby, 4 Alberta L. Rep. 333, 21 West L. Rep. 438, 5 Dominion L. Rep. 486 (man, in possession of watch for purposes of repair, while temporarily absent charged by defendant with conversion of watch to his own use, arrested, required to recognize for his appearance at hearing, discharged, no actual damages proved, damages assessed by court);

$450—Maille v. Lacassagne, 35 La. Ann. 594 (attorney, charged with obtaining money under false pretenses, retained by defendant to collect sundry accounts but on disagreement as to compensation did not pay over some money, plaintiff only witness for himself, his outlay as set forth in bill of particulars was $2.60 for newspapers, $9.75 for car fare and extra clerk hire, $1.50 for mail matter and telegram, these items reduced on cross-examination to $.80 for newspapers, $.10 for carfare, $.12 for postage and $.30 for telegram, court considered whole affair puerile, said if it should interfere with verdict at all it should reduce amount but did not disturb it for reason that defendant would probably be taught by it that institution of criminal proceedings is not proper mode of redressing civil injury).

The following verdicts in actions for the malicious prosecution of a criminal charge have been declared inadequate:

$06—See Lintzky v. Gorman, 146 N. Y. S. 313 (elderly man, had habit of chewing gum, removed wrapper from fresh package and in attempting to drop it behind defendant in subway car latter grabbed hand, accused plaintiff of attempting to pick pocket containing $.30 or $.40, plaintiff arrested on charge of attempted grand larceny; marched through crowded thoroughfare in charge of policeman, questioned as to pedigree, taken to police headquarters in patrol, subjected to Bertillon system and finger prints taken, on examination discharged, court said damages inadequate but did not allow new trial because of failure to request trial court to charge as to damages);

$1—Paul v. Leyenberger, 17 Ill. App. 167 (man, in direct consequence of arrest and imprisonment on false charge sustained actual damages to amount of $35);

$5—Waufle v. McLellan, 51 Wis. 484, 8 N. W. 300 (man, charged with forgery, held to bail after examination before justice, information filed, arraigned, pleaded not guilty, required to recognize for appearance at subsequent term, nolle prosequi entered, expended $50 for services of counsel, $30 to witnesses, and agreed to pay $50 more to witness coming from another state, verdict being for less than $50 did not carry costs);

$76—See Kalmanovitch v. Muller, 1 Dominion L. Rep. 628, 18 La. Rev. de Jur. 159 (facts as set out in 4 Digest Canadian Case law at page 1283, were that plaintiff was awarded $75 for actual expenses and $1 exemplary damages for false arrest and malicious prosecution, appellate court granted additional sum of $50 and costs of review).

SEIDLER

v.

BURNS.

Connecticut Supreme Court of Errors—
December 19, 1912.

86 Conn. 249; 85 Atl. 369.

Appeal — Scope of Review — Sufficiency of Evidence.

The trial court should not set aside a verdict as against the evidence where there was some evidence to sustain it, but should not refuse to set it aside where the manifest injustice of the verdict is so plain as to denote mistake, prejudice, corruption, or partiality.

Same.

A verdict on conflicting evidence will not be set aside on appeal.

Malicious Prosecution — Excessiveness of Damages.

Where plaintiff suing for malicious prosecution shows that he was arrested about 5 o'clock in the afternoon and taken through the public streets to the police station, where he was kept in a cell until the next morning, that his case was then adjourned until the following day when he was acquitted, and there is evidence that the acts of defendant were wanton and malicious, a verdict of $500 will not be disturbed as excessive.

[See note at end of this case.]

Elements of Damage Recoverable.

The circumstances of aggravation, bodily pain, mental anguish, and injury to reputation, and expenses of litigation less taxable costs, are proper elements of damages for malicious prosecution.

[See 28 Am. St. Rep. 162.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Hartford county: WILLIAMS, Judge.

Action for malicious prosecution. Michael Seidler, plaintiff, and John J. Burns, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Joseph L. Barbour for appellant.
A. Storrs Campbell for appellee.

[250] PER CURIAM.—This is an action claiming damages for a criminal prosecution of the plaintiff, alleged to have been instituted by the defendant maliciously and without probable cause. The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff to recover $500 damages. The defendant filed a motion to set aside the verdict and for a new trial, upon the ground that the verdict was against the evidence and that the damages were excessive. This motion was denied, and its denial is the only error assigned in the appeal.

A trial court should not set aside a verdict as being against the evidence "where it is apparent that there was some evidence upon which the jury might reasonably reach their conclusion, and should not refuse to set it aside where the manifest injustice of the verdict is so plain and palpable as clearly to denote that some mistake was made by the jury in the application of legal principles, or as to justify the suspicion that they or some of them were influenced by prejudice, corruption or partiality." Steinert v. Whitcomb, 84 Conn. 262, 263, 79 Atl. 675.

The defendant contends that the record contains no evidence of malice upon the part of the defendant, nor that the institution of the criminal prosecution was without probable cause.

It clearly appears from the conceded facts that there was sufficient proof to warrant the jury in finding for the plaintiff upon the question of actual malice, aside from the malice implied from the proof of want of probable cause. Upon the question of probable cause the evidence of the defendant materially conflicted with that of the plaintiff. Apparently the jury did not accept the defendant's explanation, but gave credence to the plaintiff's testimony and that of his witnesses. [251] We cannot say that the jury were not warranted in so reaching such a conclusion.

The damages awarded are not so excessive as to warrant an interference by this court. In cases like the present one, there is no fixed rule of damages as in an action of contract. The object is the remuneration for a personal injury which is not capable of an exact cash valuation.

It appears that Seidler was arrested about five o'clock in the afternoon, taken through the public streets of Hartford to the police station, where he was kept in a cell until the next morning. His case was then adjourned until the following day, when he was acquitted. The circumstances of aggravation, the bodily pain, the mental anguish, and the injury to his reputation, were all elements which the jury might have properly considered in assessing damages. But these were not all. As we have said, there was evidence from which the jury could have consistently reached the conclusion that the acts of the defendant were wanton and malicious. In this class of cases the plaintiff's expenses of litigation in the suit, less his taxable costs, are also a proper element of damages. Hanna v. Sweeney, 78 Conn. 492, 494, 62 Atl. 785, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 907; Hassett v. Carroll, 85 Conn. 23, 38, Ann. Cas. 1913A 333, 81 Atl. 1013. Viewed in the light of these suggestions, we are not prepared to say that the damages assessed in the present case are so exorbitant and unreasonable as to warrant the interference of this court in a matter within the province of the jury to determine.

There is no error.

NOTE.

It is held in the reported case that a verdict for five hundred dollars in an action for the malicious prosecution of the plaintiff on a criminal charge is not excessive. The cases on this point are collected in the note to Bursow v. Doerr, reported ante, this volume, at page 248.

PRICE

v.

MINNESOTA, DAKOTA AND WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY ET AL.

Minnesota Supreme Court—July 2, 1915.

130 Minn. 229; 153 N. W. 532.

Malicious Prosecution — Joinder of Causes of Action.

Two causes of action, each for malicious prosecution, held to arise out of transactions connected with the subject of action, and to each affect all the parties to the action, and therefore to be properly united in one complaint.

Trial — Motion to Dismiss Property Denied.

Certain motions to dismiss, made at the close of plaintiff's case and again at the close of all the testimony, held properly denied.

Malicious Prosecution — Evidence Sufficient.

The determination of the trial court and jury that there was no probable cause is held correct.

Same.

The finding of the jury that there was malice is sustained by the evidence.

Same.

The defense of advice of counsel was properly for the jury to determine, and the evidence sustains the verdict on this issue.

Excessiveness of Damages.

The damages are not excessive within the rule guiding this court in cases of this kind. [See note at end of this case.]

Trial — Instructions Approved.

There was no prejudicial error in the rulings on evidence, in the charge or in the refusal to give requested instructions.

Appeal — Saving Questions for Review — Misconduct of Counsel.

A claim of misconduct of counsel cannot be urged as ground for reversal, unless it is made a ground of the motion for a new trial in the court below.

[See Ann. Cas. 1916A 551.]

Appeal from District Court, Koochiching county: WRIGHT, Judge.

Action for malicious prosecution. James L. Price, plaintiff, and Minnesota, Dakota and Western Railway Company, et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Certain defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Harris Richardson and Walter Richardson for appellants.

Arnold & Arnold for respondent.

[231] BUNN, J.—This action was brought to recover damages for malicious prosecution. The original defendants were the appellants here and Minnesota & Ontario Power Co., R. S. McDonald, R. L. Horr, R. J. Young, George S. Langland, John D. McKay and W. H. Forier. Horr and McKay were not served with summons and did not appear. Before the close of the trial the action was dismissed as to all of the defendants except Minnesota, Dakota & Western Railway Co. and International Lumber Company. There was a verdict for $3,250 against these defendants jointly. They appeal to this court from an order denying a new trial, and also from a judgment entered on the verdict.

The principal contentions of defendants on this appeal are these: (1) There was a misjoinder of causes of action; (2) it was error to deny motions to dismiss made by each of the appealing defendants as to each cause of action; (3) there was probable cause; (4) there was no malice; (5) the second of the two prosecutions was begun on advice of counsel. There are also claims of excessive damages, error in the rulings on evidence and in the charge, and a claim of misconduct of counsel. The facts necessary to understand the various questions are somewhat complicated, but we regard the following statement as a sufficient general outline.

The Watrous Island Boom Co., a corporation which appears to have no active agents or employees and the capital stock of which is largely owned by the defendant railway company, owns booms, sorting and hoisting works in the Rainy river, extending from the mouth of the Black river up past the mouth of the Big Fork river. Defendant International Lumber Co. operates the plant of the Watrous Island Co., and manufactures lumber in its mill at International Falls. Defendant railway company operates a line of railroad connecting the plant with the mills of the lumber company; a line [232] runs parallel with the Rainy river on the Minnesota side and crosses the Big Fork river about a mile from its mouth. The lumber company owned a controlling interest in the stock of the railway company. Mr. E. W. Backus was the president and general manager of both these corporations, and also of defendant Minnesota & Ontario Power Co., a corporation which operated pulp and paper mills, and which owned a minority of the stock of the lumber company. Defendant R. S. McDonald was a stockholder in both the railway company and lumber company, was a director of the former, and superintendent of the latter. Defendant Horr was a stockholder in both companies, a director in the railway company and secretary of the lumber company. He was a brother-in-law of Mr. Backus.

The Shevlin-Mathieu Lumber Co. and allied "Shevlin concerns" have mills down the river at Spooner and Beaudette. They had great quantities of logs in the Big Fork river which they had been unable to get out for two seasons. In May, 1912, the Watrous Island Co.'s boom was full of logs; logs were held in a pocket just above the mouth of the Big Fork by a boom which sagged one-fourth of the distance across the mouth, and 10 boom sticks of a total length of about 400 feet hung down river from this sag-boom across the mouth of the Big Fork, which was about 600 feet in width at this point. This was quite effective to prevent the passage of logs from the Big Fork into and thence down the Rainy river to the booms and mills of the rival concerns.

On the morning of May 10, 1912, plaintiff and William Bartlett, who were engaged in making a drive of the Big Fork on behalf of the Shevlin interests, blew out with dynamite the pocket boom at the mouth of that river. In the afternoon of that day they were arrested on a "John Doe" warrant issued on the complaint of defendant McDonald. They were taken to International Falls, bound over to the grand jury, and released on bail. The grand jury afterwards found "no bill." This prosecution constitutes the basis of the first cause of action set out in the complaint.

On May 12, 1912, plaintiff and Bartlett were again arrested, this time on a warrant issued on the complaint of defendant Horr [233] charging them with blowing out, on May 10, one of the piers of the Big Fork river above the railroad bridge. These piers were three or four in number and were set in the river some 500 feet above the bridge. The complaint on this charge was dismissed by the committing magistrate. This prosecution is the basis of the second cause of action.

Defendant Forier was sheriff of Koochiching county, and made the arrest of plaintiff under the McDonald warrant. Defendant Langland was municipal judge of International Falls and as such issued the warrant, and held plaintiff and Bartlett to the grand jury. Defendant McKay was a lawyer employed in the prosecutions, defendant Young, assistant manager of the power company.

The boom of the Watrous Island Co. had been blown out on the ninth at a point just below the mouth of the Big Fork, and logs confined in the boom, some belonging to the defendant lumber company, and some to down-river owners, escaped and went down the river. It does not appear who did this. Employees of the lumber company were engaged in repairing this break. The pocket boom which hung down stream from above the mouth of the Big Fork and extended part way across the mouth of that river was filled with logs, stored there by the lumber company to be later let down into its booms and sorted. Many of the logs in this pocket boom belonged to defendant lumber company, and when plaintiff and Bartlett blew out the pocket boom on the tenth these logs escaped down the river. In the sorting works below defendant lumber company picked out its own logs and all these were hoisted out of the water and taken back up the river either to its mill or the mill of the power company by train. The logs belonging to the Shevlin people and other mill-owners below were sorted out and allowed to go down the river. When logs belonging to defendant escaped down the river, there was apt to be great loss.

It is reasonably clear that conditions at the mouth of the Big Fork constituted an obstruction to the passage of logs from that river into the Rainy, and thence to the down-river mills, whose owners were then making a "clean drive" of the Big Fork. It is clear also that the booms and sorting works of the Watrous Island Co. [234] had not the capacity to hold or handle the logs in the Big Fork. That the situation was serious and likely to bring trouble seems to have been appreciated by McDonald, as there is evidence that on the ninth he begged the superintendent of the Big Fork drive not to blow up the booms, promising to do something to give relief. Instead of removing part of the obstructions McDonald ordered closed up a gap which had been left, went to International Falls and held a consultation with other Backus officers and attorneys. The report of the blowing out of the pocket boom reached McDonald, and he caused a warrant to be issued for the arrest of John Doe and Richard Roe. McDonald, in company with the sheriff, a deputy, Horr, Young and an attorney took a special train for the Watrous Island Co.'s plant at Loman, above the mouth of the Big Fork. There they secured employees of the lumber company, who were appointed deputy sheriffs, and all proceeded by the train back to the bridge across the Big Fork, where they found plaintiff and Bartlett, and arrested them. There is testimony that McDonald directed the sheriff to arrest these men, though he denies this, claiming that he did not know they were the men who had committed the act charged against Doe and Roe. At this time, on the order of McDonald, a boom was stretched across the river above the bridge, and an injunction served on Bartlett restraining him from removing this boom. Plaintiff and Bartlett were then taken to International Falls, held to the grand jury and released on bail.

On Sunday, May 12, while plaintiff and Bartlett were at large on bail, Horr caused the warrant to be issued charging them with having, on the tenth, blown out the pier above the bridge. Another special train carrying the sheriff, or a deputy, Horr, Young and others, proceeded to the bridge, where McDonald and attorneys had come from Loman. Plaintiff and Bartlett were found in their camp there, about to retire for the night. They were arrested, brought to International Falls, and kept in jail until Tuesday morning. There is evidence that Horr gave as a reason for this arrest that the men were out on bail and "he was afraid they might do something."

[235] This is sufficient as a general statement; other evidentiary facts will be referred to as the different questions presented are discussed.

1. The question of misjoinder of causes of action was presented by separate demurrers to the complaint, and the order overruling the demurrers is assigned as error on this appeal. Two causes of action, each for the alleged malicious prosecution of a criminal charge, are attempted to be joined in one action. It is claimed that these two causes of action do not arise out of "the same transaction, or transactions connected with the same subject of action." G. S. 1913, § 7780, subd. 1. It is further contended that each cause of action does not affect all the parties to the action, as is the requirement of the same statute. As all the defendants other than the appellants here, the railway company and the lumber company, prevailed in the action and are not complaining of the order overruling the demurrers, we will not consider whether the two causes of action affected all the defendants. All that is necessary here is that both causes of action "affected" the two defendants who were found liable by the verdict, and who prosecute this appeal. Two questions arise therefore on this branch of the case: Were the two causes of action included in "the same transaction, or transactions connected with the same subject of action?" Do they affect both of the defendants?

It is probably correct that the two causes of action do not arise out of the same transaction, as they arise out of different prosecutions. There were then two "transactions," the first being the act of defendants in prosecuting plaintiff for blowing out the boom, the second, the act of defendants in prosecuting him for blowing out the pier. We say this without amplification of the subject, and recognizing the various definitions of the word "transaction" as used in this and similar statutes. The difficult question is whether these two transactions were "connected with the same subject of action." What was the "subject of action" in the present case? The statute says that two or more consistent causes of action, "whether legal or equitable" may be united in one pleading under the conditions named; in view of the use of the words "whether legal or equitable," we are unable to adopt the suggestion of Mr. Pomeroy [236] (Pomeroy, Code Remedies, § 369) that the clause of the statute as to "transactions connected with the subject of action" probably applies exclusively to equitable suits. It is doubtless true that this clause will find its most frequent application in equitable actions, as pointed out by Mr. Pomeroy and in McArthur v. Moffet, 143 Wis. 564, 128 N. W. 445, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 264; and it is also clear that in equitable actions it is generally easier to say what is the "subject of action." We must hold that the clause applies to all actions.

In cases involving specific real or personal property, it is not difficult to determine what the "subject of action" is, as distinguished from the "cause of action." Generally speaking it is the property itself, or rather the property and plaintiff's right or title thereto. McArthur v. Moffet, supra. In tort actions, it is the property or right of plaintiff for the injury for which he seeks redress. While the matter is confusing, we think the "subject of action" in the case at bar may be said to be the right plaintiff possessed to freedom from malicious prosecutions, his right to an unblemished reputation, uninjured feelings and the other rights invaded by such prosecutions. The meaning of this clause has been the subject of a great amount of discussion, and we feel unable to add anything that would be clarifying. In the Wisconsin case referred to the opinion of Chief Justice Winslow is exhaustive. The cases in this state do not decide the precise point here involved, but they are useful. See cases cited in note to the statute, G. S. 1913, § 7780, subd. 1; 2 Dunnell, Minn. Dig. § 7500, and cases cited. In Montgomery v. McEwen, 7 Minn. 351, it was said that the language was intended to allow the plaintiff to litigate everything arising out of the same transaction, or transactions connected with the same subject of action, in one suit. The decisions since have uniformly construed the statute liberally, with the idea of avoiding a multiplicity of suits. We think that the two causes of action in the case, if not a part of the same transaction, arose out of transactions connected with the subject of action, the rights of plaintiff that were invaded by the prosecutions. The authorities support this conclusion. 23 Cyc. 409, et seq., and cases cited.

The statute requires that the two or more causes of action must [237] "affect all parties to the action." It is not, however, necessary that they affect all the parties equally. As said by the present Chief Justice in Venner v. Great Northern R. Co. 117 Minn. 447, 136 N. W. 271: "One general right is demanded and it is not fatal that defendants are in a measure separately or independently involved." In Pleins v. Wachenheimer, 108 Minn. 342, 122 N. W. 166, 133 Am. St. Rep. 451, it was said: "The relief awarded in such cases may affect them differently; but, when all are concerned in some material part of the subject-matter in litigation, they may be joined." We hold that under the allegations of the complaint in the case at bar the two causes of action affect both of the appealing defendants. There was no misjoinder of causes of action and the demurrers were properly overruled.

2. At the close of plaintiff's case and again at the close of all the testimony defendant lumber company moved to dismiss as to the first cause of action and as to the second cause of action, and defendant railway company made like motions. Insofar as the claim of error in the denial of these motions is based upon the general contentions that there was probable cause for instituting the prosecutions, and that there was no malice, these questions will be taken up later. As to the claim that the lumber company was not responsible for the act of McDonald, or the railway company for the act of Horr, we will simply say that the evidence is ample to show that these men were acting for their respective corporations, within the scope of their duties, and that their acts are the acts of the defendants. It is urged that in any case the railway company was not responsible for the first prosecution, or the lumber company for the second. We do not sustain this view. McDonald was superintendent of the lumber company, and a director in the railway company, while Horr was secretary of the lumber company, a director in the railway company, and a stockholder of both companies. While McDonald signed the complaint in the first case and Horr in the second, they both participated in the arrest of plaintiff under each warrant. The two corporations were controlled by the same people, and their interest in preserving intact the obstructions made by the booms in the Rainy river and the piers in the Big Fork were [238] the same. The two acts of plaintiff and Bartlett were part of the same scheme, done on the same day, and were directed against the interests that, in the opinion of their employers, were obstructing the passage of logs down the Big Fork and Rainy rivers to the mills below. We are unable to say that the lumber company was not instrumental in instituting the prosecution for blowing out the pier above the bridge, or that the railway company had nothing to do with the prosecution for blowing out the booms.

3. This brings us to the merits. The first question here is whether there was probable cause for believing plaintiff guilty of a crime in dynamiting the pocket boom at the mouth of the Rainy river. There is no fair doubt that he and Bartlett actually did the act, but was it a criminal act, or did defendants have probable cause for so believing?

Of course if plaintiff was actually guilty, that is a complete defense to an action for malicious prosecution. This is elementary, as is also the proposition that, even if not guilty, probable cause to believe him guilty is a good defense. The law of probable cause and malice in these cases has been so often stated by this court, and so recently, that it would be useless repetition to again state it. Hanowitz v. Great Northern R. Co. 122 Minn. 241, 142 N. W. 196; Lammers v. Mason, 123 Minn. 204, 143 N. W. 359; Cox v. Lauritsen, 126 Minn. 128, 147 N. W. 1093. In this particular case the inquiry is really as to the guilt or innocence of plaintiff, as, if he committed no crime, there can hardly be a question on the evidence that McDonald and Horr had no reason to believe that he did. They knew the obstructions that existed at the mouth of the Big Fork and above the bridge. McDonald knew well that the Shevlin interests were engaged in a drive of the Big Fork, and that they claimed that the booms and piers in the river obstructed the drive. It is quite clear that he anticipated trouble. We have referred to the testimony that on the day before the boom was blown out McDonald begged the superintendent of the drive not to blow out the boom and promised to do something to give relief. It is also in evidence that the center pier above the bridge had been blown out in a prior year, that its existence in the river had been a bone [239] of contention between the Shevlin and Backus interests, and that Mr. Backus had promised to permit the free passage of logs down the Big Fork, but instead, that the pier had been replaced.

The question therefore on this branch of the case is whether plaintiff violated any criminal statute when he assisted in blowing out the boom or the pier. According to the complaint and warrant upon which plaintiff and Bartlett were arrested for blowing out the boom, the crime charged was that they did "wilfully, wrongfully and maliciously destroy and injure a boom in the Rainy river forming the boundary of said state and the Province of Ontario, which boom was placed there by authority of law, and was then and there the property of the . . . Watrous Island Boom Company . . . contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided." In the minutes of the committing magistrate, this is called the crime of "malicious mischief," but we think it is immaterial whether the prosecution was under G. S. 1913, § 8932, making it a felony to "wilfully or maliciously displace, remove, injure or destroy any pier, boom or dam lawfully erected or maintained upon, in or across any water within the state or any stream forming a boundary thereof," or whether it was under G. S. 1913, § 5479, which makes it a felony to wilfully and maliciously break or otherwise destroy or injure any boom, unless such boom materially obstructs the navigation of any navigable stream. Whether or not the Watrous Island Co. had legal authority to maintain booms and sorting works in the Rainy river, and the record does not show such authority, it seems plain that they had no right to unreasonably obstruct the passage of logs of other owners down the Big Fork river. Page v. Mille Lacs Lumber Co. 53 Minn. 492, 55 N. W. 608, 1119. Defendants were not driving the Big Fork, and there seems no legal warrant or excuse for their interference with the drive of the rival interests. Conceding that the booms and works were rightfully in the Rainy river, through the authority of the Secretary of War, the Department of Public Works of the Dominion of Canada, and the International Joint Commission, facts which do not appear, the necessity for defendant's purposes of the boom and boom sticks across the mouth of the Big Fork is not apparent, while the hindrance [240] to the free passage of the logs of other owners is clear. If defendants had any right in the river so oppressive to others, and so unusual, it was their duty to show it. Not only did the evidence abundantly justify the jury in finding that the boom destroyed by plaintiff "materially obstructed the navigation of a navigable stream," but it justifies us in saying that defendants had no right to obstruct the stream. It follows that plaintiff did not violate G. S. 1913, § 8932, because the boom he destroyed materially obstructed the navigation of the Big Fork and Rainy rivers, and that he did not violate section 5479, because the boom, being an unauthorized obstruction to navigation, was not lawfully maintained.

This is equally true as to the pier above the bridge. The jury was justified in finding that an obstruction to navigation. Defendants had no right to maintain it there. It follows that plaintiff committed no crime when he and Bartlett removed these obstructions to the drive they were making. As before stated, this is equivalent under the facts here to saying that there was not probable cause for prosecuting them on either charge, as McDonald and Horr knew the facts and must be presumed to have known the law. The trial court left the question of probable cause to the jury, under instructions that were eminently correct and fair. This certainly was not error prejudicial to defendants. Considering the evidence as if heard in this court, we have no hesitation in saying that the determination below was correct.

It can make no difference on this issue that the complaint of McDonald was against John Doe and Richard Roe. The bearing of this fact on the question of malice will be noted later, but it is not important on the question of probable cause when the evidence shows, as we think it does, that McDonald had no probable cause to believe that a crime had been committed by anybody. Boyd v. Mendenhall, 53 Minn. 274, 55 N. W. 45.

The rights to maintain booms and sorting works in Rainy river have been involved in several cases in this court. International Boom Co. v. Rainy Lake River Boom Corp. 97 Minn. 513, 107 N. W. 735, 104 Minn. 152, 116 N. W. 221, 112 Minn. 104, 127 N. W. 382; Namakan Lumber Co. v. Rainy Lake River Boom Corp. 115 [241] Minn. 296, 132 N. W. 259. See also Minnesota Canal, etc. Co. v. Koochiching Co. 97 Minn. 429, 107 N. W. 405, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 636, 7 Ann. Cas. 1182; Minnesota Canal, etc. Co. v. Pratt, 101 Minn. 197, 112 N. W. 395, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 105; Minnesota Canal, etc. Co. v. Fall Lake Boom Co. 127 Minn. 23, 148 N. W. 561.

4. Whether there was malice in instituting the prosecutions was, we think, a question for the jury. In the first place they were at liberty to find malice from want of probable cause. In addition to this, there is ample evidence to justify a finding that McDonald and Horr were concerned only with maintaining the obstructions in the river, and had no thought of the rights of others. The facts attending the two arrests, the injunctions, the circumstances surrounding the commitment of the prisoners, the second arrest made after plaintiff had been released on bail on a charge known to defendants before, are items bearing on the question of good faith or malice. We have alluded before to the evidence that McDonald directed the sheriff to arrest plaintiff and Bartlett under the John Doe warrant. This is denied, but the jury was justified in believing it. This evidence destroys the force of the claim that McDonald, because he did not know who had committed the act, cannot be charged with malice.

5. The defense of advice of counsel applies only to the second cause of action. We do not notice the claim of plaintiff that the lawyer who gave the advice had not been admitted to practice in this state, further than to say that we assume that this defense may be good when the counsel, as in this case, is an attorney in good standing in another state. But this issue was carefully submitted to the jury and the decision was that this defense had not been made out. The evidence of a full good-faith statement of the facts to the attorney was not conclusive, as it seldom is in these cases. We must hold that it sustains the verdict.

6. We have concluded that the amount of the verdict is not so plainly excessive as to warrant our interference. It is rather difficult for us to see any great actual damages to plaintiff from these prosecutions. But in this kind of an action it is rare that the compensatory damages can be measured with any accuracy. Plaintiff's [242] reputation may have suffered more than we think, and the degradation may have been injurious to his standing in the community and to his feelings. For the first prosecution the jury awarded $750 as compensatory damages, and $500 as exemplary damages. They gave $2,000 on the second cause of action. The rule announced in Chapman v. Dodd, 10 Minn. 350, is the law to-day in these cases: "The jury are the proper judges of the amount of damages to be allowed in actions of this kind, and unless there is something in the case showing that the jury in their determination were influenced by passion, prejudice or some improper motive, the court will not interfere to disturb the verdict." The trial court approved the amount and we decline to interfere.

7. We have examined carefully the alleged errors in the rulings on evidence, in the charge, and in the refusal to give requested instructions. We find nothing to warrant a reversal. The rulings on the admission of evidence were correct, or at least not prejudicial, the charge given clearly and correctly covered the issues in the case, and gave either in the words of the requests or in substance all of the instructions asked by defendants that were good law.

8. The claim of misconduct of counsel was not made in the motion for a new trial, and cannot be urged here. Pink v. Metropolitan Milk Co. 129 Minn. 353, 152 N. W. 725.

The order and judgment appealed from are affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that a verdict for $3250 in an action for malicious prosecution is not excessive where it appears that there were made against the plaintiff charges of the commission of statutory offenses consisting in the dynamiting of a pocket boom and of a pier. The cases on the subject of what is an excessive or inadequate verdict in an action for malicious prosecution are collated in the note to Bursow v. Doerr, reported ante, this volume, at page 248.

McINTOSH ET AL.

v.

WALES.

Wyoming Supreme Court—June 20, 1913.

21 Wyo. 397; 134 Pac. 274.

Malicious Prosecution — Elements of Tort.

The elements necessary to support an action for malicious prosecution are the institution of proceedings without probable cause, with malice, that they have terminated in plaintiff's favor, and that she suffered damage therefrom.

[See 26 Am. St. Rep. 128.]

Termination of Prosecution — Dismissal.

Where defendants furnished information under oath, on which a justice of the peace issued a warrant charging plaintiff with cattle theft, the fact that the prosecuting attorney thereafter caused the proceedings to be dismissed without submitting any evidence does not render such dismissal any the less a termination of the proceedings in plaintiff's favor.

Ann. Cas. 1916C.—18.

Defenses — Insufficiency of Original Complaint.

Where plaintiff was actually arrested and held under a warrant issued on a sworn complaint, the fact that such complaint did not in fact state a criminal offense is no defense to an action for malicious prosecution.

[See 12 Ann. Cas. 1021.]

Want of Probable Cause — Termination of Original Prosecution as Evidence.

Dismissal of a criminal prosecution against plaintiff at the instance of the prosecuting attorney without submitting any evidence, while admissible to show a termination of the proceedings in plaintiff's favor, is not evidence of malice or want of probable cause.

[See 3 Ann. Cas. 112; 18 Id. 65; 21 Id. 1047.]

Distinction between Malice and Want of Probable Cause.

Probable cause, to justify a criminal prosecution, may exist, though the prosecuting witness acts maliciously, if the charge is true, and, even if not true, if the witness acts honestly and in good faith, basing his charge on facts which he in good faith believes to be true, and which afterward turn out to be false; "probable cause" not depending on the guilt or innocence of accused in fact, but on the honest and reasonable belief of the party commencing the prosecution.

[See generally 21 Ann. Cas. 756.]

Same.

Malice may be inferred from a showing of want of probable cause, but want of probable cause will not be inferred from proof of malice alone.

Proof of Want of Probable Cause Insufficient.

Where, in an action for malicious prosecution, one of defendants was plaintiff's uncle, and had known her in the community from childhood, and there was other proof that plaintiff's reputation for honesty and integrity was good, and she testified that she never had stolen any calves from defendants or either of them, as alleged, the proof is sufficient to raise a prima facie case of want of probable cause.

Evidence of Damages — Injury to Credit.

Where, in an action for malicious prosecution, plaintiff claimed that her credit was injured at a bank by her arrest, such injury can be proved by plaintiff as well as by the bank officials.

Defendant's Wealth.

Where, in an action for malicious prosecution, plaintiff claims that defendant, J., had instituted the prosecution in order that he might get plaintiff and her husband out of the country, and so have freer access to a range for his cattle, and plaintiff prays to recover punitive damages, evidence of J.'s financial condition and the extent of his land holdings, etc., is admissible.

[See Ann. Cas. 1913D 563.]

Recovery of Attorney's Fee.

In a prosecution for malicious prosecution, plaintiff may recover a reasonable attorney's fee for services rendered in procuring her release from the prosecution.

Recovery Not Excessive.

Where plaintiff and her husband were arrested for larceny, and the hearing was held in a country precinct 80 miles from the county seat where plaintiffs' attorneys resided, and without railroad connection, an attorney's fee of $250 will not be held unreasonable, though there is no testimony to show its reasonableness.

[See note at end of this case.]

Punitive Damages.

Where there is evidence of actual malice in an action for malicious prosecution, plaintiff may recover punitive damages.

Appeal — Joint Assignment of Error — Ruling Correct as to One.

Where, in an action against several defendants for malicious prosecution, all of them join in an assignment of error, authorizing an allowance of punitive damages, and it appears that actual malice warranting a recovery of punitive damages have been proved as against one of the defendants, the assignment is unsustainable.

Error to District Court, Fremont county: CARPENTER, Judge.

Action for malicious prosecution. Nancy Wales, plaintiff, and P. J. McIntosh et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

M. C. Brown and Ben Sheldon for plaintiffs in error.

Stone & Winslow for defendant in error.

[405] SCOTT, C. J.—The defendant in error as plaintiff recovered judgment for the sum of $500 and costs against the plaintiffs in error as defendants in the District Court of Fremont County for an alleged malicious prosecution. A motion to set aside the verdict and for a new trial was filed, which the court overruled and the defendants bring error.

There are two separate counts contained in the petition, but the court withdrew the first and the issue as finally submitted to the jury was upon the second count and the evidence directed thereto. It is alleged in the second count as follows:

"And the said plaintiff, Nancy Wales, further complains of the said named defendants, P. J. McIntosh, Jesse Johnson, and Donald A. Beaton, and each of them, and for her second cause of action alleges and says that on the 30th day of May, A. D. 1910, the said named defendants, and each of them, wrongfully, falsely and maliciously, and without probable cause, before Emil Jamerman, a Justice of the Peace in and for the County of Fremont in the State of Wyoming, charged that this plaintiff did, on the 22nd day of May, A. D. 1910, and during the last five years prior to said date, in Rangis, in the County of Fremont, State of Wyoming, unlawfully, maliciously and feloniously steal unbranded calves from the range adjacent to the ranch of this plaintiff and adjacent to the ranches of John Wales and William Johnson, and thereupon prayed and demanded that this plaintiff be forthwith apprehended on the said charge of the said defendants, and said defendants caused this plaintiff to be wrongfully arrested, detained and deprived of her liberty and be brought before the said magistrate and be arraigned to plead to the said charge on the said 30th day of May, A. D. 1910.

"That this plaintiff was so wrongfully detained, imprisoned and deprived of her liberty for the space of about five hours and was compelled to leave her home and work and be taken under arrest a distance of about eight miles and [406] to be taken before the magistrate in the presence of a large number of the friends and neighbors of this plaintiff and accompanied by the defendants as complainants, and the said defendants there caused and procured the said magistrate to order this plaintiff to give bond and this plaintiff was then and there compelled to give bond in the sum of $500.00 for her further appearance before the said magistrate at a time fixed by him, and in default of said bond that she stand committed to the County Jail in said County of Fremont, that plaintiff was afterwards required without her consent and against her will to be and appear before the said magistrate on the 15th day of June, A. D. 1910, and again on the 25th of June, A. D. 1910, to answer said charge.

"That afterwards, on the 25th day of June, A. D. 1910, the said cause came on for hearing before Emil Jamerman, Justice of the Peace, and John Dillon, County and Prosecuting Attorney for the said County of Fremont, appeared on behalf of the prosecution of said cause, and after inquiry and investigation, said John Dillon as such Prosecuting Attorney failed and refused to prosecute said charge and the said charge against this plaintiff was without the consent of the said named defendants herein dismissed and this plaintiff was acquitted of said charge and then released from custody, and said prosecution is now ended and wholly determined.

"And this plaintiff says that she was not guilty of the charge made by said defendants and was never before charged with being guilty of any crime whatever, and up to that time had always been esteemed a good and worthy citizen and respected by all her neighbors and acquaintances in the community where she resides, and the plaintiff further says that the charge was made by the defendants against this plaintiff and said arrest and detention of said plaintiff was made and caused without any probable cause to suspect the plaintiff guilty of the charge as made by said defendants, or of stealing any livestock whatever; and the said [407] arrest of plaintiff was malicious and was caused and procured by the said defendants in furtherance of their expressed intention and design to prosecute and litigate this plaintiff and involve this plaintiff in expensive litigation until she would be forced to abandon her residence and home in the community and dispose of her holdings to the said defendants and those interested with them, to the end that the said defendants for their benefit and profit might have the fences removed from around the lands of this plaintiff and of her husband and permit the said defendants easy access to the open territory and stock range upon the mountain and beyond the holdings of this plaintiff and of her said husband.

"That by reason of the wrongful acts of the said defendants this plaintiff has been greatly injured and damaged in her credit, standing and reputation in the community where she resides, and has been brought into public scandal, infamy and disgrace, and has suffered great anxiety, mental anguish, great humiliation, shame and disgrace, and has been obliged to expend the sum of $100.00 in procuring her discharge from said prosecution and imprisonment.

"That the whole of said proceedings by said defendants against this plaintiff were unlawful, wanton and malicious, and have greatly distressed and humiliated plaintiff and injured her in her good name and reputation, and by reason of the premises plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of Ten Thousand Dollars.

"Wherefore, Plaintiff prays judgment against the said named defendants, P. J. McIntosh, Jesse Johnson, and Donald A. Beaton, and each of them, in the sum of Ten Thousand Dollars, and that Plaintiff may have and recover such other further or different relief as may be just and equitable."

The defendants answered jointly, denying generally and specifically each allegation of the petition, alleged that defendants stated the facts to the justice in good faith, for good cause believed to exist as a duty to the public and for [408] no other reason whatsoever, and denied that they brought about her arrest without probable cause. The plaintiff filed her reply putting in issue the new matter alleged in the answer.

It is assigned as error (1) that the court erred in overruling defendant's demurrer to the second cause of action on the ground that it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; (2) that the court erred in refusing plaintiff's motion at the close of the testimony to instruct the jury to find for the defendants; and (3) that the evidence does not support the verdict and that the court erred in not granting the motion for a new trial. The essential elements necessary to be shown by the petition and evidence in an action for malicious prosecution are (1) the institution of the proceedings; (2) without probable cause; (3) with malice; (4) that the proceedings have terminated and in plaintiff's favor; (5) damage to plaintiff. (19 Am. & Eng. Enc. of L. (2d ed.) 653, 13 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 427.) In the case here the evidence tends to support the allegations of the second cause of action contained in the petition and if sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover what we have to say on that question would be determinative of the sufficiency of the petition. It is urged that proof to the effect that the information which failed to charge plaintiff with the commission of an offense under the laws of this state and the warrant issued thereon were written and prepared by the justice of the peace, the defendants doing nothing more than signing the information and taking no part in the arrest or any other or further action after signing the information is not sufficient to maintain the action. It is also contended that the dismissal of the criminal proceeding by the justice of the peace at the request of the prosecuting attorney without submitting any evidence was not a termination of that proceeding in plaintiff's favor.

The argument as to the first contention is based upon a false premise. The evidence is undisputed that the defendants applied to the justice, furnished him the information, [409] and subscribed to the complaint as the basis of the prosecution, but that they each made oath to the same. Whatever facts were stated in the information were supported by their oaths, and furthermore the jury had a right to presume that they made oath thereto to secure the issuance of the warrant upon which the plaintiff was arrested. The machinery of the law was intended to be put in motion and to all intents and purposes in so far as these defendants are concerned it was, and if their acts were malicious and without probable cause then they could not escape liability in a civil action for damages on the ground that they took no further part in the prosecution or proceedings after signing the complaint.

It may be conceded, as eminent counsel for the defendants claim, that the complaint or information filed before the justice of the peace and upon which the warrant issued did not state a criminal offense, and it may further be conceded that the courts are at variance as to whether an action for malicious prosecution upon such a complaint can be maintained. The great weight of authority supports the right and we think the better reasoning sustains that view. In Scattgen v. Holnback, 149 Ill. 646, 36 N. E. 969, it is said: "It is not necessary, in order to sustain an action for malicious prosecution, that the affidavit on which the prosecution was based properly charged the offense." It may be said that that court had reference to a defective description of an offense, but not where there is no offense charged in the criminal complaint. In Bell v. Keepers, 37 Kan. 64, 14 Pac. 542, it was held that "in an action for malicious prosecution it is no defense that the complaint upon which the warrant of arrest was issued did not state a criminal offense." The reasons for so holding were pointedly stated in that case as follows: "A warrant was issued substantially following the complaint, and it is now claimed that this complaint does not state a criminal offense, and for this reason plaintiff insists that no action for malicious prosecution can be maintained for the arrest made thereunder. [410] This is no longer an unsettled question in this state. This court has repeatedly held that it could not protect a complainant after procuring a warrant to issue on his complaint, to say in answer to a charge of malicious prosecution, that the complaint charges no crime. A void process procured through malice, and without probable cause, is even more reprehensible, if possible, than if it charged a criminal offense. The wrong is not in the charge alone, but more in the object and purposes to be gained, and the intention and motive in procuring the complaint and arrest. The contents of the complaint, when maliciously made, without good cause, are of but little consequence and can give no protection."

In Mask v. Rawls, 57 Miss. 270, it is said that "trespass on the case lies for malicious prosecution, although the affidavit which was the commencement of the prosecution fails to charge an offense known to the law." To the same effect is Lueck v. Hisler, 87 Wis. 644, 58 N. W. 1101. In the note to Ross v. Hixon, 46 Kan. 550, 26 Pac. 955, 12 L.R.A. 760, 26 Am. St. Rep. 123, 129, Mr. Freeman says: "It may be that the charge as made does not constitute a public offense, or that for some other reason no conviction can be had under it, or through constituting some offense, it does not justify the proceeding taken or warrant issued by the magistrate, and cannot for that reason result in a conviction. In each of the instances supposed, there cannot, if the law is properly construed and applied, be any conviction, and on that account it has been insisted that there is no prosecution such as will sustain an action, though it is shown to be malicious and without probable cause. As we shall hereafter show, it is necessary, to maintain an action for malicious prosecution, that the defendant was guilty of malice and acted without probable cause in preferring the charge which he made. If both of these elements are shown to have been present, it is not material that the prosecutor, in the complaint which he made, did not state facts sufficient to constitute a crime, or that some irregularity of proceeding [411] after the complaint was preferred made the arrest under it improper and unauthorized. Hence, if the charge as made was false, malicious, and without probable cause, the person prosecuted cannot be deprived of compensation for such injury as may have resulted to him from it, by proving that the affidavit or complaint was defective in not charging a criminal offense or that the proceedings were otherwise irregular."

As already stated there are courts which have held contrary to the views of Mr. Freeman as above expressed, and to those courts from whose opinions the above quotations are taken, but we think the better reasoning is with the courts which hold that the action can be maintained even though the affidavit upon which the warrant was issued failed to charge a criminal offense, provided the other necessary elements are present in order to make out a case. Indeed to hold otherwise, would, we think, be contrary to the policy of the law, for it would deprive the injured party of a remedy for what is usually a great wrong and far-reaching in its effect.

It is urged that the dismissal of the case by the justice of the peace at the request of the County and Prosecuting Attorney without the introduction of any evidence was not such a termination of the criminal proceeding as to enable plaintiff to maintain her action. In Graves v. Scott, 104 Va. 372, 51 S. E. 821, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 927, 113 Am. St. Rep. 1043, 7 Ann. Cas. 480, the plaintiff was arrested on a warrant issued upon a criminal complaint charging him with obtaining goods under false pretenses. The complaint was dismissed at the time set for trial because of the failure of the prosecuting witness to be sworn and give evidence, and it was held that this was such a termination of the case as would support an action for malicious prosecution for the reason that the case had been disposed of in such a manner that any further action would have to be based upon a new complaint, or by proceedings de novo. The case is an interesting one both upon the law and facts

[412] and also because of the appended note as to when a criminal proceeding is terminated and the right to maintain an action for malicious prosecution accrues. In the case before us the dismissal of the proceedings at the request of the prosecuting attorney put an end to any further proceedings against the plaintiff upon the criminal complaint theretofore filed. Further proceedings upon that record could not be revived and were at an end, though such dismissal would be no bar to a prosecution for the same offense charged in a new and different complaint. That being so we are of the opinion that the better reasoning and great weight of authority sustains the view that the dismissal of the proceedings by the justice was a sufficient termination thereof to enable plaintiff to maintain the action. (19 Am. & Eng. Enc. of L. 681; 26 Cyc. 58.)

It was necessary in order to maintain her action to prove that the defendants acted maliciously and without probable cause. It is urged that proof of the dismissal of the proceeding at the request of the county and prosecuting attorney without submitting any evidence to the justice before whom the proceedings were had was not proof of want of probable cause. As already stated, the evidence of dismissal was admissible as showing a termination of the proceeding, and while theoretically the county and prosecuting attorney was acting officially for all citizens, including the defendants, yet he was not their attorney. He was acting in his official capacity and for the state and not under employment or direction of the defendants. Had they employed a private attorney to draw up the complaint and file it, and such attorney had asked the dismissal, his action would be construed as their act, through their authorized agent, but we are unable to understand how the act of the public prosecutor in procuring the dismissal of the criminal complaint and proceedings which were not instituted by him or upon his advice without having produced any evidence in support of the charge would be evidence against the defendants upon the issue of want of probable cause in commencing [413] the action. It should be remembered that the issue before the justice was not the guilt or innocence of the accused, but whether or not a crime had been committed, and if so, whether there was probable cause to believe that accused committed such crime. Probable cause to justify a criminal prosecution may exist even though the prosecuting witness acts maliciously if the charge be true, and even if the charge be not true, yet if such witness acts honestly and in good faith, basing his charge upon facts which he in good faith believes to be true, but which afterward turns out to be false, he cannot be said to have acted without probable cause. It was said in Philpot v. Lucas, 101 Ia. 478, 70 N. W. 625, that "Probable cause does not depend upon the guilt or innocence of the accused party in fact, but upon the honest and reasonable belief of the party commencing the prosecution." If the rule were otherwise every good citizen would expose himself to an action for malicious prosecution when in performing his duty to the state to assist in the suppression of crime he in good faith subscribed to an affidavit as the basis of a criminal prosecution or proceeding, if such prosecution or proceeding be dismissed without a judicial determination upon a hearing from the evidence upon the question of probable cause. In the case here the proceeding was dismissed by the magistrate, not upon a finding from the evidence upon that question, but upon motion of the prosecuting attorney. The distinction we think is clear between this and like cases and those where the question has been judicially determined by the committing magistrate from evidence before him. He could make no affirmative finding on that question in the absence of any evidence before him. The question is important as bearing on the sufficiency of plaintiff's evidence to make out a prima facie case. The burden was upon her to prove that the prosecution was without probable cause, and we are constrained to believe from an examination of the adjudicated cases that upon the facts here a dismissal of a criminal complaint in the absence of a waiver of a hearing before [414] the committing magistrate upon motion of the prosecuting attorney, without any evidence having been submitted to such magistrate, is not a judicial determination by such magistrate of the existence of probable cause, nor evidence thereof in an action for malicious prosecution subsequently instituted and based upon such proceedings. In Davis v. McMillan, 142 Mich. 391, 105 N. W. 862, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 928, 113 Am. St. Rep. 585, 7 Ann. Cas. 854, which was an action for malicious prosecution, the court say: "We think it can safely be said that the weight of authority denies the rule that discharge by a magistrate upon the request of the prosecuting attorney is prima facie evidence of want of probable cause." The holding of the court in that case and as stated therein accords with the great weight of authority. Such a dismissal can not be said to be predicated upon the sufficiency or insufficiency of the evidence, but upon the expressed desire of the state speaking through its prosecutor to abandon the case without introducing evidence and invoking a finding thereon.

The finding of the jury, the verdict being general, was a finding upon all the issues in favor of the plaintiff. It is contended that the verdict, unless the dismissal upon request of the State be deemed competent, finds no support in the evidence that the prosecution was commenced without probable cause. In this connection it may be said to be the established rule that malice may be inferred from a showing of want of probable cause, but that want of probable cause will not be inferred from proof of malice alone. (19 Cyc. 680.) Both elements are necessary to be shown to warrant a recovery in this kind of an action, although malice may be inferred from a showing of want of probable cause. As to what evidence is admissible as showing want of probable cause, it is said in 19 Cyc. at page 698: "It has been held that the plaintiff is entitled to introduce proof of his general good character or reputation on the question of want of probable cause for the prosecution, or the defendant's [415] belief in his guilt, and this as a part of the plaintiff's affirmative case and not merely in rebuttal of an attack upon his character by evidence on the part of the defense. But of course it should be shown in addition that the defendant had knowledge of the plaintiff's good reputation." In the case here the plaintiff testified that she never stole any calves from defendants, or either of them, off the range, or from any other place, and was permitted to and did introduce as a part of her affirmative case proof of her general good character or reputation for honesty and integrity upon the question of want probable cause for the prosecution. A number of witnesses who had known her for many years in the vicinity in which she lived testified that her general reputation in that respect was good. The defendant Johnson was her uncle, and he had known her in that community from childhood, she being the daughter of his deceased brother. Such acquaintance, and for the length of time shown, we think raises a presumption of his knowledge of her reputation. (Woodworth v. Mills, 61 Wis. 44, 20 N. W. 728, 50 Am. Rep. 135.) In Olson v. Tvete, 46 Minn. 225, 48 N. Y. 914, it appeared in evidence that a search warrant was issued and served at the instigation of the defendant, the premises searched and the property alleged to have been stolen and there concealed was not found and the officer who served the warrant so returned and it was further in evidence that the plaintiff had long borne a good reputation for honesty and integrity. At the close of a plaintiff's case the court dismissed the action and upon appeal the judgment was reversed. The court say: "We think the proof made a prima facie case of want of probable cause, from which malice might be inferred, and that it was error to take the case from the jury. It is true that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to show that the proceeding was instituted without probable cause and with malice. But in such a case it must often be that the only proof possible from the plaintiff is of a negative character, and in reference to matters peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant; [416] and hence less satisfactory and convincing proof is required of the plaintiff to shift the burden on the defendant than would otherwise be necessary. The proof of a thorough search, and the official return to the warrant that the property was not found in the plaintiff's possession, was prima facie proof that the property was not there, and that the plaintiff was not guilty of concealing stolen goods, or of larceny. Proof of the plaintiff's good reputation for many years in the community went to show an improbability that the plaintiff would be guilty of the conduct implied in this charge, and of this the defendant may be presumed to have been aware. (McIntire v. Levering, 148 Mass. 546, 20 N. E. 191, 2 L.R.A. 517, 12 Am. St. Rep. 504; Israel v. Brooks, 23 Ill. 575; Blizzard v. Hayes, 46 Ind. 166, 15 Am. Rep. 291; Woodworth v. Mills, 61 Wis. 44, 20 N. W. 728, 50 Am. Rep. 135.) Such proof having been made, it was fairly incumbent on the defendant to show affirmatively, as he could easily do, the facts, if any existed, justifying a belief on his part in the truth of the allegations upon which the search-warrant was procured."

This decision is one of the many cited in Cyc. supporting the text above quoted, and while it is the general rule as therein stated, that one may not introduce evidence as to his general reputation for honesty and integrity before his character has been assailed in that respect, yet the courts generally have made an exception in this class of cases, as the burden is upon the plaintiff to negative the existence of probable cause, or to show want of good faith on the part of the defendant in the prosecution of the criminal charge. Such a rule is founded in justice and gives the defendant no shelter from his wrongful act, purposely and maliciously accomplished. The defendant is then given the fullest opportunity to show affirmatively in his defense that he acted in good faith or upon probable cause. The defendants in order to show that they acted upon probable cause is instigating the criminal proceeding, introduced evidence of different witnesses tending to show that plaintiff's reputation [417] for honesty and integrity was bad, and also evidence of different circumstances of which defendants had information prior to the prosecution. It may be conceded that such information standing alone, if honestly believed, would be sufficient to raise in the mind of a reasonably prudent man a well-grounded suspicion that plaintiff had at various times prior to the prosecution been stealing unbranded calves of these defendants and others from, the range, and have constituted probable cause for the prosecution. The evidence upon the latter questions was denied by the plaintiff in her testimony. There was, therefore, a direct conflict in the evidence as to the existence or non-existence of the facts relied upon to constitute probable cause and this question was properly one for the jury. We are of the opinion that the second cause of action as pleaded stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff and against these defendants, and that there was sufficient evidence to make out a prima facie case to go to the jury at the close of the testimony, and that the verdict is supported by the evidence.

The plaintiff testified that one of the effects of her being publicly arrested and taken before the justice of the peace was that it injured her credit at the First National Bank of Rawlins. The following inquiry was then made, viz.: "Just tell the jury the facts as to how it was hurt, and what the transaction was." The question was objected to as follows: "We object to this; the best testimony as to whether credit was refused would be that the bank itself." The court overruled the objection and such ruling is here assigned as error. It will be observed that the objection goes to the manner of proof and not to the competency of the evidence. If competent at all, and it was not objected to on that ground, the fact could be proved by her as well as by the bank officials, for it would be a fact within her knowledge. We express no opinion as to whether this evidence was competent for that question was not presented to nor ruled upon by the trial court in the first instance and consequently can not be raised for the first time in this court.

[418] Plaintiff testified as to the land holdings and stock business of Jesse Johnson, one of the defendants. Afterwards the defendants made and the court overruled the following motion, viz.: "I move the court to withdraw from the jury all statements made by this witness as to the business of Jesse Johnson, the amount of land he holds, and any business matters that have been stated by the witness, on the ground that it does not tend to prove any issue in the case; is not relevant to any issue in the case; that the value of a man's property or the extent of his holdings is not a fact to be considered in sustaining the petition in the case. I make the motion at this time because it is sometimes held that we waive our right if we proceed with the cross-examination before making the motion." The action of the court in overruling this motion is here assigned as error. We do not think the motion was by its terms directed to anything other than evidence given by her with reference to the business and land holdings of defendant Jesse Johnson. The relative situation of his land and that occupied by plaintiff was illustrative and bore on the question of motive and interest to defendant Jesse Johnson to get her and her husband out of the country as alleged in the petition, so that he could have freer access to the range for his cattle; and further, as hereinafter stated, as punitive damages upon the facts shown were recoverable, evidence of defendant Johnson's financial condition was admissible. (19 Cyc. 700.)

Plaintiff was further permitted to testify over objection that she and her husband paid an attorney's fee to Stone & Winslow for attending the justice court in their behalf on June 25, 1910. While the ruling was not assigned as error the sufficiency of such evidence to warrant a recovery of attorney's fee may be considered under the general assignment (1) that there was error in the assessment of the amount of recovery, the same being too large. The right to recover a reasonable attorney's fee in a case of this kind is well established. Evidence that such a fee amounting to $250 had been paid by herself and her husband was proper [419] to go to the jury as an item of expense if reasonable in amount, and it appearing that the hearing was held in a country precinct a distance of eighty miles from the county seat where her attorneys resided, without railroad connection, we think it may be assumed that the amount was reasonable although its reasonableness was not shown by testimony. (Waufile v. McLellan, 51 Wis. 484, 8 N. W. 300.) There was evidence of actual malice on the part of the defendant Johnson which would warrant the recovery of punitive damages as against him (Cosgriff v. Miller, 10 Wyo. 190, 68 Pac. 206, 98 Am. St. Rep. 997), and joint error being here assigned if the judgment be good as to him it is good as to all the defendants, and upon the record, the other defendants having joined with him in the assignments of error, they are not in a position to complain. (North Platte Milling, etc. Co. v. Price, 4 Wyo. 293, 306, 33 Pac. 664; Hogan v. Peterson, 8 Wyo. 549-564, 59 Pac. 162; Greenawalt v. Natrona Imp. Co. 16 Wyo. 226, 92 Pac. 1008; Shedd Ditch Co. v. Peterson, 18 Wyo. 402, 108 Pac. 72.) The verdict was for $500, which we think reasonable upon the issues being found in favor of the plaintiff. There is no claim in her evidence that she paid or obligated herself to pay all of the attorney's fee. Her evidence was that "we" (meaning herself and her husband) "paid $250 to Stone & Winslow for their services." The jury had a right to award her a reasonable attorney's fee necessarily incurred or paid for her defense in the prosecution, whether paid by herself (19 Am. & Eng. Enc. of L. 703) or some one else for her (Krug v. Ward, 77 Ill. 603) and upon the record the verdict being general we cannot say in making up their verdict what amount the jury allowed her for attorney's fee. The amount of expenditure alleged in the petition to procure her discharge from the criminal prosecution was $100, but the jury may have allowed her less than that amount for attorney's fee and the balance of the verdict be for other items of expenditure and damage, which were alleged and in proof and also exemplary damages.

[420] Errors are assigned as to the admission and exclusion of evidence over defendant's objection. We deem it unnecessary to discuss these questions in detail, as they are not so discussed in plaintiff in error's brief, nor are their prejudicial character, if any, pointed out in their brief. The attention of the court is called to these alleged errors in a general way, casting upon this court the burden of searching the record to ascertain if error was committed, a burden which rests in the first instance with the plaintiffs in error. We have, however, examined the record and discover no prejudicial error as to the rulings of the court in that respect.

Errors are assigned to the court's refusal to give certain instructions requested by defendants and to the giving of certain instructions over their objections. We have examined these questions and find that the refusal to give the instructions requested and the giving of the instructions objected to are complained of because contrary to the contention of defendants that there was a failure in proof to sustain the action. As we have already held that the proof was sufficient to make out a prima facie case sufficient to go to the jury we deem it unnecessary to discuss these questions further than to say that, in our opinion, the instructions fairly presented the law of the case to the jury. The judgment will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

NOTE.

Where there is evidence of actual malice in charging a woman with stealing cattle, five hundred dollars is not, the reported case holds, an excessive verdict in an action for the malicious prosecution. For a discussion of what is an excessive or inadequate verdict in an action for malicious prosecution, see the note to Bursow v. Doerr, reported ante, this volume, at page 248.

OUTSINGER

v.

CITY OF ATLANTA ET AL.

Georgia Supreme Court—October 3, 1914.

142 Ga. 555; 83 S. E. 263.

1. Licenses — Occupations Subject to — Hotel or Lodging House.

The business of keeping a hotel, lodging house, or rooming house is one so far affecting the public health, morals, or welfare that it is competent for the legislature, in the exercise of the police power, to authorize municipal authorities to require persons conducting such a business to obtain a license.

[See note at end of this case.]

2. Same.

The conferring by the legislature, in general terms, of the power to grant or refuse licenses of the character mentioned in the preceding headnote, in the discretion of the municipal council, without prescribing the bounds of such discretion, will not ipso facto render the grant of power void, as being an effort to confer arbitrary power, but will be treated as authorizing the municipal authorities to exercise a reasonable discretion in the grant or refusal of such licenses.

[See note at end of this case.]

3. Same.

After the thirteenth section of the act approved August 19, 1912 (Acts 1912, pp. 562, 573), had provided that the keepers of hotels, lodging houses, and rooming houses in Atlanta should apply to the mayor and general council for a license, which might be granted or refused in the discretion of that body, if by the further provision that "their action in the premises shall be final" it was intended to confer arbitrary power upon the mayor and general council, by declaring that even for an arbitrary or capricious use of such power there could be no resort to the courts for relief, it would be violative of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and also of the clause of the state constitution which declares that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property except by due process of law. If it be construed to mean that the municipal officers can use a reasonable administrative discretion in regard to the granting or refusing of the licenses mentioned (which are licenses under the police power), and that their action shall be final in the sense that no appeal lies to any other body or court for the purpose of reviewing their action, the provision will not be violative of the clauses of the state and federal constitutions mentioned.

Applying the rule that where an act of the legislature is susceptible of two constructions, under one of which it would be unconstitutional and under the other constitutional the latter is to be preferred, the construction last hypothetically stated in the preceding headnote will be placed upon the clause of the act under consideration.

[See note at end of this case.]

4. Injunctions — Against Criminal Prosecution.

While as a general rule a court of equity (or one exercising equitable jurisdiction) will not enjoin a proceeding before a recorder of a city, instituted for the purpose of punishing the violation of a penal ordinance, yet in certain cases a court having equitable jurisdiction may intervene to protect property or property rights from irreparable damage by wrongful conduct of municipal officers, although repeated prosecutions in the recorder's court, or threats thereof, may be used as a means of consummating the wrong.

[See 10 Ann. Cas. 760; 19 Ann. Cas. 459; 35 Am. St. Rep. 677.]

5. Petition Held Sufficient.

The allegations of the petition in this case were sufficient to withstand a general demurrer, which admits the facts alleged; and it was error to sustain the demurrer and dismiss the petition.

(Syllabus by court.)

Error to Superior Court, Fulton county: PENDLETON, Judge.

Action for injunction. Helen Cutsinger, plaintiff, and City of Atlanta et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff brings error. REVERSED.

[556] Helen Cutsinger, who alleged that she was a citizen of the United States, and of Fulton County, Georgia, filed her petition against the City of Atlanta, the chief of police of that city, the recorder, the mayor, aldermen, and members of council, alleging in substance as follows: On and prior to October 7, 1912, the City of Atlanta [557] had permitted a rooming house or lodging house to be conducted at number 115½ Decatur street. Being physically unable, at that time, to conduct it herself, she employed one Harding to conduct it for her. On the date mentioned Harding applied for and obtained a license to operate the business and conduct it for the plaintiff until she was able to take charge of it for herself. Early in January, 1913, having resumed the conduct of her own business, the plaintiff applied to the city clerk for a license, tendering him $6.25, the amount due for one quarter, in accordance with the tax ordinance of the city. The clerk declined to receive the tender or issue the license, stating that she would be compelled to file a written application therefor. While not conceding the right of the mayor and general council to pass upon such applications as to a business of this character, which was a useful and lawful business, or to deny her a license, yet, in order to be in harmony with the defendants if possible, she filed an application for a license to operate a lodging house for men only at the place named. Pending this application she was advised by the chief of police, through her counsel, that "no case would be made against her" for conducting the business until after the application had been passed on, and then only if it should be refused. She accordingly proceeded with the conduct of her business until a few days before the filing of the petition, when she was notified by a police officer, who stated that he was acting under the direction of the chief of police, that her application had been refused and she would be compelled to close, and would not be allowed longer to operate her lodging house, that if she attempted to do so she would be charged with the commission of a violation of the municipal ordinance of the city against doing business without a license, that her employees would be arrested, and that she would be carried before the recorder and tried and punished by fine or imprisonment, and that other cases would be instituted against her from day to day until she closed her lodging house. During all the time in which she has been engaged in the business she has been conducting an orderly place, catering to white male trade only, and strictly complying with the laws of the State and the ordinances of the city, and seeking to earn an honest living by the proper pursuit of a legitimate line of business. She has been persecuted, harassed, humiliated, and damaged by the chief of police by continually "flooding" her place of business with police officers and plain-clothes [558] detectives, without any search-warrant or other legal authority. By reason of these continued raids the business and patronage of her lodging house has been considerably and materially diminished, and her revenue has been much reduced. She caters to a class of "country white male trade," and the poorer classes of white men, many of whom pay only twenty-five cents for a bed or cot. Such men are easily intimidated and alarmed at police raids and illegal searches, and they either leave or do not return to her place of business; and she is also humiliated, disgraced, and mortified by such continued illegal and unwarranted action on the part of the police officers under the direction of the chief. She has had as many as ten policemen in her house at one time. A squad of "plain-clothes men" will suddenly enter her house; the officer in command will take charge of the front door, the only place of exit, and will send his force from room to room searching the house. These police squads have taken possession of her lodging-house register and have gone from room to room and asked the occupant of each bed or room his name, waking them if necessary, and seeing if they were in the proper room, and if their names corresponded to the names on the register. To the best of her knowledge and belief, at none of these times has there been any warrant of any kind or character for such action. She has protested against these raids, but has been advised that she had better submit without comment and allow such persecution, as it would be necessary for her to have the permission of the chief of police in order to procure her license, and that he would oppose her obtaining the license if she did not submit. She filed her application for the license on January 3, 1913, but the council did not refuse it until March 6 following. During that period her place of business has been under constant police surveillance and subject to frequent raids, and at no time has there been a single complaint of any violation of any City, State, or Federal law by her or any occupant or patron of her lodging house. Although she has conducted her business at the place mentioned for months, and in absolute compliance with the law and all police regulations, and has submitted to the police raids mentioned, nevertheless she is advised by a representative of the chief of police that she must close her place of business and yield her right to make an honest living, "unless she meekly submits to the will of the chief of police, J. L. Beavers, who, petitioner believes, [559] is responsible for the denial of her application for license by the mayor and general council of the City of Atlanta." Her lodging house is located near to the police headquarters and within two blocks of the call-office of the police department. On March 23, 1913, the chief of police went in person to her place of business, took charge of her register, instructed an officer who accompanied him to take the names of men who had registered therein, ordered her to allow no one else to register, and to close up her house, and served her with a copy of charges to appear at the recorder's court for violating the rooming-house ordinance. A case was docketed against her, which is now pending. "Your petitioner is advised and believes that said chief Beavers, although he knew that he had used every endeavor possible to find your petitioner violating some law or ordinance, and had failed, yet wrote the police committee of the general council, to whom this application was referred, and recommended to them that the application of petitioner be denied." The action of the chief of police in making this case and in threatening to make other cases from day to day is based upon an amendment to the charter of the City of Atlanta, enacted by the legislature in 1912 (Acts 1912, p. 573, sec. 13), which reads as follows: "That the Mayor and General Council be and they are hereby authorized to regulate hotels, lodging houses, dance halls, rooming houses, and similar places, and they are further authorized and empowered, by ordinance, to require all person or persons owning or operating such hotels, houses, or halls to apply for a license for the operation of same, and such license may be granted or refused in the discretion of the Mayor and General Council, and their action in the premises shall be final. For a violation of such ordinance or the operation without a license granted, as herein provided, any person or persons adjudged guilty thereof in the Recorder's Court shall be subject to a sentence to pay a fine of not exceeding five hundred dollars, or to work on the public works of the city for not exceeding thirty days, either or both in the discretion of the recorder." Under this the mayor and general council adopted an ordinance the first section of which reads as follows: "Be it ordained by the Mayor and General Council, that any person, firm, or corporation desiring to open or operate a hotel, lodging house, dance hall, rooming house, or similar place shall, before opening or operating such house or place, file a petition for a license, addressed to the Mayor and General Council. If said license is granted, then the City Clerk is authorized [560] to issue and receipt for a business license for such house; but if such license is refused, then such business license shall not be issued, and it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to operate such house or place." The second section imposed a penalty upon "any person, firm, or corporation owning or operating any hotel, lodging house, dance hall, rooming house, or similar place, without being granted a license therefor by action of the mayor and general council." Under this ordinance the defendants are now seeking to close her house, stop her business, and involve her in a multiplicity of criminal prosecutions. The application which she filed was referred to a subcommittee of the general council, known as the police committee, though without notice to her. She is advised and believes that the chief of police, "by private official letter" to the chairman of the police committee, without notice to her, undertook to prejudice the chairman and other members of the police committee, and through their report the mayor and general council, against granting the application of the plaintiff, and, to the best of her knowledge and belief, undertook privately in personal conversation to influence the members of the police committee to make an adverse report upon her application, without giving her the privilege of knowing the reasons assigned for such action on the part of the committee, or an opportunity to be heard upon them and to reply thereto. At one time her counsel happened to be present at a meeting of the committee and spoke to them in relation to her application, but she is not advised as to whether the committee had passed adversely upon it at that time or not. At that particular meeting the chief of police was present, but offered no public objection to the application, and no notice was given or opportunity for her or her counsel to answer any objection at that meeting. The entry upon the application shows an adverse report by the committee, dated January 20, but it was not passed upon by the council until March 6. She is advised and believes "that said police committee met in secret session about half an hour before the meeting of the general council, and, upon the information, not under oath, of the said chief Beavers, advised or passed unfavorably upon the petition or application." The action of the general council followed the recommendation of the police committee, without any investigation on the part of the general council; and under the ordinances of the city she would not have been permitted to be present and to have discussed the merits of [561] her application, and the only method of reaching the city government was through its police committee. She is a woman of mature years, now past middle life. On account of her great weight (two hundred and eighty-six pounds), and on account of her having undergone several surgical operations, she is unable to do manual labor or remain long standing upon her feet. She is familiar with the lodging-house business, and it is practically the only business with which she is familiar and which she is physically able to carry on. She has built up a sufficient business to support herself reasonably, and the name and good will of her business at the location mentioned is an intangible but valuable asset. There can be no reason for any denial of a license to operate a lodging house at this location. The place is located on the second floor of a building, with a stairway entrance to the street, and affects and injures no one; but the location is one where a hotel or lodging house of a cheap character is needed to accommodate a class of poor laboring men working in that locality, and men from the country who have come to town for the sale of their goods and the purchase of merchandise. The business was in operation at the time of the passage of the ordinance above mentioned, and the plaintiff had made large investments in furniture, in papering and painting of walls and woodwork, in carpeting of floors, halls, and steps, and in the installation of gas and electric fixtures and equipment. Practically all of this expenditure will be lost if she is compelled to cease doing business, as well as the name and good will of her business. "Petitioner is advised and believes, that, owing to the antagonistic attitude of the chief of police toward her, she will not be allowed by the mayor and general council of the City of Atlanta to have any license to operate a lodging house at any other point available to her in the City of Atlanta, and that her rights and her experience in the lodging-house business are forever lost to her, as far as being able to use the same in the City of Atlanta." The patronage of a lodging house is affected by so many considerations that it is impossible to estimate the damages which would result from a destruction of the business. To press the proceeding in the recorder's court would expose her to humiliation, embarrassment, expense, and possibly to temporary confinement, should it become necessary for her to have the action of the recorder reviewed by certiorari; and this might continue for months before the case could be heard. The [562] plaintiff, having no real estate, and not being allowed to continue her business, could in all probability procure no bondsman, but would be compelled to languish in jail, and in the meantime her property, her business, would be destroyed; and even though she should ultimately win, the victory would be an empty one, and she would be discharged from jail without a vestige of property left. The multiplicity of the threatened quasi criminal cases would bankrupt her in the payment of counsel fees and other expenses. "Such action amounts to nothing more or less than absolute confiscation of the property of petitioner and her utter ruin financially and in a general business in the said City of Atlanta." She will therefore be irreparably damaged, and have no legal remedy or redress. "Your petitioner shows that said criminal prosecutions now threatened to be continued are obviously nothing but a circuitous method of depriving petitioner of her property and property rights in said business, and are nothing more than an attempt by the municipal authorities of the city of Atlanta, under the pretense of seeking the good of the portion of society entrusted to their supervision, are in fact attacking the vested rights, property rights, of your petitioner." The threatened repeated prosecutions, under color of municipal ordinances, if not prevented, will practically destroy her vested property rights; "and said criminal prosecutions are a wresting of the criminal side of the law from its legitimate purpose, in matters to which they do not properly apply, and are used merely as a cloak to hide the effort to prevent petitioner from engaging in her useful and lawful occupation." The act of the legislature above quoted is unconstitutional as being in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States (Civil Code (1910) § 6700), in that it attempts to vest in the mayor and general council the arbitrary right to abridge the privilege of the plaintiff to do business, and thus denies to her due process of law and the equal protection of the laws. The ordinance is unconstitutional for the same reason; as is also the action of the mayor and council. The act of the legislature and the ordinance based upon it are also in conflict with the provision of the State constitution which declares that "Protection to person and property is the paramount duty of government, and shall be impartial and complete" (Civil Code (1910) § 6358). They also violate the provision of the State constitution that "no person shall be deprived [563] of life, liberty, or property, except by due process of law" (Civil Code (1910) § 6359). The act of the legislature and the ordinance are unreasonable, and seek to invest the mayor and general council with arbitrary power, with no rule or regulation to guide it, or to prescribe terms for its exercise, or put any limitation upon it, and without prescribing any terms or conditions upon which a permit or license can be obtained, or allowing any appeal from the decision of the general council, or prescribing any rules of procedure. Even if discretion is lodged in the municipal authorities, it has not been fairly administered, but has been arbitrarily and grossly abused, amounting to a discrimination against her and an oppression of her as a citizen, and it is being capriciously exercised in an arbitrary manner. In fact the abuse of discretion amounts to a failure to exercise municipal discretion, and to an arbitrary undertaking to exercise unlimited power, without recognition of the rights of the plaintiff, and without giving to her an opportunity to be heard in her own behalf. She is willing to submit to any reasonable regulations that do not amount to a prohibition or a confiscation of her property and civil rights, and she offers to submit to any reasonable rule and regulations the court may impose. She prays that an injunction be granted to prevent the defendants from interfering with the operation of her business, or proceeding with quasi criminal prosecutions against her.

The defendants demurred to the petition, on the grounds that no cause of action was set out; that it undertook to enjoin a criminal prosecution by equitable procedure; that it appeared that the city was authorized to grant or reject the application for license and that it had rejected the same, and no injunction should be granted against the further prosecution of the plaintiff; and that no grounds of equitable interference are set out. The demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiff excepted.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts.)—

1. The police power to grant licenses by which one person can conduct a certain business and another cannot, or by which a business may be conducted at a certain place and not at another, necessarily involves some discrimination for the public welfare. Such licenses have been broadly grouped into four classes: (1) [564] Where promiscuous or indiscriminate freedom to act will disturb public order or interfere with the common use of public places. A type of this class is in regard to permitting the use of the public streets for parades or processions, which may impede public traffic or cause serious collisions if all be allowed the privilege; or the granting of permission to a street railway to lay its tracks in a street, which does not require the same permission to be granted to all other similar companies to the exclusion or injury of the general public. (2) Where an occupation is offensive to comfort or endangers public safety, it may be so restricted as to locality or the manner in which it shall be conducted as not to cause injury. Chemical factories and slaughter-houses furnish examples of this class. (3) In some occupations the lack of personal qualifications or competence causes the danger to the public, and requires to be guarded against. Doctors, dentists, and plumbers are illustrations of this class. (4) Some occupations are held to be such as to involve danger to the public peace, order, or morality, and therefore to be proper subjects for regulation or licensing so as to prevent injury to the public. This is sometimes done by regulating the manner in which the business shall be conducted, and sometimes by means of a license law, so as to see that the business does not fall into the hands of persons of such evil character or reputation as might cause harm to the public. Pawnbrokers and junkdealers illustrate this class, where the grant of a license to a lawbreaker or thief might open the door to making the place one for the reception of stolen goods. In the first two classes the basis of distinction is objective, that is, based on the nature or character of the business; in the last two they two relate rather to the person. Freund on Police Power, § 639. This classification, and these illustrations, not declared to be exhaustive, refer to the police power generally, and not particularly to that granted to towns or cities.

In the growth of municipalities, where the population becomes dense, and new relations and new dangers arise, for the common welfare and protection more extensive power to cope with the new situation becomes necessary,—power to prohibit certain evils and to meet certain dangers. Hence arises the grant of power to regulate, prohibit, or license certain businesses within the municipal limits (in the proper sense of the word "license," as distinguished from the imposition of a license tax for revenue). The authorities [565] recognize some businesses as proper subjects of police licenses, but doubt or deny whether others can be declared to be illegal unless permitted. We need not discuss the difference. Suffice it to say that the keeping of lodging houses or rooming houses is a business so far affecting the public interest as to authorize the grant of legislative authority for its regulation and licensing, in order to see that such houses do not become places for the practice of vice or crime or menaces to the public welfare. Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 129, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 77, 85; Bostwick v. State, 47 Ark. 126, 14 S. W. 476.

2. In regard to conferring upon city officials a discretionary power to grant or refuse licenses in those cases which are proper subjects of police licenses, there are two lines of authority. One holds that there should be some uniform rule of action prescribed, governing the exercise of the discretion; and that the conference of a general discretion without this, at least as to occupations not subject to be wholly prohibited, is invalid as conferring arbitrary power. Montgomery v. West, 149 Ala. 311, 42 So. 1000, 123 Am. St. Rep. 33, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 659, 13 Ann. Cas. 651. The other class of decisions holds, that, as it is sometimes difficult for the legislature in advance to prescribe all of the conditions upon which the license shall be issued, it is competent for them to confer upon a municipal council the power in general terms, it not being presumed that this is intended to confer power to act arbitrarily, or that the authorities will so act. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. (5th ed.) § 598 and citations. In some of the cases the ordinances under consideration appear to have been adopted by virtue of what is called the general welfare clause in municipal charters, and the discussions were based on the general requirements that municipal ordinances must be reasonable. In others the direct question of the constitutionality of such ordinances or acts was passed upon.

Judge Dillon says: "Where the legislature, in terms, confers upon a municipal corporation the power to pass ordinances of a specific and defined character, if the power thus delegated be not in conflict with the constitution, an ordinance passed pursuant thereto cannot be impeached as invalid because it would have been regarded as unreasonable if it had been passed under the incidental power of the corporation, or under a grant of power general in its nature. In other words, what the legislature distinctly [566] says may be done cannot be set aside by the courts because they may deem it to be unreasonable or against sound policy. But where the power to legislate on a given subject is conferred, and the mode of its exercise is not prescribed, then the ordinance passed in pursuance thereof must be a reasonable exercise of the power, or it will be pronounced invalid." 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. (5th ed.) § 600. Some occupations are of such a character that they may be prohibited altogether. The one most frequently before the courts is that of selling intoxicating liquors. There are other occupations which cannot be prohibited, though they may be regulated. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. (5th ed.) § 666. So there are certain things which a person has no inherent right to do, such as using the public streets or places for purposes other than their normal use. Some of the decisions, in upholding the grant of general discretionary powers, have taken note of the distinction between things which might be prohibited, and those which could not be. But others have not done so.

In the case at bar, the business of keeping lodging houses is a legitimate business. The power to regulate and license it is conferred by express legislation. The question therefore arises upon the validity of the act of the legislature. In Buffalo v. Hill, 79 App. Div. 402, 79 N. Y. S. 449, and ordinance was adopted under a charter power to regulate and license the sale of meats. The ordinance provided for the issuance of a license by the mayor upon direction of the council after a two-thirds vote. Spring, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The right of the individual to carry on any gainful, lawful occupation without municipal interference unless conducted in a manner detrimental to the public is guaranteed to him as one of his inalienable prerogatives. On the other hand, the right of the legislature, and by its delegation the municipality, to enact laws or ordinances for the preservation of the public health; even though individual loss results, is a necessary power incident to the government of cities. The maxim salus populi lex suprema est is more than a mere sentiment, and has become one of the props of the police power, an elastic mantle whose ample folds cover much municipal legislation which finds no other justification. Between these two clashing principles it is often difficult to determine when the action of the municipality transcends its powers and transgresses upon [567] the rights of the individual." And see Davis v. Massachusetts, 167 U. S. 43, 17 S. Ct. 731, 42 U. S. (L. ed.) 71 (an ordinance prohibiting the making of any public address upon public grounds, except in accordance with a permit from the mayor); Wilson v. Eureka City, 173 U. S. 32, 19 S. Ct. 317, 43 U. S. (L. ed.) 603 (a prohibition against moving any frame building over any of the public streets or squares, without the written permission of the mayor); Gundling v. Chicago, 177 U. S. 183, 20 S. Ct. 633, 44 U. S. (L. ed.) 725 (an ordinance requiring certain things to be done in regard to an application for a license to sell cigarettes; and providing that "if the mayor shall be satisfied that the persons before mentioned are of good character and reputation and are suitable persons to be entrusted with the sale of cigarettes, he shall issue a license"); Reetz v. Michigan, 188 U. S. 505, 23 S. Ct. 390, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 563 (an act providing for the determining by a board of registration of the qualification of persons seeking to practice medicine); Fischer v. St. Louis, 194 U. S. 361, 24 S. Ct. 673, 48 U. S. (L. ed.) 1018 (an ordinance prohibiting the maintaining of a dairy and cow stable in the city, without having first obtained permission so to do from the municipal assembly; which ordinance was authorized by a statute declaring that the mayor and assembly were authorized to prohibit the erection of cow stables and dairies within prescribed limits and to remove and regulate the same); New York v. Van De Carr, 199 U. S. 552, 26 S. Ct. 144, 50 U. S. (L. ed.) 305 (a section of the sanitary code of New York, providing that no milk should be received, held, or kept, either for sale or delivery, without a permit in writing from the board of health, and subject to the conditions thereof, and declaring a violation of the section to be a misdemeanor). From these decisions it will appear that the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the conferring of discretionary power to grant or refuse licenses, in occupations subject to police licenses, is not per se in violation of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States, on the ground that the exact terms on which the discretion is to be exercised are not prescribed. In some of these cases the occupation or act involved was such as might have been prohibited altogether, but that fact was not always relied on in the decisions. In the last case cited, however, the business under consideration was that of selling milk, which was not of the character mentioned. The decisions of that high court are binding as to the [568] Federal constitution; and we think that in the present instance it is better to follow them in construing the similar "due-process clause" of our State constitution. Whether it would not be fairer and more just, as far as practicable, to prescribe in advance the requisites for obtaining a license, so that they may, be known, to one desiring to apply, is not the question. We are here dealing with a direct act of the legislature and its constitutionality. Is this power an arbitrary and unlimited one? Arbitrary and absolute power in municipal officers over persons and property is not an American institution; nor is it consonant with constitutional government. In the celebrated case of Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 369, 6 S. Ct. 1064, 30 U. S. (L. ed.) 220, 226, Mr. Justice Matthews said: "When we consider the nature and the theory of our institutions of government, the principles upon which they are supposed to rest, and review the history of their development, we are constrained to conclude that they do not mean to leave room for the play and action of purely personal and arbitrary power. . . . For the very idea that one man may be compelled to hold his life, or the means of living, or any material right essential to the enjoyment of life, at the mere will of another, seems to be intolerable in any country where freedom prevails, as being the essence of slavery." In times of peace and prosperity, when the struggles of the past against the evils arising from the abuse of power are partly forgotten, or recalled only as historic events, there is sometimes a restlessness and impatience with constitutional guarantees and restraints; but the framers of the constitution placed them in that instrument, not as mere glittering generalities, but as profound and lasting safeguards against the dangers of arbitrary power. Among them were the statements that "protection to person and property is the paramount duty of government, and shall be impartial and complete," that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, except by due process of law;" and that "no person shall be deprived of the right to prosecute or defend his own cause in any of the courts of this State, in person, or by attorney, or both." Sometimes the discretion conferred in regard to granting licenses has been loosely called "judicial." If it were really so in the sense of being a judgment of an inferior judicatory, another section of our constitution would confer on the superior court the right to review the judgment by writ of [569] certiorari. Civil Code (1910) § 6514. We think that such was not the intent of the act under consideration, but to confer ministerial discretion.

For an arbitrary abuse of such power has the citizen no recourse in the courts? The authorities above cited do not sanction the conferring of arbitrary authority or its exercise. On the contrary, they sustain the general grant of discretionary power to issue licenses under the police power (certainly as to things which can not be prohibited, as the sale of whiskey can be), on the ground that it does not seek to confer arbitrary power, and that if the power is sought to be arbitrarily and wrongfully exercised, the courts will apply a remedy. In Buffalo v.

Hill, 79 App. Div. 402, 70 N. Y. S. 449, supra, it was said: "It will be observed that in some of the cases adverted to, the test upon which the discretion of the mayor was to be exercised was defined in the act or ordinance creating the authority, while in others there was no limitation placed upon it. It does not follow that the omission to prescribe the bounds of the authority carries the conclusion that it is vested arbitrarily in the official or body to whom it is committed. The difficulty of defining, in a given case, what standard shall be applied in the disposition of the petition, and the fact that the conservation of the public health is the basis for the existence of the authority, indicate the reason for the absence of the definition, but it is no warrant for the inference that the power is an arbitrary one to be exercised in ruthless disregard of the rights of any class or individual." And again (p. 409): "While it is unnecessary for us to pass upon the question of the power of the court to review a flagrant abuse of discretion by the common council, suffice it to say that if a case of that kind were properly presented the court would doubtless not lack the ability to find some effective way to reach it for condemnation." In Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 6 S. Ct. 1064, 30 U. S. (L. ed.) 220, supra, Mr. Justice Matthews said (p. 373): "Though the law itself be fair on its face and impartial in appearance, yet, if it is applied and administered by public authority with an evil eye and an unequal hand, so as practically to make unjust and illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances, material to their rights, the denial of equal justice is still within the prohibition of the constitution." This, he said, was true, whatever may have been the intent of the ordinances as adopted. In other words, [570] the ruling seems to be that the ordinance itself might be unconstitutional, or that there might be an unconstitutional administration of it by the public authorities, so as to deprive a person of constitutional rights; and in either event relief could be afforded.

In Reetz v. Michigan, 188 U. S. 505, 23 S. Ct. 390, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 563, supra, while the expression was used by Mr. Justice Brewer that the court knew of no provision of the Federal constitution which forbade a State from granting to a tribunal, whether called a court or a board of registration, the final determination of a legal question, if nothing in the State constitution prevented so doing, it is evident that he merely meant that there need be no provision in the statute for an appeal or certiorari, or like method of review, to satisfy the requirements of the constitution of the United States. He clearly did not mean that arbitrary and capricious action violative of constitutional rights was beyond remedy by the courts; for he distinctly said (p. 508-9): "But while the statute makes in terms no provision for a review of the proceedings of the board, yet it is not true that such proceedings are beyond investigation in the courts."

In People v. Vandecarr, 81 App. Div. 128, 80 N. Y. S. 1108, a section of the sanitary code of New York prohibiting the keeping or selling of milk without a permit from the board of health was attacked as unconstitutional, on the ground that it conferred arbitrary power on the board. The Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of New York held that it was not intended to confer such absolute and arbitrary power in the selection of those who might and those who should not sell milk, but only the power to exercise a reasonable discretion. In the opinion it was said: "Such regulations, however, should be uniform, and the board should not act arbitrarily; and if this section of the sanitary code vested in them arbitrary power to license one dealer, and refuse a license to another similarly situated, undoubtedly it would be invalid: Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 6 S. Ct. 1064, 30 U. S. (L. ed.) 220 [supra]; Gundling v. Chicago, 177 U. S. 183, 20 S. Ct. 633, 44 U. S. (L. ed.) 725 [supra]; Noel v. People, 187 Ill. 587, 58 N. E. 616, 52 L.R.A. 287, 79 Am. St. Rep. 238; Dunham v. Rochester, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 462; Brooklyn v. Breslin, 57 N. Y. 591; but such was not its purpose, nor is that its fair construction." The decision of the Appellate Division was affirmed by the Court of Appeals of New York, 175 N. Y. 440, 67 N. E. 913, [571] 108 Am. St. Rep. 781. On review in the Supreme Court of the United States, Mr. Justice Day said (199 U. S. 552, 559, supra): "The Court of Appeals, affirming the decision of the Appellate Division, did not speak with equal emphasis upon this point, but it leaves no doubt that it sustained the statute as authorizing the exercise of a reasonable discretion." Accepting this construction of the State statute by the highest court of the State, the Supreme Court of the United States held that the statute was not unconstitutional: but Mr. Justice Day added (p. 562): "There is no presumption that the power will be arbitrarily exercised, and when it is shown to be thus exercised against the individual, under sanction of State authority, this court has not hesitated to interfere for his protection, when the case has come before it in such manner as to authorize the interference of a Federal court."

In re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. St. Rep. 636, the Court of Appeals of New York discussed at some length the police power of the State. In the opinion Earl, J., said (p. 108): "The limit of the power can not be accurately defined, and the courts have not been able or willing definitely to circumscribe it. But the power, however broad and extensive, is not above the constitution. When it speaks, its voice must be heeded. It furnishes the supreme law, the guide for the conduct of legislators, judges, and private persons; and in so far as it imposes restraints, the police power must be exercised in subordination thereto." The constitution of this State not only recognizes the necessary power of the courts to declare laws in violation of the State or Federal constitution void (a power already known to exist), but expressly declares it to be their duty to hold such acts void. Civil Code (1910) § 6392.

From what has been said, it will be seen that the legislature had power to confer on the municipal council authority to exercise a reasonable discretion in granting or refusing a license to one desiring to keep a lodging house or rooming house; and that the conference of this power in general terms did not ipso facto render the act void; but that the legislature could not constitutionally confer upon the council arbitrary or unlimited power, or prevent the citizen wronged by an arbitrary or capricious exercise of the power, not based on a legitimate use of discretion, from appealing to the courts to protect him from oppression.

3. The act under consideration declares: "That the Mayor and [572] General Council be and they are hereby authorized to regulate hotels, lodging houses, dance halls, rooming houses, and similar places, and they are further authorized and empowered, by ordinance, to require all person or persons owning or operating such hotels, houses, or halls to apply for a license for the operation of same, and such license may be granted or refused in the discretion of the Mayor and General Council, and their action in the premises shall be final." No attack is made upon the provision in regard to regulation. We have also ruled as to the power to exercise discretion in granting a license. It remains to refer to the clause "and their action in the premises shall be final." It will be noticed that the terms of the act include not only lodging houses and rooming houses, but also hotels. If the mayor and council have the power arbitrarily and capriciously to refuse a license to a lodging-house keeper, with no mode of relief, they can do the same thing as to the proprietor of a hotel. If this be so, then the continued operation of every hotel in the City of Atlanta can be made to depend upon the favor or caprice of municipal officers. One may be preferred over another without cause, and there is no remedy, if their "action is final" in the sense that there can be no resort to the courts for relief. It is no answer to this to say that the present officials may be of such character that they will not be likely to abuse the power, or that there is no presumption that this will be done. This clause is susceptible of two constructions,—one, that the grant of discretionary power, with the added provision that the action of the mayor and general council shall be final, operated to confer arbitrary power and to prevent resort to the courts for relief even in cases of arbitrary or capricious action; the other, that the section gave to the officials a reasonable administrative discretion, and provided that their action should be final in the sense that no appeal to any other body or to a court would lie to review their action without attempting to debar the applicant from seeking the aid of the courts under proper circumstances. From what has already been said it will be seen that, under the former construction, the provision would be unconstitutional; under the latter it would not be. Under the rule that in such cases the construction which will uphold the constitutionality of the law is rather to be preferred, we adopt the second construction hypothetically stated above.

[573] 4, 5. We next come to consider the exercise of equitable jurisdiction and whether a case for it is made by the allegations of the plaintiff. It has been announced a number of times by this court that generally equity will not interfere with the administration of the criminal law as such; and that the rule is ordinarily applicable to proceedings to punish for the violation of municipal ordinances which are quasi criminal in character. But it has also been frequently added that there are exceptional cases; and it has been pointed out that there is some difference between the State and a municipality as to immunity from suits. The subject has been discussed in Georgia R. etc. Co. v. Oakland City, 129 Ga. 576, 59 S. E. 296; and Shellman v. Saxon, 134 Ga. 29, 67 S. E. 438, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 452. In the latter case it was said: "In some cases, involving special facts, injunction may be granted against the unlawful enforcement of municipal ordinances, although they are penal in character, for the protection of property or property rights or franchises against irreparable injury; as, for instance, where, under the guise of enforcing a penal ordinance, it is manifest that prosecutions and arrests are threatened for the sole purpose of unlawfully taking or destroying property, or preventing the exercise of a franchise granted by the State."

In Peginis v. Atlanta, 132 Ga. 302, 63 S. E. 857, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 716, the power was claimed by the municipal authorities of Atlanta to revoke any business tax license, and an illegal effort was made by an ex parte resolution to declare that the business of the keeper of a lunch counter or restaurant (who also sold cigarettes, cigars, tobacco, and "soda-fount drinks") had been maintained in such manner as to become a nuisance, to revoke the license of the proprietor, and to compel him to cease business. He showed that irreparable damage would result from closing his business, or preventing him from continuing to conduct it, by means of continued prosecutions or otherwise; and he prayed for an injunction. This court held that he was entitled to it. In the opinion Mr. Justice Atkinson said: "If such power were conceded to the city authorities, they might refuse to allow any dry goods merchant, hardware dealer, hotel proprietor, confectioner, butcher, or baker to conduct his business, by simply refusing to issue him a business license, or might destroy his business at will, after its establishment, [574] by revoking his license. No such arbitrary power is conferred on municipal councils or municipal authorities." It is true that the license there involved was one to raise a license tax, under the revenue power; but the decision throws light on two points: (1) that hotels were mentioned along with other useful and lawful occupations; and (2) it held that, under the facts of the case, equity would restrain an arbitrary and unlawful effort to stop the business of the plaintiff and to work irreparable damage to him, although repeated prosecutions might be used as one means of accomplishing that end. It moreover shows how far-reaching a power has been contended for by municipal authorities.

If we look to the allegations of the present petition, they set out, in substance, oppressive conduct on the part of the chief of police, strenuous and continuous efforts to find some violation of a law or ordinance on the part of the plaintiff or her lodgers, followed by failure, the perfectly proper conduct by her of the business in compliance with all laws and ordinances, and at a place unobjectionable for the purpose, the submission by her to imposition lest the chief should in revenge prevent her from obtaining a license, which was held up for more than two months, his efforts by letter and personally to prejudice the members of the committee of council, followed by arbitrary action on their part, based on no reason or investigation, and amounting to no real exercise of discretion. She further set out facts showing threats to stop her from doing business, by constant prosecutions in the recorder's court, and danger of irreparable injury to property rights. The allegations are set out in the report of facts.

The municipal authorities did not see fit to deny the allegations of the plaintiff, but relied on a demurrer, which for the present purpose admits the truth of the allegations. They may or may not appear to be true on a hearing. But we think they set out a case sufficient to withstand a general demurrer. This does not, of course, mean that an injunction will be granted if the allegations of facts are not true. If it appears that they are untrue, and that the municipal officers have exercised a reasonable discretion in the matter, the court should not enjoin them. Nor will the court take the place of the council as a licensing authority. But that is a very different thing from contending that, conceding the facts alleged, a court of equity can afford no relief against the irreparable [575] damage which it is claimed will result from an arbitrary or capricious abuse of the power.

Counsel for the city relied strongly on the case of Starnes v. Atlanta, 139 Ga. 531, 77 S. E. 381. It was decided on a headnote; and the facts set out show no reference to any constitutional point, but a ruling that the facts of that case placed it within the general rule rather than within the exceptions thereto. It was argued, however, that the various constitutional points raised in the present case were also raised by the record in that case, and that the dismissal of the petition on demurrer was affirmed by this court. An examination of the record on file will show several material differences in the two cases. No effort to declare the decision of the municipal officers to be final was then before the court. The kinds of business involved were different; in the Starnes case it was the conduct of a sanitarium for the treatment of persons afflicted with nervous troubles and of those addicted to the liquor and drug habit; here it is the conduct of a lodging or rooming house for the accommodation of persons desiring a place to sleep. There it was charged in general terms that the municipal council acted arbitrarily in refusing a license. The general allegations on that subject were specially demurred to as vague and as failing to allege any facts in support of the general statement, and the defendant prayed that the paragraph of the petition on that subject be stricken. There was also an allegation that the ordinance was arbitrarily enforced. This likewise was specially demurred to, and it was prayed that this paragraph be stricken. The same is true as to the allegations seeking to set up irreparable injury, and those in regard to threats of numerous prosecutions. All of the grounds of the demurrer were sustained by the trial court. Such being the case, the ruling made by this court rested on different facts from those here involved. In the case now before us there was no special demurrer for want of sufficient specifications on any particular subject; but the defendant relied on a general demurrer. There is a difference in what will withstand a general demurrer and what will be good as against a special demurrer. Seaboard Air-Line Ry. v. Pierce, 120 Ga. 230, 47 S. E. 581. Here also there were much more specific allegations of fact on the subjects mentioned, of arbitrary action and irreparable damage to property rights.

[576] Of the case of Neall v. Atlanta, 141 Ga. 31, 80 S. E. 284, it need only be said that Neall did not apply for any license, and therefore no question of arbitrary conduct in refusing to grant one arose. He claimed that his business was not within the purview of the ordinance as to sanitariums, although it was alleged that he had already been found guilty in the recorder's court. These two cases, therefore, do not control the present one.

We do not discuss cases arising on applications for mandamus, as no such point is here involved. We may only remark that our Civil Code (1910) § 5441, does not accord with some of the decisions as to the limitations upon such a proceeding. No question is raised as to the propriety of making the recorder a party.

The petition sets out a cause of action sufficient to withstand a general demurrer, and dismissing it on such a demurrer was error.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

Scope of Note.

This note discusses the validity of a statute or ordinance licensing or regulating hotels, lodging or rooming houses and other places of a similar character such as restaurants and boarding houses, but omits from consideration those regulations which concern the sale of intoxicants.

The cases treating of the validity and construction of a statute providing for the inspection of inns or hotels are collected in the note to Hubbell v. Higgins, Ann. Cas. 1912B 822.

General Rule.

A statute or ordinance providing for the reasonable regulation or licensing of hotels, lodging houses and rooming houses is a valid exercise of the police power. State v. Adams, 18 Ark. 497; Russellville v. White, 41 Ark. 485; Bostick v. State, 47 Ark. 126, 14 S. W. 476; State v. Sumpter, 53 Ark. 342, 13 S. W. 933; Helena v. Miller, 88 Ark. 263, 114 S. Dumas*, 21 Vt. 456. And see the cases cited infra in the subdivision Application of Rule.

In Bostick v. State, 47 Ark. 126, 14 S. W. 476, in sustaining a statute requiring every person keeping a public tavern to procure a license, it was said: "The innkeeper's occupation is a useful and necessary one, and if the statute we are considering imposes a tax, it is inconsistent with the constitution of 1868 and has not been re-enacted since that constitution ceased to be in force. The true answer to this objection, doubtless, is that it is not a tax at all, but a valid exercise of the police power of the state, and that the object aimed at is not the raising of revenue, but the regulation of the business. . . . Whenever the owner of property devotes it to a use in which the public has an interest, he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in such use, and must, to the extent of that interest, submit to be controlled by the public for the common good. This gives by implication the power to regulate . . . inn-keepers, etc." In Helena v. Miller, 88 Ark. 263, 114 S. W. 237, it was said of a statute empowering cities and towns to regulate hotels and other houses for public entertainment: "The power thus conferred upon municipalities to regulate includes the power to license as a means of regulating. . . . A fee may be charged for the license to defray the reasonable expense of issuing the same and the enforcement of such police inspection or superintendence may be lawfully exercised over the business." In State v. Snipes, 161 N. C. 242, 76 S. E. 243, it was said of a statute conferring on a municipality the power to impose a license tax on restaurants and an ordinance passed thereunder requiring a keeper of restaurants to be licensed: "The statute is constitutional, conferring ample power, and the ordinance, applying to all alike and providing for the privilege on payment of a reasonable fee, whether regarded as a police regulation or as an exercise of the taxing power, must be held valid."

Application of Rule.

IN GENERAL.

A statute or ordinance is not unreasonable because it graduates the amount to be paid for a hotel or restaurant license according to the size of the establishment or the amount of business done. St. Louis v. Bircher, 7 Mo. App. 169, affirmed 76 Mo. 431; Cobb v. Durham County, 122 N. C. 307, 30 S. E. 338; Fulgum v. Nashville, 8 Lea (Tenn.) 635; Ex p. Lemon, 143 Cal. 558, 77 Pac. 455, 65 L.R.A. 946. See also Sights v. Yarnalls, 12 Grat. (Va.) 292. In Cobb v. Durham County, supra, the court in discussing the validity of a statute imposing a license tax on hotels the amount of which varied according to the gross receipts of the hotel, and which exempted certain hotels altogether from its provisions, said: "The irresistible inference from the imposition of taxes upon those hotels, etc., whose gross receipts amount to $1000 or more is that the hotels whose gross receipts are less than $1000 are exempt from the payment of the license tax; and in such exemption the plaintiff's counsel insisted that there was a discrimination between those engaged in the same business. But when the counsel came down to the real point in the case, that is, whether the exemption of hotels whose gross receipts did not amount to $1000 and the taxing of others whose receipts were more than $1000, he had to admit that the act exempted the former from the payment of the tax. On this point in our minds there is no doubt that the General Assembly may in its discretion impose either a specific tax or one graduated to the extent of the business done—the gross receipts derived from the business, . . . and that such tax is uniform and consistent with the constitution when it is equal on all persons in the same class. . . . But in our case the additional element enters of an exemption from the operation of the general rule of certain hotels whose yearly receipts are less than a certain amount. We have no decisions on the question, but we are of the opinion that the General Assembly has the right to make such an exemption, provided the exemption is not palpably against the spirit of the constitution." In St. Louis v. Bircher, 7 Mo. App. 169, affirmed 76 Mo. 431, it was said: "There is nothing unreasonable or oppressive in graduating the amount to be paid for a hotel license by the number of rooms which may be devoted to the accommodation of the public. Nor is there any intelligible reason why the number of rooms actually occupied should be proved in order to justify the license tax. The assessment is not upon the rooms; but upon the business of keeping a hotel." And in Fulgum v. Nashville, 8 Lea (Tenn.) 635, an ordinance imposing a license tax for hotels and exempting those having less than ten rooms from its operation was held to be valid, the court saying: "We do not see that exempting small hotels having less than ten rooms, renders this law objectionable. The city was not bound to tax all hotels the same amount for the privilege, regardless of the value of the privilege granted, as measured by the amount of business done, or capable of being done, by reason of the extent of accommodations possessed. . . . All hotels having ten or more rooms are taxed for the privilege, under this ordinance, according to rental value. The fact that others not belonging to the class are not taxed is no more a subject of complaint than if they were taxed at a much smaller sum, the tax being unequal in the latter cases, and the inequality being only increased by a total exemption." In Ex p. Lemon, 143 Cal. 558, 77 Pac. 455, 65 L.R.A. 946, it was said of the validity of an ordinance imposing a lower license tax on the keeper of a restaurant or boarding house where the meals were cooked and served by the proprietor or a member of his family than in other cases: "It is further urged by petitioner that the provision of the ordinance relating to restaurants, boarding-houses, and places where meals or board is furnished for pay, other than hotels and private boarding houses, is void, in that it unreasonably discriminates between such places where the meals are cooked and served by a proprietor or members of his family and those where the meals are not so cooked and served, the license-tax upon the former class being three dollars per month, and the tax upon the latter being eight dollars per month. The method of classification here adopted is somewhat unique, but we cannot say that it was beyond the power of the council. The right to regulate the license-tax to be paid by persons engaged in the same occupation according to the amount of business done is well recognized; in fact, it is often required by charter provision or legislative enactment that the license-tax shall be proportionate to the amount of business.

It is clear that, as a general rule, a restaurant or boarding house where the meals are wholly cooked and served by the proprietor and members of his family must be a very small affair, hardly rising to the dignity of a 'restaurant' or 'boarding house.' Ordinarily, the accommodations and service at such a place must necessarily be very limited, and the amount of business done must consequently be very small. There may be exceptional cases, it is true, where by reason of the magnitude of the proprietor's family a very pretentious and prosperous business might be conducted without the aid of a single employee. We must, however, judge of the reasonableness of the ordinance in question by what we know of the general conditions, and not hold it void simply because in some exceptional case it may result in imposing unequal burdens. Absolute uniformity in the practical application of laws relating to taxation can never be attained, and to prohibit the enforcement of laws which fail to bring such absolute uniformity would be to abolish all taxation. The classification here adopted is probably no more likely to practically result in unfair discrimination between those similarly situated as to amount of business than a classification according to the number of rooms in a hotel or the number of employees in a laundry, and the ordinary effect of the enforcement of the provision as it stands will be, that those doing the greater amount of business will pay the higher tax fixed thereby." In St. Louis v. Siegrist, 46 Mo. 593, it appeared that the charter of a city gave it power to "license, tax and regulate . . . taverns." The court in disposing of a contention that this did not give the city the power to require hotels to be licensed, said: "The distinction, as respects inn and tavern keepers, observed in England, under the common law, does not exist with us, and different names are applied to them, though 'hotel' and 'house' are usually and commonly used to denote a higher order of public houses than the ordinary tavern or inn. The legislature, in making use of the word 'tavern,' undoubtedly and manifestly intended to apply it to the whole class, and make it comprehend all hotels and houses that entertain and accommodate the public for compensation."

In White v. Mears, 44 Ore. 215, 74 Pac. 931, a statute providing that a "sailors' boarding house" should not be conducted at points situated on the Willamette and Columbia rivers without a license to be obtained from the "board of commissioners for licensing sailors' boarding houses" was held not to be invalid as a local law.

In Helena v. Miller, 88 Ark. 263, 114 S. W. 237, it was held that an ordinance imposing a license tax of $25 on hotels was reasonable, and the fact that the ordinance did not provide for inspection was held to be immaterial. It was also held that the testimony of members of the city council that the ordinance was passed for the purpose of raising revenue was immaterial and therefore inadmissible.

In San Francisco v. Larsen, 165 Cal. 179, 131 Pac. 366, it was held that a charter provision denying the right of a city to impose taxes on any person "who at any fixed place of business in the city and county, sells or manufactures goods, wares or merchandise" did not make invalid an ordinance imposing a license tax on owners or keepers of hotels, boarding houses, lodging houses, apartment houses, and restaurants, and on caterers.

DELEGATION OF LICENSING POWER TO BOARD OR COMMISSION.

A statute delegating to a board of commission the power to grant or refuse licenses to hotels, lodging houses, or boarding houses is valid unless the power delegated is arbitrary. White v. Mears, 44 Ore. 215, 74 Pac. 931. See also Matter of Tai Kee, 12 Hawaii 164; White v. Holman, 44 Ore. 180, 1 Ann. Cas. 843, 74 Pac. 933; Larsen v. Salt Lake City, 44 Utah 437, 141 Pac. 98. In White v. Mears, supra, it was held that a statute providing that a "sailors' hotel or boarding house should not be conducted in certain territory without a license having been obtained from "the board of commissioners for licensing sailors' boarding houses," was not invalid as giving the board of commissioners arbitrary power in granting or refusing licenses. The court said: "It is maintained by plaintiffs' counsel that the act in question is void for the reason that it vests in the board arbitrary power to grant or deny applications for licenses, in violation of section 20 of article 1 of the organic law of the state. . . . The right of the board to reject any application they may deem advisable is the power vested in them to deny a license when, from the evidence submitted, they conclude that the applicant does not possess the necessary qualifications, or that his accommodations for keeping sailors are not suitable, or that he will not comply with the provisions of the act. If, however, the evidence satisfactorily shows that he possesses these qualifications, has suitable accommodations, and will comply with the terms of the statute, the obligation imposed upon the board to issue the license is mandatory, for the act, in referring to them, states: "They . . . shall issue to said person . . . a license." True, the law does not prescribe the degree of respectability or competency which the applicant must possess, nor does it specify what accommodations shall be deemed sufficiently suitable to entitle the issuance of a license; but it must be assumed that the board, acting as reasonable and prudent men, imbued with a sense of the duty to the public and to the applicant devolving upon them, will discharge that obligation fairly and fearlessly." But in White v. Holman, 44 Ore. 180, 1 Ann. Cas. 843, 74 Pac. 933, the court in discussing the power of "the board of commissioners for licensing sailors' boarding houses" to deny an application for a license for a sailors' boarding house said: "The keeping of a sailors' boarding house is, in our opinion, a legitimate business, in the performance of which any citizen may engage as a matter of common right; and, this being so, it must be assumed that the legislative assembly, having in view section 20 of article 1 of the constitution of the state, did not intend to restrict the business by limiting the number of persons who may engage therein, but, as such occupation is peculiarly susceptible of abuse, the statute attempts to correct it by licensing those who possess the prescribed qualifications therefor, and who will comply with the provisions of the act, which is a valid grant of power. If it be conceded, however, that it was the intention of the legislature to invest the board of commissioners for licensing sailors' boarding houses with authority to reject any application for a license that they might deem advisable, without considering the prescribed qualifications of the applicant or the suitability of his accommodations, the business sought to be restricted being legitimate, so much of the act as attempts to confer such arbitrary power is in violation of the organic law of the state, and therefore void. . . . The board of commissioners for licensing sailors' boarding houses can exercise no greater power than was possessed by the legislative assembly; and, as that body could not create a monopoly of a legitimate business in which every person can engage of common right, a fortiori, its creatures, the board, are likewise prohibited from doing so. It is possible that the petitioners are unworthy and incompetent, and therefore not entitled to a license; but, from an inspection of the bill of exceptions, we are forced to the conclusion that the refusal was based upon the board's desire to restrict the number engaged in the business, and, as we have attempted to show, that under a clause of our organic law a monopoly cannot be created in cases of this kind, it follows that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered." In Matter of Tai Kee, 12 Hawaii 164, a statute providing that no license for a lodging house or hotel should be issued which the "Executive Council" believed to be objectionable was held to be invalid because it delegated arbitrary power to the "Executive Council."

In Larsen v. Salt Lake City, 44 Utah 437, 141 Pac. 98, it was held that an ordinance requiring rooming houses to be licensed was valid but that the board of commissioners, in passing on an application for a license, could not arbitrarily deny a license. The presumption was, however, indulged in that the board of commissioners in refusing a license refused it for good cause.

IMPOSITION OF SEVERAL TAXES.

It seems that a statute or ordinance segregating the different businesses embraced in the keeping of a hotel and requiring a license tax to be paid on each business is valid. McClure v. Krumbholz, 9 Pa. Dist. 544. See also Ft. Smith v. Gunter, 106 Ark. 371, 154 S. W. 181; New Galt House Co. v. Louisville, 129 Ky. 341, 111 S. W. 351, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 566, 33 Ky. L. Rep. 869. Compare Atlantic City v. Hemsley, 76 N. J. L. 354, 70 Atl. 322. "It is within the power of the legislature . . . to impose an additional burden upon hotel keepers by requiring them to also take out licenses for eating houses." McClure v. Krumbholz, 9 Pa. Dist. 544. In New Galt House Co. v. Louisville, 129 Ky. 341, 111 S. W. 351, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 566, 33 Ky. L. Rep. 869, the foregoing rule was neither affirmed nor denied but the question was expressly left undecided. It was held, however, that an ordinance requiring hotels and restaurants to be licensed did not require a person operating a hotel on the "European plan" to pay another license for conducting a restaurant. See to the same effect, McClure v. Krumbholz, 9 Pa. Dist. 544. But in Atlantic City v. Hemsley, 76 N. J. L. 354, 70 Atl. 322, it was said of an ordinance imposing a sleeping room license fee on a hotel: "It is essential to the grant of the license to the inn or hotel that it should have at least two spare beds and be well provided with house room for the accommodation of guests. . . . The granting of the license by the city to the prosecutor to keep an inn and tavern at the Hotel Brighton of necessity requires and allows him to keep bedrooms for the accommodation of his guests, and the city, having granted him such license, cannot tax him again for something which he already has a license to do. The rule is that a person who has taken out a license for, or paid a tax on, a certain business cannot be compelled to take out another license or pay another tax for anything which constitutes an essential part of such business. . . . In view of the fact that the premises in question were licensed as an inn or hotel by the city, under the powers conferred by its charter, and that it was essential to such grant, and to the maintenance of such inn or hotel, that it should have spare rooms for the accommodation of its guests, and of the further fact that the section of the city charter, under which the ordinance in question was passed, does not specifically empower the city council to pass ordinances imposing a sleeping-room tax upon inns or hotels or to otherwise license or regulate the same, we think that the power to enact the ordinance in question, so far as it applies to hotels, is at least doubtful. Statutes delegating such power are to be construed strictly, and if there is any doubt as to the existence of the power it must be resolved in favor of the public and against the city. . . . Accordingly, we hold that the city council was without power to impose the room tax upon the hotel in question by the ordinance under review."

In Fulgum v. Nashville, 8 Lea (Tenn.) 635, it was held that an ordinance imposing a license tax on hotels was not invalid because a property tax was paid on the hotel property.

And in Cobb v. Durham County, 122 N. C. 307, 30 S. E. 338, a statute imposing a tax on the privilege of conducting a hotel was held not to be invalid as to a corporation conducting a hotel, the corporation being subject under another section of the same statute to the payment of a tax on its corporate franchise.

In Sights v. Yarnalls, 12 Grat. (Va.) 292, it was held that a city tax on "ordinaries" was valid although a state tax might also have been levied.

REQUIREMENT AS TO FIRE PROTECTION.

A statute or ordinance requiring hotels, boarding houses and similar places to be provided with fire escapes and to provide other protection against fire is valid. New York Department Buildings v. Field, 12 App. Div. 258, 42 N. Y. S. 691; Strahl v. Miller, 97 Neb. 820, 151 N. W. 952, affirmed 239 U. S. 426, 36 S. Ct. 147; Adams v. Cumberland Inn Co. 117 Tenn. 470, 101 S. W. 428. See also Johnson v. Snow, 201 Mo. 450, 100 S. W. 5; Yall v. Snow, 201 Mo. 511, 9 Ann. Cas. 1161, 100 S. W. 1, 119 Am. St. Rep. 781, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 177. "The ordinance of the city of La Follette, imposing upon the owners of hotels, lodging houses, and the other buildings therein mentioned the duty of placing fire escapes upon them, was authorized by the charter of the city, and is a reasonable and valid police regulation." Adams v. Cumberland Inn Co. supra. In Strahl v. Miller, 97 Neb. 820, 151 N. W. 952, it was held that a statute providing that a watchman to guard against fire must be kept in hotels or lodging houses, was not unconstitutional. And on appeal of that case to the federal supreme court it was held that the fact that the statute was directed only to keepers of hotels having more than fifty rooms did not deprive them of the equal protection of the laws. See Miller v. Strahl, 239 U. S. 426, 36 S. Ct. 147. But in Radley v. Knepfly (Tex.) 124 S. W. 447, it was held that an ordinance stipulating that all rooms above the second floor of lodging houses, "shall be provided with more than one way of egress or escape from fire placed as near as practicable at opposite ends of the rooms leading to fire escapes on the outside of the building or to stairways provided with proper railings," was not authorized by a provision of the charter of a city conferring on it the power to require the construction of fire escapes on lodging houses. It was also held that the ordinance was under the evidence of the case unreasonable and oppressive and therefore void.

REGULATION AND LICENSING OF SOLICITING.

It seems that an ordinance regulating or licensing the business of soliciting or drumming for hotels, boarding houses and restaurants is valid. Fayetteville v. Carter, 52 Ark. 301, 12 S. W. 573, 6 L.R.A. 509; Hot Springs v. Curry, 64 Ark. 152, 41 S. W. 55; Emerson v. McNeil, 84 Ark. 552, 106 S. W. 479, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 715; Taylor v. Moore, 99 Ark. 412, 138 S. W. 634. Compare Thomas v. Hot Springs, 34 Ark. 553, 36 Am. Rep. 24. "The evidence shows that, prior to the enactment of this ordinance, there had been serious annoyance to the traveling public by hackmen and hotel porters gathering at the steps of the train coaches and importuning passengers alighting therefrom. Whether this conduct had become dangerous or a public nuisance is not certain, but it is certain that it was a serious annoyance to the traveling public and the railway employees, and to remedy the mischief the ordinance in question was passed. Trains only stop at this town from two to five minutes, and the ordinance only covers this period of time. Therefore it cannot be considered a prohibition of a lawful business. . . . Section 5438 of Kirby's Digest confers upon cities and incorporated towns the power 'to regulate drumming or soliciting persons who arrive on trains, or otherwise, for hotels, boarding houses.' Section 5454 empowers them 'to regulate . . . hotels and other houses for public entertainment.' Under these powers, the municipality had the right to pass the ordinance in question. . . . And the power conferred and exercised is not obnoxious to, or an interference with, any common right, but is a proper exercise of the police power, and is universally sustained. . . . The fact that the platform upon which they are forbidden to solicit customers at this interval was the property of the railroad company does not affect the power." Emerson v. McNeil, supra.

Limitation of Rule.

A statute or ordinance for the regulation and licensing of hotels and lodging houses is invalid where it is unreasonable or arbitrary. Matter of Tai Kee, 12 Hawaii 164; Bailey v. People, 190 Ill. 28, 60 N. E. 98, 83 Am. St. Rep. 116, 54 L.R.A. 838; White v. Mears, 44 Ore. 215, 74 Pac. 931; Radley v. Knepfly (Tex.) 124 S. W. 447; Bonnett v. Vallier, 136 Wis. 193, 116 N. W. 885, 128 Am. St. Rep. 1061, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 486. See also Helena v. Miller, 88 Ark. 263, 114 S. W. 237. In Bonnett v. Vallier, supra, it was said of the reasonableness of a regulation relating to lodging houses: "The degree of regulation of the construction, maintenance, and manner of occupancy of tenement houses and lodging houses which is reasonable must vary greatly according to density of population and other circumstances. What would be reasonable in a very large city might be highly unreasonable in the country or in the small cities and villages of the state. Requirements as to large structures to be occupied by many persons might be very unreasonable as to the smaller class of the same general class of structures to be occupied by very few persons." In Bonnett v. Vallier, 136 Wis. 193, 116 N. W. 885, 128 Am. St. Rep. 1061, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 486, it was doubted whether a provision of a statute prohibiting a person from permitting another not a member of his family to have the use of a room in his house for sleeping purposes without having his house classed as a lodging house and subject to the numerous requirements of the statute relating to lodging houses, was valid. In Bailey v. People, 190 Ill. 28, 60 N. E. 98, 83 Am. St. Rep. 116, 54 L.R.A. 838, a statute making it unlawful for more than six persons to occupy the same room in a lodging house for sleeping was held to be invalid. The court said: "The right to entertain lodgers in a lodging house, and to fix, by contract with them, the price to be paid for such accommodation and the number who shall occupy the same room at the same time for sleeping purposes, is a liberty and also a property right. Any restriction upon or abridgement of this right deprives the citizen of both liberty and property. . . . This legislation is directed only against lodging house keepers. Keepers of boarding houses, inns, hotels and taverns do not fall within the purview of its prohibition. If the enactment is a valid one, inn or hotel keepers and the keepers of boarding houses may lodge seven or any greater number of guests or patrons in the same room, at the same time, for sleeping purposes, as may suit their convenience, subject, only, to the consent of their patrons or guests, without incurring the penalties which, under the provisions of this enactment, would be visited upon a lodging house keeper should he allow more than six persons to occupy the same sleeping apartment at the same time. This is to discriminate against the lodging house keepers as a class, and to deprive them of liberty and a property right which other persons engaged in business of the same general character and similarly conducted may freely exercise without let or hindrance. . . . The attorney-general concedes that the term 'lodging house' and the words 'inn,' 'hotel' or 'boarding house' are none of them convertible terms or words, and that a distinction exists between these several institutions and a lodging house, but he insists that the act, though it has no penalties against the inn or hotel keeper or boarding house keeper, may be legally enforced against keepers of lodging houses as a sanitary measure, under the police power. Some lodging houses, as it is urged, may be, and doubtless are, the recognized abiding places of unclean, diseased and vermin-infected guests or patrons, who, together with the owners or keepers of the lodging houses are wholly indifferent to sanitary conditions, rendering such houses sources of contagious and infectious diseases. But it cannot be asserted that all lodging houses are of this character; neither can it be said boarding houses, inns and hotels are not to be found which shelter the same class of patrons, and whose keepers are likewise indifferent to sanitary conditions. The public health is less endangered by a cleanly and well conducted lodging house than by a filthy, ill-managed, disease-breeding hotel or boarding house. The lodging of more than six persons in any one room in a cleanly lodging house cannot be condemned, from a sanitary point of view, any more than the lodging of a like number of guests in one room in a hotel or boarding house. If intended as a measure to protect health, the act should have been directed against the evil which threatens to introduce sickness or disease, whether found in a lodging house, boarding house or hotel, and as its penalties are not so leveled it can but be regarded as partial and discriminatory legislation."

An ordinance regulating hotels or lodging houses or requiring them to be licensed is invalid where the power to pass an ordinance of this character is not conferred on the municipality by its charter or by a statute. Chicago v. M. & M. Hotel Co. 248 Ill. 264, 93 N. E. 753; Smith v. Hightstown, 71 N. J. L. 276, 57 Atl. 901; Atlantic City v. Hemsley, 76 N. J. L. 354, 70 Atl. 322; Radley v. Knepfly (Tex.) 124 S. W. 447. See also State v. Sumpter, 53 Ark. 342, 13 S. W. 933; Crosby v. Snow, 16 Me. 121. In Chicago v. M. & M. Hotel Co. supra, the court in discussing the power of a municipality to license and regulate hotels said: "It may be conceded that the business of innkeeper is not strictly juris privati and that it has an aspect of public interest which would warrant the legislature in passing an act for the regulation of such business, or we may with safety go one step farther and concede that this power exists in the legislature and that it may be either exercised by it directly or delegated to municipalities, but the answer to this contention is, that the power to license and regulate hotels has not been exercised by the legislature directly nor has it authorized its exercise by cities and villages."

INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION OF OHIO ET AL.

United States Supreme Court—February 23, 1915.

236 U. S. 230; 35 S. Ct. 387.

Moving Pictures — Censorship — Validity of Statute.

The censorship by a state board of censors, conformably to 103 Ohio Laws, 399, of motion picture films which are "to be publicly exhibited and displaced in the state of Ohio," is not an unlawful burden on interstate commerce, even as applied to films which are brought in from another state, but which are in the hands of film exchanges, ready for rental to exhibitors, or have passed into the possession of the latter.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The freedom of speech and publication guaranteed by Ohio Const. art. 1, § 11, with responsibility only for abuse, is not violated by the provisions of 103 Ohio Laws, 399, for the creation of a board of censors which is to examine and censor, as a condition precedent to exhibition, motion picture films which are to be publicly exhibited and displayed in the state, and is to pass and approve only such films as are, in its judgment, of a moral, educational, or amusing and harmless character.

Same.

Legislative power is not unlawfully delegated by the provisions of 103 Ohio Laws, 399, for the creation of a board of censors which is to examine and censor, as a condition precedent to exhibition, motion picture films which are to be publicly exhibited and displayed in the state, and is to pass and approve only such films as are, in its judgment, of a moral, educational, or amusing and harmless character.

Appeal from United States District Court, Northern District of Ohio.

Action for injunction. Mutual Film Corporation, plaintiff, and Industrial Commission of Ohio et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. AFFIRMED.

[231] Appeal from an order denying appellant, herein designated complainant, an interlocutory injunction sought to restrain the enforcement of an act of the General Assembly of Ohio passed April 16, 1913 (103 Ohio Laws, 399), creating under the authority and superintendence of the Industrial Commission of the State a board of censors of motion picture films. The motion was presented to three judges, upon the bill, supporting affidavits and some oral testimony.

The bill is quite voluminous. It makes the following attacks upon the Ohio statute: (1) The statute is in violation of §§ 5, 16 and 19 of article 1 of the constitution of the State in that it deprives complainant of a remedy by due process of law by placing it in the power of the board of censors to determine from standards fixed by itself what films conform to the statute, and thereby deprives complainant of a judicial determination of a violation of the law. (2) The statute is in violation of articles 1 and 14 of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and of § 11 of article 1 of the constitution of Ohio in that it restrains complainant and other persons from freely writing and publishing their sentiments. (3) It attempts to give the board of censors legislative power, [232] which is vested only in the General Assembly of the State, subject to a referendum vote of the people, in that it gives to the board the power to determine the application of the statute without fixing any standard by which the board shall be guided in its determination, and places it in the power of the board, acting with similar boards in other States, to reject, upon any whim or caprice, any film which may be presented, and power to determine the legal status of the foreign board or boards, in conjunction with which it is empowered to act.

The business of the complainant and the description, use, object and effect of motion pictures and other films contained in the bill, stated narratively, are as follows: Complainant is engaged in the business of purchasing, selling and leasing films, the films being produced in other States than Ohio, and in European and other foreign countries. The film consists of a series of instantaneous photographs or positive prints of action upon the stage or in the open. By being projected upon a screen with great rapidity there appears to the eye an illusion of motion. They depict dramatizations of standard novels, exhibiting many subjects of scientific interest, the properties of matter, the growth of the various forms of animal and plant life, and explorations and travels; also events of historical and current interest—the same events which are described in words and by photographs in newspapers, weekly periodicals, magazines and other publications, of which photographs are promptly secured a few days after the events which they depict happen; thus regularly furnishing and publishing news through the medium of motion pictures under the name of "Mutual Weekly." Nothing is depicted of a harmful or immoral character.

The complainant is selling and has sold during the past year for exhibition in Ohio an average of fifty-six positive prints of films per week to film exchanges doing business in that State, the average value thereof being the sum of [233] $100, aggregating $6,000 per week or $300,000 per annum.

In addition to selling films in Ohio complainant has a film exchange in Detroit, Michigan, from which it rents or leases large quantities to exhibitors in the latter State and in Ohio. The business of that exchange and those in Ohio is to purchase films from complainant and other manufacturers of films and rent them to exhibitors for short periods at stated weekly rentals. The amount of rentals depends upon the number of reels rented, the frequency of the changes of subject, and the age or novelty of the reels rented. The frequency of exhibition is described. It is the custom of the business, observed by all manufacturers, that a subject shall be released or published in all theaters on the same day, which is known as release day, and the age or novelty of the film depends upon the proximity of the day of exhibition to such release day. Films so shown have never been shown in public, and the public to whom they appeal is therefore unlimited. Such public becomes more and more limited by each additional exhibition of the reel.

The amount of business in renting or leasing from the Detroit exchange for exhibition in Ohio aggregates the sum of $1,000 per week.

Complainant has on hand at its Detroit exchange at least 2,500 reels of films which it intends to and will exhibit in Ohio and which it will be impossible to exhibit unless the same shall have been approved by the board of censors. Other exchanges have films, duplicate prints of a large part of complainant's films, for the purpose of selling and leasing to parties residing in Ohio, and the statute of the State will require their examination and the payment of a fee therefor. The amounts of complainant's purchases are stated, and that complainant will be compelled to bear the expense of having them censored because its customers will not purchase or hire uncensored films.

The business of selling and leasing films from its offices [234] outside of the State of Ohio to purchasers and exhibitors within the State is interstate commerce, which will be seriously burdened by the exaction of the fee for censorship, which is not properly an inspection tax and the proceeds of which will be largely in excess of the cost of enforcing the statute, and will in no event be paid to the Treasury of the United States.

The board has demanded of complainant that it submit its films to censorship and threatens, unless complainant complies with the demand, to arrest any and all persons who seek to place on exhibition any film not so censored or approved by the censor congress on and after November 4, 1913, the date to which the act was extended. It is physically impossible to comply with such demand and physically impossible for the board to censor the films with such rapidity as to enable complainant to proceed with its business, and the delay consequent upon such examination would cause great and irreparable injury to such business and would involve a multiplicity of suits.

There were affidavits filed in support of the bill and some testimony taken orally. One of the affidavits showed the manner of shipping and distributing the films and was as follows:

"The films are shipped by the manufacturers to the film exchanges enclosed in circular metal boxes, each of which metal boxes is in turn enclosed in a fibre or wooden container. The film is in most cases wrapped around a spool or core in a circle within the metal case. Sometimes the film is received by the film exchange wound on a reel, which consists of a cylindrical core with circular flanges to prevent the film from slipping off the core, and when so wound on the reel is also received in metal boxes, as above described. When the film is not received on a reel, it is, upon receipt, taken from the metal box, wound on a reel and then replaced in the metal box. So wound and so enclosed in metal boxes, the films are shipped by the film [235] exchanges to their customers. The customers take the film as it is wound on the reel from the metal box and exhibit the pictures in their projecting machines, which are so arranged as to permit of the unwinding of the film from the reel on which it is shipped. During exhibition, the reel of film is unwound from one reel and rewound in reverse order on a second reel. After exhibition, it must be again unwound from the second reel from its reverse position and replaced on the original reel in its proper position. After the exhibitions for the day are over, the film is replaced in the metal box and returned to the film exchange, and this process is followed from day to day during the life of the film.

"All shipments of films from manufacturers to film exchanges, from film exchanges to exhibitors, and from exhibitors back to film exchanges, are made in accordance with regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission, one of which provides as follows:

"Moving picture films must be placed in metal cases, packed in strong and tight wooden boxes or fibrewood pallets."

Another of the affidavits divided the business as follows:

"The motion-picture business is conducted in three branches; that is to say, by manufacturers, distributors, and exhibitors, the distributors being known as film exchanges.

... Film is manufactured and produced in lengths of about one thousand feet, which are placed on reels, and the market price per reel of film of a thousand feet in length is at the rate of ten cents per foot, or one hundred dollars. Manufacturers do not sell their film direct to exhibitors, but sell to film exchanges, and the film exchanges do not resell the film to exhibitors, but rent it out to them."

After stating the popularity of motion pictures and the demand of the public for new ones and the great expense their purchase would be to exhibitors, the affidavit proceeds as follows:

[236] "For that reason film exchanges came into existence, and film exchanges such as the Mutual Film Corporation are like clearing houses or circulating libraries, in that they purchase the film and rent it out to different exhibitors. One reel of film being made today serves in many theaters from day to day until it is worn out. The film exchange, in renting out the films, supervises their circulation."

¹"Section 11. Every citizen may freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of the right; and no law shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech, or of the press. In all criminal prosecutions for

'An affidavit was made by the "general secretary of the national board of censorship of motion pictures, whose office is at No. 50 Madison Avenue, New York City." The "national board," it is averred, "is an organization maintained by voluntary contributions, whose object is to improve the moral quality of motion pictures." Attached to the affidavit was a list of subjects submitted to the board which are "classified according to the nature of said subjects into scenic, geographic, historical, classic, educational and propagandistic."

MCKENNA, J. (after stating the facts).—Complainant directs its argument to three propositions: (1) The statute in controversy imposes an unlawful burden on interstate commerce; (2) it violates the freedom of speech and publication guaranteed by § 11, art. 1, of the constitution of the State of Ohio;¹ and (3) it attempts to delegate legislative power to censors and to other boards to determine whether the statute offends in the particulars designated.

It is necessary to consider only §§ 3, 4 and 5. Section 3 makes it the duty of the board to examine and censor motion picture films to be publicly exhibited and displayed [240] in the State of Ohio. The films are required to be exhibited to the board before they are delivered to the exhibitor for exhibition, for which a fee is charged.

Section 4. "Only such films as are in the judgment and discretion of the board of censors of a moral, educational or amusing and harmless character shall be passed and approved by such board." The films are required to be stamped or designated in a proper manner.

Section 5. The board may work in conjunction with censor boards of other States as a censor congress, and the action of such congress in approving or rejecting films shall be considered as the action of the state board, and all films passed, approved, stamped and numbered by such congress, when the fees therefor are paid shall be considered approved by the board.

By § 7 a penalty is imposed for each exhibition of films without the approval of the libel, the truth may be given in evidence to the jury, and if it shall appear to the jury that the matter charged as libelous is true, and was published with good motives, and for justifiable ends, the party shall be acquitted."

board, and by § 8 any person dissatisfied with the order of the board is given the same rights and remedies for hearing and reviewing, amendment or vacation of the order "as is provided in the case of persons dissatisfied with the orders of the industrial commission."

The censorship, therefore, is only of films intended for exhibition in Ohio, and we can immediately put to one side the contention that it imposes a burden on interstate commerce. It is true that according to the allegations of the bill some of the films of complainant are shipped from Detroit, Michigan, but they are distributed to exhibitors, purchasers, renters and lessors in Ohio, for exhibition in Ohio, and this determines the application of the statute. In other words, it is only films which are "to be publicly exhibited and displayed in the State of Ohio" which are required to be examined and censored. It would be straining the doctrine of original packages to say that the films retain that form and composition even when unrolling and exhibiting to audiences, or, being ready for [241] renting for the purpose of exhibition within the State, could not be disclosed to the state officers. If this be so, whatever the power of the State to prevent the exhibition of films not approved—and for the purpose of this contention we must assume the power is otherwise plenary—films brought from another State, and only because so brought, would be exempt from the power, and films made in the State would be subject to it. There must be some time when the films are subject to the law of the State, and necessarily when they are in the hands of the exchanges ready to be rented to exhibitors or have passed to the latter, they are in consumption, and mingled as much as from their nature they can be with other property of the State.

It is true that the statute requires them to be submitted to the board before they are delivered to the exhibitor, but we have seen that the films are shipped to "exchanges" and by them rented to exhibitors, and the "exchanges" are described as "nothing more or less than circulating libraries or clearing houses." And one film "serves in many theaters from day to day until it is worn out."

The next contention is that the statute violates the freedom of speech and publication guaranteed by the Ohio constitution. In its discussion counsel have gone into a very elaborate description of moving picture exhibitions and their many useful purposes as graphic expressions of opinion and sentiments, as exponents of policies, as teachers of science and history, as useful, interesting, amusing, educational and moral. And a list of the "campaigns," as counsel call them, which may be carried on is given. We may concede the praise. It is not questioned by the Ohio statute and under its comprehensive description, "campaigns" of an infinite variety may be conducted. Films of a "moral, educational or amusing and harmless character shall be passed and approved" are the words of the statute. No exhibition, therefore, or "campaign" [242] of complainant will be prevented if its pictures have those qualities. Therefore, however missionary of opinion films are or may become, however educational or entertaining, there is no impediment to their value or effect in the Ohio statute. But they may be used for evil, and against that possibility the statute was enacted. Their power of amusement and, it may be, education, the audiences they assemble, not of women alone nor of men alone, but together, not of adults only, but of children. make them the more insidious in corruption by a pretense of worthy purpose or if they should degenerate from worthy purpose. Indeed, we may go beyond that possibility. They take their attraction from the general interest, eager and wholesome it may be, in their subjects, but a prurient interest may be excited and appealed to. Besides, there are some things which should not have pictorial representation in public places and to all audiences. And not only the State of Ohio but other States have considered it to be in the interest of the public morals and welfare to supervise moving picture exhibitions. We would have to shut our eyes to the facts of the world to regard the precaution unreasonable or the legislation to effect it a mere wanton interference with personal liberty.

We do not understand that a possibility of an evil employment of films is denied, but a freedom from the censorship of the law and a precedent right of exhibition are asserted, subsequent responsibility only, it is contended, being incurred for abuse. In other words, as we have seen, the constitution of Ohio is invoked and an exhibition of films is assimilated to the freedom of speech, writing and publication assured by that instrument and for the abuse of which only is there responsibility, and, it is insisted, that as no law may be passed "to restrain the liberty of speech or of the press," no law may be passed to subject moving pictures to censorship before their exhibition.

[243] We need not pause to dilate upon the freedom of opinion and its expression, and whether by speech, writing or printing. They are too certain to need discussion—of such conceded value as to need no supporting praise. Nor can there be any doubt of their breadth nor that their underlying safeguard is, to use the words of another, "that opinion is free and that conduct alone is amenable to the law."

Are moving pictures within the principle, as it is contended they are? They, indeed, may be mediums of thought, but so are many things. So is the theater, the circus, and all other shows and spectacles, and their performances may be thus brought by the like reasoning under the same immunity from repression or supervision as the public press,—made the same agencies of civil liberty.

Counsel have not shrunk from this extension of their contention and cite a case in this court where the title of drama was accorded to pantomime;¹ and such and other spectacles are said by counsel to be publications of ideas, satisfying the definition of the dictionaries,—that is, and we quote counsel, a means of making or announcing publicly something that otherwise might have remained private or unknown,—and this being peculiarly the purpose and effect of moving pictures they come directly, it is contended, under the protection of the Ohio constitution.

The first impulse of the mind is to reject the contention. We immediately feel that the argument is wrong or strained which extends the guaranties of free opinion and speech to the multitudinous shows which are advertised on the bill-boards of our cities and towns and which regards them as emblems of public safety, to use the words of Lord Camden, quoted by counsel, and which seeks to [244] bring motion pictures and other spectacles into practical and legal similitude to a free press and liberty of opinion.

The judicial sense supporting the common sense of the country is against the contention. As pointed out by the District Court, the police power is familiarly exercised in granting or withholding licenses for theatrical performances as a means of their regulation. The court cited the following cases: Marnet v. State, 45 Ohio St. 63, 72, 73, 12 N. E. 463; Baker v. Cincinnati, 11 Ohio St. 534; Com. v. McGann, 213 Mass. 213, 215, 100 N. E. 353; People v. Steele, 231 Ill. 340, 344, 345, 83 N. E. 236, 121 Am. St. Rep. 321, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 361.

The exercise of the power upon moving picture exhibitions has been sustained. Greenberg v. Western Turf Ass'n, 148 Cal. 126, 82 Pac. 684, 113 Am. St. Rep. 216; Laurelle v. Bush, 17 Cal. App. 409, 119 Pac. 953; State v. Loden, 117 Md. 373, Ann. Cas. 1913E 1300, 83 Atl. 564, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 193; Block v. Chicago, 239 Ill. 251, 87 N. E. 1011, 130 Am. St. Rep. 219; Higgins v. Lacroix, 119 Minn. 145, 137 N. W. 417, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 737. See also State v. Morris, 1 Boyce (Del.) 330, 76 Atl. 479; People v. Gaynor, 77 Misc. 576, 137 N. Y. S. 196, 199; McKenzie v. McClellan, 62 Misc. 342, 116 N. Y. S. 645, 646.

It seems not to have occurred to anybody in the cited cases that freedom of opinion was repressed in the exertion of the power which was illustrated. The rights of property were only considered as involved. It cannot be put out of view that the exhibition of moving pictures is a business pure and simple, originated and conducted for profit, like other spectacles, not to be regarded, nor intended to be regarded by the Ohio constitution, we think, as part of the press of the country or as organs of public opinion. They are mere representations of events, of ideas and sentiments published and known, vivid, useful and entertaining no doubt, but, as we have said, capable of evil, having power for it, the greater because of their attractiveness and manner of exhibition. It was this capability and power, and it may be in experience of them, that induced the State of Ohio, in addition to prescribing penalties for immoral exhibitions, as it does in its Criminal [245] Code, to require censorship before exhibition, as it does by the act under review. We cannot regard this as beyond the power of government.

It does not militate against the strength of these considerations that motion pictures may be used to amuse and instruct in other places than theaters—in churches, for instance, and in Sunday schools and public schools. Nor are we called upon to say on this record whether such exceptions would be within the provisions of the statute nor to anticipate that it will be so declared by the state courts or so enforced by the state officers.

The next contention of complainant is that the Ohio statute is a delegation of legislative power and void for that if not for the other reasons charged against it, which we have discussed. While administration and legislation are quite distinct powers, the line which separates exactly their exercise is not easy to define in words. It is best recognized in illustrations. Undoubtedly the legislature must declare the policy of the law and fix the legal principles which are to control in given cases: but an administrative body may be invested with the power to ascertain the facts and conditions to which the policy and principles apply. If this could not be done there would be infinite confusion in the laws, and in an effort to detail and to particularize, they would miss sufficiency both in provision and execution.

The objection to the statute is that it furnishes no standard of what is educational, moral, amusing or harmless, and hence leaves decision to arbitrary judgment, whim and caprice; or, aside from those extremes, leaving it to the different views which might be entertained of the effect of the pictures, permitting the "personal equation" to enter, resulting "in unjust discrimination against some propagandist film," while others might be approved without question. But the statute by its provisions guards against such variant judgments, and its terms, like other [246] general terms, get precision from the sense and experience of men and become certain and useful guides in reasoning and conduct. The exact specification of the instances of their application would be as impossible as the attempt would be futile. Upon such sense and experience, therefore, the law properly relies. This has many analogies and direct examples in cases, and we may cite Gundling v. Chicago, 177 U. S. 183, 20 S. Ct. 633, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 725; Red "C" Oil Mfg. Co. v. Board of Agriculture of North Carolina, 222 U. S. 380, 32 S. Ct. 152, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 240; Monongahela Bridge Co. v. U. S. 216 U. S. 177, 30 S. Ct. 356, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 435; Buttfield v. Stranahan, 192 U. S. 470, 24 S. Ct. 340, 48 U. S. (L. ed.) 525. See also Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Texas, 212 U. S. 86, 29 S. Ct. 220, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 417. If this were not so, the many administrative agencies created by the state and National governments would be denuded of their utility and government in some of its most important exercises become impossible.

To sustain the attack upon the statute as a delegation of legislative power, complainant cites Harmon v. State, 66 Ohio St. 249, 64 N. E. 117, 58 L.R.A. 618. In that case a statute of the State committing to a certain officer the duty of issuing a license to one desiring to act as an engineer if "found trustworthy and competent," was declared invalid because, as the court said, no standard was furnished by the General Assembly as to qualification, and no specification as to where in the applicant should be trustworthy and competent, but all was "left to the opinion, finding and caprice of the examiner." The case can be distinguished. Besides, later cases have recognized the difficulty of exact separation of the powers of government, and announced the principle that legislative power is completely exercised where the law "is perfect, final and decisive in all of its parts, and the discretion given only relates to its execution." Cases are cited in illustration. And the principle finds further illustration in the decisions of the courts of lesser authority but which exhibit the juridical sense of the State as to the delegation of powers.

Section 5 of the statute, which provides for a censor [247] congress of the censor board and the boards of other States, is referred to in emphasis of complainant's objection that the statute delegates legislative power. But, as complainant says, such congress is "at present nonexistent and nebulous," and we are, therefore, not called upon to anticipate its action or pass upon the validity of § 5.

We may close this topic with a quotation of the very apt comment of the District Court upon the statute. After remarking that the language of the statute "might have been extended by descriptive and illustrative words," but doubting that it would have been the more intelligible and that probably by being more restrictive might be more easily thwarted, the court said: "In view of the range of subjects which complainants claim to have already compassed, not to speak of the natural development that will ensue, it would be next to impossible to devise language that would be at once comprehensive and automatic."

In conclusion we may observe that the Ohio statute gives a review by the courts of the State of the decision of the board of censors Decree affirmed.

I. Introductory.

Although the moving picture has been in existence only a comparatively short time yet the tremendous growth and development of the business based on it during the decade just passed has given rise to much litigation, so that at present there is a considerable body of law on the subject. It is the purpose of this note to collect and review the cases which deal with the subject of moving pictures in any of its phases. Some aspects of the subject have been discussed in earlier volumes of this series, and as to these, in order to make the present treatment topical, reference is made to the earlier discussions and the recent cases are here presented.

II. Statutory Regulation.

1. IN GENERAL.

The earlier cases discussing the statutory regulation of moving pictures are collected in the note to State v. Loden; Ann. Cas. 1913E 1300.

The holding of the reported case that the police power of a state extends to the regulation of moving picture exhibitions finds support in several recent decisions. Mutual

Film Corp. v. Hodges, 236 U. S. 248, 35 S. Ct. 393, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 561; Mutual Film Corp. v. Chicago, 224 Fed. 101, 139 C. C. A. 657; Jewel Theater Co. v. State Fire Marshal, 178 Mich. 399, Ann. Cas. 1915C 1212, 144 N. W. 835; Jeup v. State Fire Marshal, 182 Mich. 231, 148 N. W. 340.

It has been held that the giving of a moving picture exhibition called "The Inside of the White Slave Traffic," depicting the working of prostitutes on the streets and the inside of houses of prostitution, the alleged methods of so-called cadets and the unfortunate women who are living within their influence, is in violation of a penal law which prohibits exhibitions which "tend to the corruption of the morals of youth and others," and that the police department will not be restrained, pendente lite, from interfering with such a show. Sociological Research Film Corp. v. New York, 83 Misc. 605, 145 N. Y. S. 492, wherein the court said: "Some of the films, I repeat, depict scenes supposed to be enacted in a house of ill fame where women are subjected to involuntary prostitution. As is well known that to maintain such a place is in itself a criminal offense, I am unable to perceive why the public exhibition for money of scenes supposed to transpire therein should be entitled to the protection of a court of equity. It is contended by the plaintiff, in affidavits furnished by disinterested individuals whose motives it is not within the province of this court to question, that the pictures contain a great moral lesson to fathers and mothers, calculated to impress upon their minds the urgent need of protecting their daughters from the influence of evil associations. The answer to this is that the exhibition has not been confined to fathers and mothers; that there is no evidence before me that the owners thereof propose or desire to so confine it, and that the evidence shows they are conducting the enterprise not for the uplift of public morals, but for private gain."

In St. Louis v. Nash (Mo.) 181 S. W. 1145, it appeared that a city ordinance prohibited the erection of a fourth-class building within a city district known as the fire limits. The ordinance defined a building as "any structure for the support, shelter, or inclosure of persons, animals or chattels," and a fourth-class building as a building not of the first, second or third classes. It was held that a structure built for moving picture purposes which consisted of a floor of wooden planks nailed to larger planks sunk in the earth, a canvas top supported by telegraph poles set in the ground, and a stage of wood and canvas, was a fourth-class building and not a tent, and came within the prohibitory terms of the ordinance.

In Jewel Theater Co. v. State Fire Marshal, 178 Mich. 399, Ann. Cas. 1915C 1212, 144

N. W. 835, wherein the court sustained a statute prohibiting moving picture exhibitions in any building not having its audience room at the street level, it was said: "If the business of giving moving picture shows was innocuous in itself, and if the reasonableness of the particular regulation with which we are concerned was questioned, a different question might be presented. The business is innocuous in so far as it is true that, if neither an explosion nor a fire attends it, it is not harmful to life, limb or property. But the general reasonableness of a regulation forbidding the giving of such shows on other than the first floors of buildings is not questioned. And we may take notice of the fact, which experience has demonstrated, that peculiar hazards attend the handling and exposing of the films in the giving of exhibitions; that the hazard to human life and limb is increased as the means of exit from the places of exhibition are limited. Regulation, in such a case, extends as well to designating the place where a thing may be done as to prescribing the way in which it may be done. If the public safety or welfare demands that a particular business shall not be conducted in a particular place, the legislative power may be exercised to prevent it. Generally it is by experience only that the necessary regulations of business are indicated, and the legislative power is not limited because the thing which experience has demonstrated should not continue is continuing when the legislature speaks."

In Nohser v. Chicago (Ill.) 111 N. E. 119, an ordinance prohibiting the location of a moving picture show within two hundred feet of any church was sustained.

It has been held that Congress has power, under the commerce clause of the Constitution to pass an act which makes it unlawful "to bring or cause to be brought into the United States from abroad, any film or other pictorial representation of any prize fight or encounter of pugilists, under whatever name, which is designed to be used, or may be used, for purposes of public exhibition." Kalithenic Exhibition Co. v. Emmons, 225 Fed. 902. To the same effect see Weber v. Freed, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 317. And the fact that such films are to be shown only to clubs, societies, athletic clubs, associations, and their guests, does not make such a statute inoperative under the provision therein that such films must be used for "purposes of public exhibition" as an exhibition cannot be said to be private where such masses of people are to be invited to see it. Kalithenic Exhibition Co. v. Emmons, supra.

In the reported case it is held that a state statute creating a state board of moving picture censors with power to require the exhibition of films to the board for their approval or disapproval before the films shall be delivered to the exhibitor for exhibition, for which a fee is charged and requiring the film to be stamped or designated in a proper manner, and further providing for the imposition of a penalty on the exhibition of films without the approval of the board with a right to a review of its decision by the state courts, does not violate either the State or the Federal Constitution, as it does not deprive the owners of moving pictures of their property without due process of law, and does not interfere with interstate commerce or abridge the liberty of opinion, or delegate legislative power to administrative officers. To the same effect see Mutual Film Corp. v. Chicago, 224 Fed. 101, 139 C. C. A. 657; Buffalo Branch Mut. Film Corp. v. Breiting, 250 Pa. St. 225, 95 Atl. 433. And see Mutual Film Corp. v. Hodges, 236 U. S. 248, 35 S. Ct. 393, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 561, wherein it was held that a law of the same general import as the one just set forth but which provided that only exhibitors or those who permitted exhibitions of unapproved films were liable to the penalties of the act, could not be attacked by a moving picture film exchange company which was not within either of the two classes mentioned in the statute.

In People v. Samwick, 127 App. Div. 209, 111 N. Y. S. 11, it was held that a person who admitted a boy of seven years and one of fourteen years to a moving picture show did not violate a section of the Penal Code providing that "a person who admits to, or allows to remain in, any . . . museum, skating rink, . . . or in any place of entertainment injurious to health or morals . . . any child . . . under the age of sixteen years unless accompanied by parent or guardian . . . is guilty of a misdemeanor," where it did not appear that the children were not accompanied by a person who, although not a parent or a legal guardian, stood in the relation of guardian for the time being withip the meaning of the statute.

2. LICENSE LAW.

For the earlier cases discussing the licensing of motion picture exhibitions, see the note to State v. Loden, Ann. Cas. 1913E 1300.

Under a statute providing for the licensing of circuses and declaring that "every building . . . where . . . theatrical performances are exhibited shall be deemed a circus . . ." it has been held that, as a matter of law, a moving picture show must be licensed. State v. Morris, 1 Boyce (Del.) 330, 76 Atl. 479.

In Weistblatt v. Bingham, 58 Misc. 328, 109 N. Y. S. 545, it was held that a moving picture show conducted in connection with an ice cream saloon for the purpose of drawing trade was within the purview of an ordinance prohibiting the conducting of a common show without a license.

In Com. v. Donnelly, 51 Pa. Super. Ct. 61, overruling 21 Pa. Dist. 21, it was held that under a statute which taxed a "theatrical or operatic entertainment" five hundred dollars, a person was liable for the tax where it appeared that he operated, in addition to moving pictures, a show which included music, costumed actors, and scenic effects on an arranged stage, minstrel performances, and sketches of dramatic art. However, in Com. v. Spiers, 21 Pa. Dist. 25, 51 Pa. Super. Ct. 59, affirmed 51 Pa. Super. Ct. 59, it was held that where a performance consisted only of moving pictures and illustrated songs and there was no stage in the building, the conductor thereof was not liable to the state tax of five hundred dollars for conducting a "theatrical or operatic entertainment" but was subject only to the one hundred dollar license fee levied on operators of moving picture shows.

Where an ordinance names the town clerk as the person from whom a license to conduct a moving picture show shall be obtained it is not necessary, in a mandamus petition to compel the issuance of such a license to make the mayor and the members of the city council parties thereto. Krier v. Walsenburg, 26 Colo. App. 150, 141 Pac. 505.

In Life Photo Film Corp. v. Bell, 90 Misc. 469, 154 N. Y. S. 763, it appeared that the plaintiff was a moving picture film manufacturer and had leased to a theater proprietor a film which depicted an army officer in a German uniform performing acts of cruelty which subsequently brought on him punishment from his superior officer. In an action by the film company for an injunction to restrain the license commissioner of New York city from revoking the theater proprietor's license for showing the picture, it was held that as the only objection made to the film was on the part of the national board of moving picture censors and of a deputy of the license commissioner who objected on the ground that the exhibition of the picture might occasion racial differences, an injunction would issue to restrain the commissioner from carrying out his threat to revoke the theater license, and that the film company was a proper party plaintiff because it had no other way to protect itself from the loss of profits it had a right to expect under its contract with the theater proprietor to exhibit the film.

In People v. Rand, 91 Misc. 276, 154 N. Y. S. 293, it was held that as the power to license vested in a mayor was discretionary and not mandatory, he should refuse a license where in his judgment the opening of a theater would work to the detriment of the community but that his power was not absolute, and that if he acted arbitrarily or capriciously a person aggrieved thereby had a remedy through mandamus proceedings. And it was held in Edelstein v. Bell, 91 Misc. 620, 155 N. Y. S. 590, that it was not an abuse of the discretionary licensing power vested in him for the commissioner of licenses of the city of New York to deny the right to produce in moving picture theaters a play based on the Leo Frank murder case, which play had been disapproved by the national board of censors, and that the producer of such a film was not entitled to an injunction restraining the commissioner from interfering with the exhibition thereof in New York city theaters.

It has been held, however, that one who fully complies with an ordinance regulating the issuance of a license for a moving picture exhibition, which is not inherently dangerous to the peace and good order of a city, is entitled prima facie thereto, and if valid reasons exist for withholding from him the right to engage in this business it is incumbent on the licensing authorities to disclose them. Krier v. Walsenburg, 26 Colo. App. 150, 141 Pac. 505. And where one section of an ordinance provided that no moving picture show should be maintained in any residence district of a city "without the consent of the common council approved by the mayor," etc. and stated that its provisions should not apply to a moving picture show which had been located, built, constructed and in use for such purposes prior to December 1, 1912, and another section of the ordinance provided that the mayor might also grant a permit to any firm or corporation to use any building or premises which were and had been used on and prior to December 1, 1912, for the purposes of a moving picture show if the applicant had met all lawful prerequisites of law relating to health, public safety from fire and the reasonable regulations of the health and fire departments of the city, it was held that an applicant for a permit to conduct a moving picture show in a building within the residential district was entitled thereto where it appeared that he had met all the conditions prescribed by law, as the granting of the permit was a ministerial duty plainly prescribed. Walker v. Fuhrman, 84 Misc. 118, 146 N. Y. S. 519.

3. SUNDAY LAW.

a. Generally.

The earlier cases passing on the application of Sunday laws to moving picture shows are discussed in the note to Ex p. Lingenfelter, Ann. Cas. 1914C 765.

In one jurisdiction the view has been taken in recent cases that a moving picture show is unlawful when conducted on Sunday. Ex p. Mussett, 72 Tex. Crim. 487, 162 S. W. 846; Lempke v. State (Tex.) 171 S. W. 217; McLeod v. State (Tex.) 180 S. W. 117. A person cannot avoid a statute prohibiting Sunday amusements "for which an admission fee is charged" by keeping his moving picture show open on Sunday without selling tickets therefor but using as a substitute a free offering plan by which those who witness the exhibition may drop coins in an urn placed near the ticket office as they pass in or out. McLeod v. State (Tex.) 180 S. W. 117.

b. Rule in New York.

While there were some earlier cases to the contrary (see the note to Ex p. Lingenfelter, Ann. Cas. 1914C 765) the recent cases in New York hold that the Penal Law of that state (Penal Code § 277) does not prohibit the exhibition of indoor moving pictures on Sunday. People v. Lent, 166 App. Div. 550, 152 N. Y. S. 18; Klinger v. Ryan, 91 Misc. 71, 153 N. Y. S. 937; People v. Ryan, 91 Misc. 276, 154 N. Y. S. 293; Hamlin v. Bender, 92 Misc. 16, 155 N. Y. S. 963, criticizing the rule but bowing to it under stare decisis doctrine.

It has been held that a municipality cannot, without express legislative authority, enforce the Sunday closing of moving picture shows. People v. Lent, 166 App. Div. 550, 152 N. Y. S. 18, affirmed 215 N. Y. 626, 109 N. E. 1088; Klinger v. Ryan, 91 Misc. 71, 153 N. Y. S. 937. Thus in People v. Lent, 166 App. Div. 550, 152 N. Y. S. 18, it appeared that a city had power, under its charter which gave it a right to regulate amusements and common shows, to license moving picture exhibitions. A city ordinance prohibited such a show on Sunday and provided a fine for its violation. In a habeas corpus proceeding by one who had been arrested for a breach thereof it was held that a license under the ordinance might be given on condition as to the hours of opening, etc., but that as the legislature alone had the right to command how Sunday should be kept, and as municipal charters, however broad, were subject to such restriction as might be imposed by general laws, the city could not independently compel and enforce Sunday closing by means of fine or imprisonment unless such prohibition was part of the law and policy as declared by the legislature, and that the writ should be issued and the relator discharged.

Although equity will, by injunction, prevent irreparable injury by unlawful trespass of the police on private property (Fairmount Athletic Club v. Bingham, 61 Misc. 419, 113 N. Y. S. 905), yet the general rule is that equity will not interfere to prevent the enforcement of the criminal law, even though the police are mistaken in their opinion as to what constitutes a crime. Under this rule it has been held that equity will not enjoin the police from entering on premises wherein a moving picture show is proposed to be given on Sunday in order to prevent the show. Shepard v. Bingham, 125 App. Div. 784, 110 N. Y. S. 217; Klinger v. Ryan, 91 Misc. 71, 153 N. Y. S. 937; In Shepard v. Bingham, supra, the court said: "Under this injunction members of the police force are prevented from entering these premises except to serve a warrant which of course could only be obtained upon evidence that a crime had been committed, or for the arrest of persons who had committed a felony or misdemeanor in their presence. But they being enjoined from entering the building during these Sunday entertainments, a crime committed in the building at that time would not be in their presence. There is thus segregated from the rest of the city of New York a territory in which during a considerable portion of each Sunday the police are powerless to enforce the criminal law and in which during that period crime may be committed with impunity. No policeman could enter these premises during these entertainments without disobeying the order of the court unless armed with a warrant for the arrest of a person charged with crime in the building, or unless he knew of the commission of a crime and followed its perpetrator into the building for the purpose of arresting him. In other words, the enforcement of the criminal law is suspended by an order of a court of equity during a considerable portion of each Sunday solely upon the allegation that the plaintiff intended to do an act which he claimed was not a crime, and that a police captain had told somebody who had told the plaintiff that he intended to arrest the plaintiff or his employees for the performance of that act as criminal. If equity has jurisdiction to entertain such applications and determine whether or not a party is innocent or guilty of a crime, there would be no necessity for the existence of criminal courts. The question of what was or was not criminal could be determined in equity, and if an alleged criminal is entitled to the interposition of the court to protect him from arrest, I can see no reason why the police would not also be entitled to its process to enjoin a person charged with a crime from interposing any objection to his punishment. It is perfectly clear that the whole question is one over which a court of equity has no jurisdiction."

Under the well established rule that acts otherwise lawful may become wrongful in consequence of the time or place or manner of performing them, it was held in Hamlin v. Bender, 92 Misc. 16, 155 N. Y. S. 963, that where a person's moving picture theater in which he proposed to give a show on Sunday was on a most thickly populated street, in the immediate vicinity of a large church and parish buildings connected therewith where religious services were largely attended and Sunday school held, and that people who attended the divine services as well as children who attended Sunday school would be called on to pass and repass the place of amusement and that crowds were likely to gather about the entrance, such a performance on Sunday was a nuisance and injunctive relief therefrom would be granted at the suit of the commissioner of public safety of the city on whom a statute conferred express power to restrain nuisances.

4. COPYRIGHT LAW.

Under an act of Congress which provides that "any citizen of the United States . . . who shall be . . . the author or proprietor of any . . . photograph or negative thereof . . . shall upon complying with the provisions of this chapter have the sole liberty of printing, reprinting, publishing, completing, copying, executing, finishing and vending the same" (2 Fed. St. Ann. 256), it has been held that a series of pictures which represent an act or event, or a series of pictures which tell a story which are for use in a moving picture machine may be copyrighted. Edison v. Lubin, 122 Fed. 240, 58 C. C. A. 604; American Mutoscope, etc. Co. v. Edison Mfg. Co. 137 Fed. 262. But if the moving pictures are a part only of a single performance which in addition to the pictures consists of songs and a common-place dialogue the whole act is not a subject of copyright under the act. Barnes v. Miner, 122 Fed. 480, 487.

It is well established that the copyright of a novel or a dramatization covers a photoplay presentation of the same subject. Atlas Mfg. Co. v. Street, 204 Fed. 398, 122 C. C. A. 568, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1002; U. S. v. Motion Picture Patents Co. 225 Fed. 800.

In Herbert v. Fields, 152 N. Y. S. 487, it was held that where an opera was the work of the original author who wrote the play in German, of S. who adapted the play, after translation, to the American stage, of H. who wrote the words of the lyrics, and of B. who composed the music thereto, and where the copyrighted book contained only the music and the lyrics, the libretto was a separable and separate work and the moving picture rights thereto were entirely in the owner of the work who might deal with them independently of the composer of the music. It was held further that the production of the moving pictures of a play to large crowds at low prices of admission did not "destroy" the work within the meaning of the rule that the rights of a co-owner do not extend to the destruction of the article owned.

Where a person is the first to translate a French play and puts in his version variations from it and additions to it and copyrights his translation in the United States, it has been held that a moving picture company will be restrained at the suit of the assignee of the first translator from producing in moving pictures a play which contains the variations from and additions to the French play which are original to the first translator's version. Stevenson v. Fox, 226 Fed. 990.

In Frohman v. Fitch, 164 App. Div. 231, 149 N. Y. S. 633, it appeared that a playwright and a theater manager entered into an agreement whereby the former was to write a play and the latter was to produce it. In the contract there was provision that the playwright was to "sell, assign and transfer" to the manager "the exclusive right to produce the said play in the United States of America and in Canada," for a certain sum to be paid to the writer. Three years later the contract was modified by permitting the plaintiff to lease the play to stock companies thereby allowing the play to be produced in stock-theaters whereas the original contract called for production in first class theaters in a first class manner. The play was written, produced and was successful. The playwright died and his rights under the contract passed to his father who made a contract with a moving picture company by which he assumed the right to grant to the company the right to produce the play throughout the United States and Canada by means of moving pictures. It was held that the manager had acquired exclusive property rights to the play enforceable in equity and could not be deprived of any part of his rights merely because, since the contract was executed, a new method, not contemplated by the parties at the time, had made it possible to produce it in a different way.

It has been held that where a person wrote a novel and assigned his right to copyright it to a company which duly secured copyright, and the company subsequently assigned all dramatization rights to the original author and the latter made an assignment of all his rights, including moving picture rights, to a third person who failed to record the assignment as provided for by the federal statute, one who took a later assignment of the moving picture rights from the original author without notice of his previous assignment and recorded it, was entitled to equitable enforcement of his right exclusively to produce moving pictures based on the novel. Photo-Drama Motion Picture Co. v. Social Uplift Film Corp. 220 Fed. 448, 137 C. C. A. 42, affirming order 213 Fed. 374, wherein it was also held that since the amendment of the Copyright Act in 1912 (Fed. St. Ann. 1914 Supp. p. 48), dramatizations for acting on the stage, and for moving picture purposes were separable and there might be a copyright for each kind and that each was assignable independent of the other.

It has been held that a moving picture which presented "Nick Carter, the Great American Detective, Solving the $100,000.00 Jewel Mystery" and which did not appropriate either the title, plot, or situation of any story published by a copartnership which published a weekly periodical devoted to detective stories and which had registered the words "Nick Carter" as a trademark, did not infringe any right held by those who had registered the name and that they were not entitled to restrain the production of the moving picture as named. Atlas Mfg. Co. v. Street, 204 Fed. 398, 122 C. C. A. 568, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1002; wherein it was said: "It is not thought that the public will be deceived into belief that it is seeing a reproduction of one of complainants' stories when it witnesses that displayed from defendants' film. But if so it is no more deceived than when it reads a book of the same name as one theretofore published, but unprotected. It may be that the defendants are profiting by the use of a name made distinctive by complainants, but this is true of one who sells a brand of cigars named after a famous book or a famous personage. In the absence of some positive legal right in complainants, these are conditions for which equity cannot undertake to create a remedy."

Where it appeared that a person had bought a certain version of a play, which was a dramatization in part of an earlier novel called "Monte Cristo" and had continued in open, uninterrupted possession of it for about thirty years and had performed in the play during that time to such an extent that his name became closely identified with it, it was held, in an action by him to restrain a company from distributing and leasing moving picture films of a play called "Count of Monte Cristo" that an injunction would issue giving the plaintiff the relief prayed for as it was shown that the moving pictures were similar to the play in many scenes and dramatic climaxes and that a number of scenes omitted by the original author of the play were absent from the moving picture version. O'Neill v. General Film Co. 152 N. Y. S. 599, wherein it was also held that a performance of the play as first dramatized by the author in England on October 19, 1868 was not such a publication as would destroy the common-law rights in such a manuscript play in the United States, and that the plaintiff had not surrendered his rights in the play at common law either by putting out posters depicting scenes in the play for advertising purposes or by licensing a company to produce it in moving picture form, where the licensee copyrighted the films in the manner prescribed by the amendment to the Copyright Act of August 24, 1912 (Fed. St. Ann. 1914 Supp. p. 48). That case is also authority for the holding that where a person comes rightfully into possession of a play from the ostensible owner and is for thirty years in open and notorious possession thereof and has during that period successfully maintained the exclusive right thereto against the world he has a valid title to the play by adverse possession.

In Universal Film Mfg. Co. v. Copperman, 218 Fed. 577, 134 C. C. A. 306, affirming decree 212 Fed. 301, it appeared that a Danish company had composed an original scenario and produced a photoplay therefrom but did not copyright either in England. It sold throughout Europe, however, positive films of the play with the stipulation that they should not be resold or hired out for use, except in the country in which they were bought, and should not be exported or sold for export. A company in the United States purchased one of the films from an English dealer and exhibited it and hired it out to others. Subsequent to this purchase by the American company, the Danish company copyrighted the photoplay in the United States, but did not copyright the scenario. This copyright was assigned to an American moving picture company and they seized the film in the possession of the other American company on the ground of infringement. It was held, in an action to uphold this seizure that there was no infringement, as neither the Danish company nor its assigns in the United States could repudiate the license it had given before the copyright to the purchaser of the film in England and its assigns to use it and to hire it out in the country where it was bought. The court said: "The title of the Nordisk Company in England was its common-law right of property in the intellectual conception of the scenario of the play expressed in words and in the intellectual conception of the photoplay expressed in actions. It could perform the written play itself, or license others to perform it, without prejudice to its common-law ownership, and so it could itself perform and license others to perform the photoplay in the same way. When it sold a positive film, which was the only means of performing the play, it conferred the performing right on the purchaser and his assigns. No one, by virtue of that sale, would acquire the right to reenact the play and take a negative of it, or make, if that could be done, a new negative from the positive film. This would be inconsistent with the Nordisk Company's common-law property in the photoplay and with the mere performing right which it had conferred on the owner of the film. But exercise of the performing right by one or by many purchasers of positive films would be entirely consistent with the Nordisk Company's common-law property in the play itself."

Under the Copyright Act 1911 of England it has been held that a person violates sections thereof which provide that "copyright means the sole right to produce or reproduce the work or any substantial part thereof in any material form whatsoever" and that "copyright in any work shall be deemed to be infringed by any person who, without the consent of the owner of the copyright, does anything the sole right to do which is by this Act conferred on the owner of the copyright" where he agrees with the owner of a copyrighted moving picture film to exhibit it only at two certain places and in violation of his agreement advertises an intention, by means of bills and posters, to show it at a third place. Fenning Film Service v. Wolverhampton [1914] 3 K. B. 1171, 83 L. J. K. B. 1860 [1914] W. N. 338.

III. Construction of Theater Lease.

For the earlier cases construing theater leases, see the note to Rothenberg v. Packard, Ann. Cas. 1914B 1.

In Hammerstein Opera Co. v. Belasco, 161 App. Div. 199, 146 N. Y. S. 341, it appeared that a lease of a theater contained clauses that the premises were "to be used and occupied by the said tenant as a first-class theater" and that the tenant would not use them or permit them to be used "for any business purpose deemed disreputable or extrahazardous on account of fire under penalty of damages and forfeiture." The lessee, though at first he conducted high class shows, later allowed a moving picture film called the "Traffic in Souls" to be shown at the theater at prices lower than he formerly received for seats. It was held that a proper case had been made out for the granting of an injunction pendente lite, as the use of the theater for moving picture exhibitions appeared to be a violation of the clause in the lease with regard to increasing the fire hazard. It was further held that although the lessor had accepted rent, which had accrued since the new use of the theater, it did not thereby consent to that use because it had insisted then and since that the lessee was using the premises in violation of the lease.

IV. Construction of Film Lease or Sale.

In Biograph Co. v. International Film Traders, 76 Misc. 436, 134 N. Y. S. 1069, it appeared that the plaintiff was a manufacturer of moving picture films and was licensed by a patentee company to manufacture and lease films to such exhibitors or owners of moving picture shows as held licenses from the patentee company. It was held that an action of replevin for films manufactured by it could be maintained by the plaintiff against one who had obtained the films wrongfully and who was not a licensee of the patentee company.

In Lubin Mfg. Co. v. Swaab, 240 Pa. St. 182, 87 Atl. 597, an action of replevin for the recovery of moving picture films it appeared that the plaintiff was the licensee of a patentee company with power under the license to manufacture and lease films to other concerns known as exchanges and the latter were licensed to sublet the films to exhibitors who had secured a license from the patentee company to exhibit them. The defendant was licensed as an exchange and under the terms of his license he had the right only to sublet or to use the films, the ownership thereof remaining in the lessor. The license contract also contained a provision that on the termination of the agreement by the licensor it had a right to the possession of all of its motion pictures twenty days after notice of the ending of the agreement was given to the exchange. On the label of the boxes in which each film was shipped to the defendant were further contract conditions to the effect that the licensee had only the right to sublet the motion picture contained in the box while his license agreement with the patentee company remained in full force and effect, and that a violation of any of the conditions printed on the label would entitle the plaintiff "to immediate possession of this motion picture." It was held that the title to the films was never in the defendant under the licensing arrangement and that the right of the defendant to sublet the films ceased when its license was canceled by the patentee company, but that the action had been brought prematurely as it did not plainly appear that the very films covered by the replevin writ had been sublet by the defendant which breach of the label agreement would have given the plaintiff the immediate right to possession of the films. To the same effect see Vitagraph Co. v. Swaab, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 311.

In Gilligham v. Ray, 157 Mich. 488, 122 N. W. 111, 16 Detroit Leg. N. 426, it was held that one who obtained from the owner and controller of certain moving picture films the exclusive right to exhibit the films could restrain another from wrongfully exhibiting the same films within the time and place specified. But in Davis v. Epoch Producing Corp. 91 Misc. 631, 155 N. Y. S. 597, it was held that an alleged contract for the exhibition rights of the "Birth of a Nation" film in seventeen states made by the owner of the film with a theatrical manager would not be specifically enforced against the owner of the film where it appeared that the so-called contract consisted of telegrams between the parties with an appointment for a meeting in New York "to consummate the deal," and that the telegrams contained only indefinite and uncertain terms which in moving picture exhibition contracts are usually many and varied because of the nature of the business, and where it further appeared that before the meeting in New York the owner had sold the right to exhibit the film in a part of the territory which it had included in the tentative agreement with the plaintiff.

In Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Co. v. Celebrated Players Film Co. 214 Fed. 861, it appeared that in a contract granting the exclusive right to show certain moving pictures in three states there was a provision that if any films were not passed by the duly appointed moving picture authorities in a city because of objectionable scenes and such scenes were modified without materially injuring the whole production then the grantee should be required to accept the films, but with the further provision that the grantee might elect to take them even though the authorities refused a license for their exhibition, and that in case the grantee refused to accept on the ground of a disapproval by the municipal authorities the grantor should have the right to sell the production in the granted territory to some other person. It was held in an action for injunctive relief by both parties, that the grantor company acted too hastily in reselling the rights to another company five days after a film was modified where it was shown that the delay was caused by the grantee company in an endeavor to have the censorship of certain parts of the film modified, which parts were of material value to the production.

It has been held that where the principal business of a corporation was that of renting films for moving picture exhibition purposes, it was not a corporation engaged principally in trading or mercantile pursuits within the meaning of the provisions of the bankruptcy act as they existed at the time the petition in the case was filed. In re Imperial Film Exch. 198 Fed. 80, 117 C. C. A. 188.

V. Unlawful Use of Portrait or Name.

Under a statute providing that "a person, firm or corporation that uses for advertising purposes, or for the purposes of trade, the name, portrait or picture of any living person without having first obtained the written consent of such person, or if a minor of his or her parent or guardian, is guilty of a misdemeanor" and that an equitable action may be maintained by a person aggrieved to restrain the use of such picture or portrait and to recover damages by reason of such unlawful use, it has been held that a named portrait shown in moving pictures, which is represented to be a true portrait of one who has taken part in a certain event, but which in fact has been posed for by a moving picture actor, is a use for purposes of trade within the terms of the statute and the person whose picture is so used, not having consented thereto, may restrain a company of film manufacturers from further using the picture and also recover damages for its unlawful use. Binns v. Vitagraph Co. of America, 210 N. Y. 51, Ann. Cas. 1915B 1024, 103 N. E. 1108, L.R.A. 1915C 839, affirming judgments 147 App. Div. 783, 132 N. Y. S. 237, 140 App. Div. 925, 125 N. Y. S. 786, 67 Misc. 327, 124 N. Y. S. 515. See also Merle v. Sociological Research Film Corp. 166 App. Div. 376, 152 N. Y. S. 829. But where a person's name, as used in a moving picture production appears merely because it is on a building which is a part of the picture, it has been held that such a use is not for "advertising purposes" or for the "purpose of trade" within the statute forbidding such practices. Merle v. Sociological Research Film Corp. 166 App. Div. 376, 152 N. Y. S. 829. In that case, however, it appearing that a moving picture entitled "The Inside of the White Slave Traffic" showed a person's name on the outside of a factory wherein many girls were employed and showed the inside of a factory gotten up by the producer of the film, it was held that the only fair inference to be drawn from the picture was that it charged that such person's place of business was one where white slave traffickers plied their trade and implied such moral wrong on the part of the owner of the factory in not suppressing that condition as to bring him into general disrepute and thus to give him a right of action for libel against the moving picture company without his alleging special damages.

VI. English Cinematograph Act.

Where a company is the owner of a number of theaters in which cinematograph exhibitions are given it has been held that the company and not its servant is the "occupier" of the premises of a theater where the exhibitions are held, within the meaning of a section of the English Cinematograph Act which provides penalties to be imposed on the "occupier" of premises who uses them for such exhibitions without first having obtained a license therefor. Bruce v. McManus Div. Ct. [1915] 3 K. B. 1, 84 L. J. K. B.

1860, 13 L. G. R. 727, 113 L. T. N. S. 332 [1915] W. N. 170, 79 J. P. 294, 31 Times L. Rep. 387. And it has been held that the word "exhibition" in the clause of the act providing that an exhibition of pictures by means of a cinematograph shall be given only when certain conditions have been complied with, ought not to be construed so as to include a demonstration of films for the purposes of a sale thereof, by the English agents of an American firm where nobody but prospective purchasers of films are admitted to such demonstration. Atty.-Gen. v. Vitagraph Co. [1915] 1 Ch. 206, 85 L. J. Ch. 142, 13 L. G. R. 148, 112 L. T. N. S. 245 [1914] W. N. 437, 79 J. P. 150, 31 Times L. Rep. 70, 59 S. J. 160.

A regulation made under the act that the seating accommodations in a building used for moving picture exhibiting purposes shall be arranged so as to allow free ingress and egress of audiences and which requires the passages leading to the exits to be left free from obstruction is broken when a proprietor of a cinema theater into which all the seats allowed by law have not been put, allows the passageways and the exits to be blocked and crowded by standing people who are unable to find seats. Potter v. Watts, 112 L. T. N. S. 508.

In a prosecution under the act for not having a license to conduct on certain premises a cinematograph exhibition in which inflammable films were used, wherein it was demonstrated that the films burned readily when a naked light was applied to them, it was held that the films were "inflammable" within the meaning of the word as used in the act, as the term was not used in the restricted sense of being readily ignited when actually in use in the cinematograph machine. Victoria Pier Syndicate v. Reeve, 10 L. G. R. 967, 76 J. P. 374, 28 Times L. Rep. 443.

Under the clause of the statute which provides that "a county council may grant licenses to such persons as they think fit to use the premises specified in the license . . . on such terms and conditions and under such restrictions as, subject to regulations of the secretary of state, the council may by the respective licenses determine" it has been held that the county council has power to insert in a cinematograph show license a condition that the licensee will not open his premises on Sundays, Good Friday or Christmas Day. London County Council v. Bermondsey Bioscope Co. [1911] 1 K. B. 445. And the fact that a licensee under the act is using noninflammable films during an exhibition on a Sunday does not warrant his acquittal for opening on Sunday even though the first section of the act provides that "an exhibition of pictures . . . by means of a cinematograph for the purposes of which inflammable films are used" shall not be given unless certain conditions are complied with, such conditions having reference to the use of the premises and not necessarily to the use of them for exhibition with inflammable films. Ellis v. North Metropolitan Theatres [1915] 2 K. B. 61, 84 L. J. K. B. 1077, 13 L. G. R. 735, 112 L. T. N. S. 1018 [1915] W. N. 61, 79 J. P. 297, 31 Times L. Rep. 201.

In Theatre De Luxe v. Gledhill [1915] 2 K. B. 49, 84 L. J. K. B. 649, 13 L. G. R. 541, 112 L. T. N. S. 519 [1915] W. N. 16, 79 J. P. 238, 31 Times L. Rep. 138, it was held that a cinematograph exhibition license granted by a county council which provided that "children under fourteen years of age shall not be allowed to enter into or be in the licensed premises after the hour of 9 P. M. unaccompanied by a parent or guardian" and that "no child under the age of ten years shall be allowed in the licensed premises under any circumstances after 9 P. M." was ultra vires on the ground that the licensing authorities under the act were not the judges of the broad question of public policy as to whether children should go to such exhibitions after nine o'clock.

VII. Miscellaneous.

Where a moving picture producing company and an actress of exceptional and unique ability entered into an agreement in October, 1914, for her services, one of the terms of which was a stipulation that she would "not sign for a motion picture with any other picture company prior to June 15, 1916," and she was induced by fraudulent representations made by another picture company to the effect that the company with which she had contracted had made no arrangements for a play in which she should appear and that her contract with such company could not be enforced against her, to sign a contract for moving picture posing with the second company, it was held that the first company was entitled to an injunction to restrain the second company from producing any picture play in which the actress appeared, or to advertise that she would appear in any play except one produced by the first company. Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Co. v. Fox, 157 N. Y. S. 106.

In an English case it has been held that a performer who had agreed to give certain music hall proprietors his exclusive service and in his agreement stipulated that he would not, within a certain area, permit any colorable representation, imitation, or version of his performance, would not be restrained as for a breach of this agreement where it appeared that one of his sketches had been presented, by means of a cinematograph at a picture theater within the restricted area, as it was not proved that he had taken part in the reproduction. London Theater of Varieties v. Evans, 31 Times L. Rep. (Eng.) 75.

Where a person rents a moving picture machine to another and it is contemplated by the parties to the agreement that the property shall be used in the state where the contract is made and the property is located, and the contract is not required to be recorded under the state law, the owner of the property who acts as soon as he learns the fact may recover it in another state from a person who buys it from the bailee in good faith and without notice. Adams v. Fullers, 88 S. C. 212, 70 S. E. 722, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 385.

It has been held that the operation of a moving picture show is a trade or profession within the meaning of a statute which reserves to every family exempt from every species of forced sale for the payment of debts, "all tools, apparatus and books belonging to any trade or profession" and that the metal machine outfit and machines which are absolutely essential to the conducting of the business are exempt, but that the chairs used by an audience do not come within the meaning of the terms "tools" or "apparatus." Campbell v. Honaker's Heirs (Tex.) 166 S. W. 74. But in Higgins v. Beauchamp [1914] 3 K. B. (Eng.) 1192, 30 Times L. Rep. 687, it was held that where a partnership deed provided that the business of the firm should be that of proprietors and managers of picture palaces, cinematograph theaters and exhibitions, etc., such a business was not a trading business within the meaning of the term so as to give the managing partners thereof implied authority to borrow money for partnership purposes.

A combination of moving picture producing companies has been held to be a combination in violation of the federal Anti-Trust Act of July 2, 1890 (7 Fed. St. Ann. 336), where it appeared that although some of the companies held patents on moving picture apparatus yet their efforts as a combination were directed, not only to the protection of their rights under the patents, but to the imposition of restrictive rules for doing business on the trade in general, such as the requiring of every theater to pay a royalty for the use of a projecting machine even when the machine had been owned by the exhibitor before the combination was formed, and the withholding of permission to film exchanges and exhibitors to use films unless the exchanges and exhibitors were approved by all of the companies in the combination. U. S. v. Motion Picture Patents Co. 225 Fed. 800.

It has been held that the trustees of a Special Tax School District had no right to lease the school property for moving picture exhibition purposes. Special Tax School Dist. No. 1 v. Lewis, 63 Fla. 691, 57 So. 614.

In Flanagan v. Goldberg, 137 App. Div. 92, 122 N. Y. S. 205, wherein the plaintiff asked for damages for injuries caused by being struck by a board while she was attending a moving picture show in the defendants' theater, it was held that a charge of the court below to the effect that the burden was on the defendants to show that they were not negligent after the plaintiff was admitted to the show and seated and not on the plaintiff to show that the defendants were negligent, was erroneous.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY OF AMERICA

v.

SWAAB.

Pennsylvania Supreme Court—March 15, 1915.

248 Pa. St. 478; 94 Atl. 126.

Replevin — Pleading — Plaintiff's Ownership Not Denied.

Since an issue is a disputed point, and the Replevin Act of April 19, 1901 (P. L. 88), intends that only the disputed averments of fact in the declaration and affidavit of defense shall constitute the issues, plaintiff's ownership of the property in controversy is not in issue, where it is not denied by the affidavit of defense.

Moving Pictures — Lease of Film.

Evidence in an action to replevin motion picture films, held to show not only that defendant had received the films from plaintiff under a lease, but that plaintiff owned same.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Evidence in an action by the lessor to replevin motion picture films leased to defendant under a lease canceled by plaintiff by reason of a breach thereof by defendant held insufficient to show that the cancellation of the lease and taking of the films was pursuant to a special conspiracy between the lessor and other lessees such as entitled defendant to exemplary damages.

[See note at end of this case.]

Replevin — Liability for Unfounded Suit — Exemplary Damages.

That the sheriff in executing a writ of replevin necessarily went to defendant's place of business, and thereby caused him some inconvenience, does not entitle defendant to exemplary damages.

Moving Pictures — Lease of Film.

Where a license contract for the use of motion picture films provided that the contract could be terminated by the licensor on 14 days' notice, and that the right to possession of all films should revert 20 days after notice of such termination to the licensor, replevin issued one day before the time thus fixed is premature.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In view of the fact that, though defendant in such case could have held possession of the films on hand even after expiration of the 20 days, he had no right to use them, he is entitled only to nominal damages by reason of the premature issuance of the replevin.

[See note at end of this case.]

Torts — Lawful Act Induced by Improper Motion.

Where a plaintiff has a legal right to replevin property, it is immaterial what motives induce him to assert such right.

[See Ann. Cas. 1912D 798.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Philadelphia county: BARRATT, Judge.

Action of replevin. Vitagraph Company of America, plaintiff, and Lewis M. Swaab, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. MODIFIED.

Alex. Simpson, Jr., and Joseph L. McAleer for appellant.

James Gay Gordon, Alfred Aarons and Henry N. Wessel for appellee.

[480] MOSCHISKER, J.—The Vitagraph Company of America, a New York corporation, instituted this action in replevin, and the jury rendered a verdict for the defendant as follows: "Value of goods, $2,000; damages for detention, $8,424; exemplary damages, $10,000." Judgment was entered upon the verdict and the plaintiff has appealed.

The Act of April 19, 1901, P. L. 88, provides the form of pleadings in replevin, and Section 6 stipulates that "the declaration and affidavit of defense as originally filed, or as amended by leave of court, shall constitute the issues under which, without other pleadings, the question of title to, or right of possession of, the goods and chattels as between all the parties shall be determined by a jury."

The plaintiff claimed 27 moving picture films and averred, in its original declaration, that a corporation known as the Motion Picture Patents Company was the owner of certain patents relating to the manufacture of such films; that the Patents Company did not sell, manufacture, or use the films, but licensed others, including the plaintiff, to manufacture and lease, but not to sell, them to other concerns known as exchanges, which were [481] likewise licensed by that company to sublet these patented films to exhibitors who had secured a license from it to exhibit motion pictures; that the defendant was duly licensed as an exchange on January 20, 1909, and had entered into a license agreement in writing, which was attached as an exhibit; that the 27 replevied films were the property of, and had been manufactured by, the plaintiff; that they had been delivered to the defendant upon the terms and conditions of his license agreement; that this agreement provided the ownership of each film should remain in the licensed manufacturer and that whenever the agreement was terminated the right to the possession of the film should revert to the manufacturer "twenty days after notice of such termination," a copy of which agreement was attached as an exhibit; that each of the films claimed had thereon the plaintiff's trademark (a spread eagle) and was delivered in a box to which was attached a printed label stipulating, inter alia, "The lessee shall not have the right to sublet such motion picture until such lessee has entered into an agreement in writing with the Motion Picture Patents Company containing terms and conditions . . . and only while such lessee complies with such terms and conditions and while such agreement remains in full force and effect," a copy of the label being attached as an exhibit; that each shipment of the replevied films was accompanied by a bill which stipulated that the films were leased and not sold and that they were subject to the conditions of the license granted by the Motion Picture Patents Company and to the conditions expressed on the box label, a copy of this bill being attached as an exhibit; that the defendant's license was "canceled in accordance with the terms of the said exchange license agreement" and the defendant notified to that effect on January 3, 1911; on the foregoing averments of fact, it was claimed that "twenty days thereafter the right to possession of all the licensed motion pictures delivered to the defendant [482] by the plaintiff, under said exchange license agreement, reverted to the manufacturer . . . , the plaintiff in this action."

The defendant's original affidavit of defense, after first calling attention to alleged defects in the statement of claim, and entering certain defenses which were not pressed at trial, averred that the plaintiff was not entitled to maintain any action based on the defendant's license agreement because the plaintiff, together with the Motion Picture Patents Company, seven other corporations and two individuals (all except the Patents Company being licensed exchanges) form a combination "in restraint of trade and in violation of the laws of the State of Pennsylvania and of the acts of congress" relating to monopolies; that the notice of the termination of his license was not given to him on January 3, 1911, as averred in the declaration, but on January 4, 1911. None of the material averments of fact as to the ownership of the films, the terms of the contracts, or concerning the cancellation of the defendant's license, is specifically denied in this affidavit of defense, but it ends with a mere general denial that amounts to no more than a statement of the defendant's conclusion that he had not "at any time or in any manner violated the terms and conditions of any agreement between him and the Motion Picture Patents Company;" after which the defendant, without controverting the plaintiff's ownership of the films, denied that the plaintiff "at the time of the issuance of the writ in this case had any right of possession in and to the films taken," and asserted that the notice of the cancellation of his license was "unfounded, malicious and false and resulted from a conspiracy between the plaintiff and the Motion Picture Patents Company and others to ruin and oppress the defendant and to destroy his trade and business."

After the defendant's affidavit had been filed, the plaintiff, by leave of court, filed an amended declaration in which it reiterated the averments concerning its [483] ownership of the property and the cancellation of the defendant's license by the Motion Picture Patents Company, adding that after such cancellation and notice thereof to the defendant, he, "contrary to the terms and conditions of said labels and invoices and contrary to the terms and conditions of his said exchange license agreement, did sublet motion pictures . . . including the films above referred to (the 27 replevied films) or some of them, from time to time, to persons or corporations not licensed by the Motion Picture Patents Company," naming persons to whom the defendant had let the films after the cancellation of his license, but not designating when or to whom any one of the 27 films in question had been delivered. The amended statement also contains an averment that the defendant, contrary to the terms of his license and of the label and invoices, had permitted films leased to him by the plaintiff to be exhibited in unlicensed theaters or places of exhibition with unlicensed motion pictures, particularly stating a number of instances, with names and places, where this had occurred. The amended statement ends with the averment that "by reason of the facts aforesaid, the plaintiff, prior to the commencement of this suit, became entitled to immediate possession" of the replevied films.

The defendant filed an amended affidavit of defense in which he increased his claim of damages and alleged that the writ had been sued out "without color of right," and that the taking of the films under the replevin was "attended by circumstances of hardship, vexation and outrage . . . all of which was part of a scheme to deprive the defendant of his lawful livelihood and to remove him from the field of competition . . . and was an unlawful and malicious abuse of the process of law."

It is to be noticed that the supplemental affidavit of defense does not contain any denial of the material facts averred as justifying the Motion Picture Patents Company's cancellation of the defendant's license, or of the [484] facts depended upon by the plaintiff to substantiate its claim of ownership in the replevied films. Hence, since the statute intends that the averments of the declaration and affidavit of defense (meaning, of course, the averments of fact: Miller v. Jackson, 34 Pa. Super. Ct. 31, 37) shall make the issues to be passed upon by the jury, and, since an issue is a disputed point, it is apparent that the only material issues which were properly in dispute at the time of trial concerned the questions of the right of possession to the films, the value of such right, and the defendant's claim for exemplary damages. In other words, there was no issue raised as to the ownership of the property, for, by the pleadings, that was impliedly conceded to be in the plaintiff, and, under the circumstances, it could not properly be contended that the writ was without color of right.

Not only the pleadings, but the proofs at trial showed the plaintiff's title, and hence its color of right to the writ, for we find on the record either copies of the actual invoices introduced by the defendant or evidence indicating that such documents were produced and identified, which show that he received from the Vitagraph Company certain of the 27 films in controversy. In addition, there was testimony that the films were shipped to the defendant by the plaintiff company, each in a tin box with the license label thereon. Furthermore, when called under cross-examination, the defendant admitted that he had received from the plaintiff a large number of the films, all between April 13, 1909, and July 5, 1910, and that they were accompanied by the plaintiff's bills and invoices. Thus, aside from the pleadings, the evidence was amply sufficient to prove that most of the films in controversy (all but two) were actually shipped by the plaintiff and received by the defendant. Moreover, there was testimony to show that the bills accompanying these films contained the following, "The films covered by this invoice are leased and not sold; subject to the conditions of a license issued to lessee by the [485] Motion Picture Patents Company . . . and to the conditions expressed on the labels of the boxes in which these films are shipped;" that the license above referred to contained this condition, "The ownership of each licensed motion picture leased under this agreement shall remain in the licensed manufacturer and importer from whom it may have been leased;" and that the labels had this stipulation printed thereon, "The lessee . . . shall have only the right to sublet or use such motion picture." The documentary proofs put in evidence by the defendant showed that he was notified by the Motion Picture Patents Company at the time of its incorporation that "hereafter licensed motion pictures will not be sold outright, but will be leased by the various licensed manufacturers and importers, so that the latter may at all times retain title;" and the defendant testified that after January 20, 1909, when he entered into his agreement with the plaintiff company, "I received the films from them, paid their bills and used the films only for rental purposes . . . under that contract or lease I had the right to use the films I purchased for seven months . . . then I was to return to the Vitagraph Company 80 per cent. of the films I had purchased seven months, prior, but I was not confined to Vitagraph films, I could send any positive film;" so it may be seen that the documentary evidence and testimony of the defendant showed not only that he had received the films from the plaintiff, but the ownership of the latter.

Notwithstanding the apparent ownership of the plaintiff, as impliedly conceded in the pleadings and shown by the evidence, the defendant contended at trial that the 27 replevied films belonged to him; he said that in 1909, at the time of his license contract, he had on hand about 1,000 films, purchased outright and belonging absolutely to him; that the arrangement was, at first, that he should at the end of each month return all the films received during the seventh month prior; that the Patents Company, in February, 1910, changed this to [486] 80 per cent. and permitted "any age and make" of film which a lessee had on hand to be returned; that acting under and by virtue of this extended privilege he had used his own films in making returns, and had "returned all the films called for by the various manufacturers;" therefore, he contended that the particular films on hand at the time of the replevin belonged to him absolutely, and were not the property of the plaintiff. No such issue was raised by the pleadings, but waiving that point for the moment, it appears that the defendant was receiving films from other licensed manufacturers in addition to those secured from the plaintiff company, and we find no testimony that he in fact returned any of his own films to the plaintiff, the nearest approach to this being an assertion to the effect that "some of them (his own films) undoubtedly were returned to the Vitagraph Company for films I had received from them seven months prior." This assertion was a mere expression of opinion and cannot be accepted as evidence of a fact. On such a state of proof, in the face of the documentary evidence showing the ownership of the plaintiff, the evidence relied upon was entirely insufficient to prove a transfer of title to the defendant. Whether, should he prove that certain of his own films were delivered to the plaintiff company, the defendant could, in a proper action, recover such films or recompense therefor, is a point not necessary now to determine; but it is quite clear that there was no testimony to sustain a finding that any of the replevied goods belonged to the defendant. The uncontested averments of the plaintiff's declaration, and the very evidence produced or relied upon by the defendant, showed that the films had been manufactured by the former and leased by it to the latter, and there is nothing to justify or sustain a finding that they belonged to the defendant, or that the writ was issued without color of right.

Before taking up the question of the right of possession to the replevied films at the time the suit was [487] brought, we shall first consider the subject of exemplary damages. Even though the plaintiff showed title to the films, nevertheless, the defendant was entitled to a verdict, for, under the terms of the license agreement, the replevin issued prematurely, and the plaintiff did not sufficiently aver or prove a breach of the label contract by showing a letting of any particular film covered by the writ after the termination of the defendant's license; upon these points see Lubin Mfg. Co. v. Swaab, 240 Pa. St. 182, 87 Atl. 597. While the defendant alleged, in his affidavits of defense, a general, unlawful combination in restraint of trade, and that the notice from the Patents Company canceling his license was issued with a wicked intention to harm him, yet, when the case came to trial, he stated he did not claim that the Patents Company and its system of issuing licenses "was in the nature of an illegal combination." He did contend, however, that the Patents Company, with the ten licensed manufacturers, had entered into a combination with another concern known as the General Film Company, likewise a licensed manufacturer, to drive him out of business, and that the writ of replevin was the climax of this conspiracy. The General Film Company was incorporated April 18, 1910, most of the incorporators being officers of the other ten licensed manufacturers and one of them the treasurer of the Vitagraph Company. A member of the board of the General Film Company was also a director of the Vitagraph Company; but, the defendant's witness testified that all the incorporators of the General Film Company acted individually—for their own respective interests—and not as representatives of any other concern. The General Film Company is not referred to in either the affidavit or supplemental affidavit of defense as a member of the alleged conspiracy against the defendant; but evidence was offered to show that this concern had entered into negotiations with the latter, in the summer of 1910, for the purpose of purchasing his business, that a price was agreed upon, that subsequently [488] the defendant became dissatisfied with the arrangement and the company then called the whole transaction off by a letter, to which the defendant replied, "I have no criticism to make and accept with good grace your ultimatum." The defendant now contends, however, that this negotiation was not in good faith—that it was part of the conspiracy against him; but we have read every line of the testimony offered at the trial, together with all the documentary evidence, and feel there is absolutely nothing therein to justify an inference that the effort to buy the defendant out was commenced or carried on in other than good faith.

From the evidence produced, we do not see how, justifiably, either the General Film Company or the plaintiff could be found to have been a member of a conspiracy such as the defendant alleges existed against him. The arrangement under which he was working appears to have been entered into with his eyes open and with a full knowledge of its terms; so he must have known that his license could be revoked at any time by the plaintiff company, either with or without a cause. He admitted that he was one of four film exchanges in Philadelphia that went into this licensing arrangement, when other dealers, although offered a license, refused to do so, and that competitors are "in existence to-day notwithstanding that they could not get that license;" but, as before stated, when it came to trial the defendant did not depend upon his averments of a general conspiracy in restraint of trade, but alleged a special conspiracy against him, to prove which he called a witness who showed that a meeting was held in New York, in December, 1910, that was attended by a representative of the Patents Company and by representatives of most of the ten licensed manufacturers; that this was a gathering which took place every year at about the same time; that at this particular meeting the licensed manufacturers approved a determination that had previously been reached by the Patents Company to cancel the defendant's license; [489] that before canceling licenses of film exchanges it was usual in all cases to secure a vote of confirmation from the licensed manufacturers, because they were vitally interested in keeping as many exchanges in existence as possible; that they did not cancel such licenses except on complaint and after investigation had shown to their satisfaction violations by the exchange of the terms of its license agreement; and that on the occasion in question a general discussion concerning the conduct of the defendant's exchange took place before the Patents Company's decision to cancel his license was approved. There was no proof as to who attended the meeting on behalf of the plaintiff company, or whether the representative of that company voted for or against the cancellation of the license, nor was any prior corporate action by the plaintiff company upon this subject shown; and, finally, it appeared that everything done at the meeting, in connection with the cancellation of the defendant's license, was in accord with the general custom adhered to in dealing with such matters. The witness who gave this testimony, although called by the defendant, stated he was the president of the General Film Company, but that he had no connection with the plaintiff company, and this witness, in stating the purposes for which the Patents Company and the General Film Company were formed, if his testimony were accepted, showed them to have been incorporated for proper purposes and to have been conducted without a thought of injuring any one; in fact, from this testimony and the documentary proofs relied upon by the defendant, the whole licensing scheme seems to have been an arrangement to protect the use and to prevent the abuse of the patents possessed by the Patents Company and used by its licensees, for the mutual benefit of all concerned.

Whatever the real fact of the matter may be, the defendant failed to prove any special combination to work against him or his interests—the only combination [490] shown being the general one existing between the Patents Company and all the licensed manufacturers—and he likewise failed to show that in the working of this general combination anything unusual occurred in connection with his case. The licensed combination or connection between the Patents Company and its lessees and sub-lessees, was conceded to exist by all parties, but the defendant and all his licensed customers were to a degree a part of that general combination as well as the plaintiff company, and, as we have already stated, no evidence sufficient to show a special combination with an evil purpose toward the defendant was presented. Whenever such a conspiracy is claimed to exist it must be proved by "full, clear and satisfactory evidence," and, in each case, it is for the court to say whether evidence sufficient, if believed, has been presented to meet this burden: Ballantine v. Cummings, 220 Pa. St. 621, 70 Atl. 546. Under the evidence at bar, it must be held that the proofs depended upon were entirely insufficient to show such a conspiracy as here alleged; therefore, there is nothing to sustain the finding of exemplary damages unless it could be found that the taking of the goods was attended by undue aggravation, vexation and hardship. As to this, an examination of the evidence shows no such circumstances. The conditions at the time of the levy were as stated in Lubin Mfg. Co. v. Swaab, supra, and we need only repeat what is there said (p. 192): "In the nature of things, when the sheriff's officers came to the defendant's place of business the proceeding was bound to cause him inconvenience," but he is not entitled to damages on that score.

The questions we now have to determine are: Did the plaintiff prove a present right of possession to the replevied films, and, if not, what was the value of the possession to the defendant. The license contract contains several provisions concerning its termination, one of them stipulating that it might be terminated by the licensor at any time upon fourteen days' notice; but [491] the particular provision here involved (since the defendant's license was revoked thereunder) is this: "It is further agreed by the licensee that if this agreement is terminated by the licensor for any breach of any condition hereof, the right to possession of all licensed motion pictures shall revert, twenty days after notice of such termination, to the respective licensed manufacturers and importers from whom they were obtained and shall be returned to such licensed manufacturers and importers at once after the expiration of that period." As already stated, the replevin issued one day before the time set in the above quoted provision had expired; this being so, a then present right of possession was not in the plaintiff, but in the defendant. The question remains, however,—What was the value to the defendant of this right of possession? In determining this point we must again refer to the defendant's license agreement and the label contract, for by the latter the appropriate terms of the former were read into the letting of every film to the defendant. The label contract particularly stipulates that the defendant shall have only the right to sublet the film to which it is attached "while such agreement remains in full force and effect," and the license agreement provides that, immediately upon the expiration of twenty days after notice of its cancellation, all films rented by the defendant shall be returned to the respective manufacturers. Of course, the defendant could physically hold possession of the films which he had on hand, even after the expiration of the twenty days, but he had no right to use or sublet them, for it was his duty to return them to the manufacturer from whom they had come. In other words, he could not make any use of the licensed films twenty days after the termination of his license agreement unless he breached his contract duty to return them at that time, and that he would commit such a breach we cannot assume as a possibility in determining the value of his right of possession; all of which brings us to the conclusion [492] that this right of possession in the replevied films had but a nominal value.

We are conscious of the fact that in the like case of Lubin Mfg. Co. v. Swaab, supra, we said (p. 191), "Owing to the position in which the defendant is placed by the terms of the license contract under which he operated his business, the damages which it is possible for him to recover may be inconsiderable, but we cannot say as a matter of law that they would be merely nominal," but more mature study and consideration have brought the conviction that we erred in determining that the defendant's possession had more than a nominal value, and since the present writer was the author of that opinion, he does not hesitate so to state at this first opportunity.

Most of the cases cited by the appellee were presented on the theory that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the findings of fact necessary to support the verdict of the jury as to the ownership of the films and the damages awarded; but, since we have determined the evidence to be insufficient in those respects, an extended review of the authorities becomes unnecessary; we have examined all of them, however, and find nothing in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion. McDonald v. Scaife, 11 Pa. St. 381, 51 Am. Dec. 556; Schofield v. Ferrers, 46 Pa. St. 438; Herdie v. Young, 55 Pa. St. 176, 93 Am. Dec. 739; Rafferty v. Haldron, 81 Pa. St. 438; Craig v. Kline, 65 Pa. St. 399, 3 Am. Rep. 636; Dennis v. Barber, 6 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 420, and Wiley v. McGrath, 194 Pa. St. 498, 45 Atl. 331, 75 Am. St. Rep. 709, are all instances of verdicts for plaintiffs where the evidence showed that the actual taking was attended by circumstances of "outrage and oppression" comprising "vindictiveness, wantonness, fraud, deceit or real violence," or that the detention was accompanied by "vexation and oppression." In Cummings v. Gann, 52 Pa. St. 484, 491, we said that it must be "a rare case of misconduct" when exemplary damages are allowed in an action of replevin, and in Carey v. Bright, 58 Pa. St. 70, 85, we said that where the evidence failed to show such misconduct the court should not permit exemplary damages. McCabe v. Morehead, [493] 1 Watts & S. (Pa.) 513, 516, is an instance where judgment on a verdict for the defendant which included exemplary damages was reversed because an "examination of the evidence" showed nothing "in the conduct of the plaintiff in taking out the replevin and claiming and detaining the property manifesting malice or wanton vexation," and we there cite Cable v. Dakin, 20 Wend. (N. Y.) 172, and Brizsee v. Maybee, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 144, two cases where the verdicts were for the defendants, in the latter of which the rule is laid down that exemplary damages cannot be allowed unless the evidence shows that the writ had "obviously been perverted to the purpose of a wilful injury with a full consciousness in the plaintiff that he had no claim." Finally, in Cox v. Burdett, 23 Pa. Super. Ct. 346, exemplary damages were struck out in affirming a verdict for the defendant. We have not been referred to any Pennsylvania case, and we know of none, in which exemplary damages were allowed to the defendant where the plaintiff had a color of right to the writ and no special circumstances of hardship at the time of its service appeared. The general principle is that where a plaintiff has a legal right to a particular remedy it matters not what motives may induce him to assert it (Jenkins v. Fowler, 24 Pa. St. 308, 310; Wilson v. Berg, 88 Pa. St. 167, 172); but it is not necessary to discuss whether, in view of the plaintiff's ownership of the films, the present defendant could, under any circumstances, recover exemplary damages in replevin, for, as already decided, the evidence relied upon was insufficient for that purpose.

We have written at some length in order to develop plainly the reasons which impelled us to the conclusion that the large monetary awards comprehended in the present verdict could not be sustained; but it is not necessary to pass specifically upon each of the 23 assignments of error, many of which concern mere details of the trial; without adding further to this already too [494] lengthy opinion, we shall follow the practice pursued in Duroth Mfg. Co. v. Cauffiel, 243 Pa. St. 24, 33, 89 Atl. 798, and enter the following order: The record is returned to the court below with directions to strike out the monetary awards, and to permit the judgment in favor of the defendant to remain for nominal damages and costs; to this extent the judgment is affirmed.

NOTE.

It is held in the reported case that where a license is granted a film exchange to use and to sublet motion picture films with a condition in the license that the films may be re-taken by the licensor twenty days after a notice to the licensee that his license has been canceled, the title to the films is never in the licensee, but that an action of replevin for the films brought only nineteen days after a notice to cancel the contract has been given, is premature, and gives rise to a right of action on the part of the licensee for nominal damages for the unlawful taking. Other cases dealing with the subject of moving picture film leases are collected in the note to Mutual Film Corp. v. Industrial Commission of Ohio, reported ante, this volume, at page 296.

v.

FREED.

United States Supreme Court—December 13, 1916.

239 U. S. 325; 36 S. Ct. 131.

Moving Pictures — Importation of Prize Fight Films — Validity of Statute.

The contention that Congress exceeded its power under the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution by enacting the provisions of the act of July 31, 1912 (37 Stat. at L. 240, chap. 283, Fed. St. Ann. 1914 Supp. p. 326), § 1, making it unlawful to bring into or to cause to be brought into the United States from abroad, any film or other pictorial representation of any prize fight which is designed to be used, or may be used, for purposes of public exhibition, is so obviously devoid of merit that a bill which, on the ground of the unconstitutionality of such statute, sought to compel the collector of customs to permit the entry of photographic films of a foreign prize fight, states no cause of action, and is properly dismissed by a Federal district court.

Appeal from United States District Court, of District of New Jersey.

Action for injunction. L. Lawrence Weber, plaintiff, and Frederick S. Freed, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Benjamin F. Spellman and Charles A. Towne for appellant.

Assistant Attorney-General Warren for appellee.

[328] WHITE, C. J.—The act of July 31, 1912, § 1, c. 283, 37 Stat. 240 (Fed. St. Ann. 1914 Supp. p. 326), makes it unlawful "to bring or cause to be brought into the United States from abroad, any film or other pictorial representation of any prize fight or encounter of pugilists, under whatever name, which is designed to be used or may be used for purposes of public exhibition." With this provision in force, in April, 1915, the appellant brought to the port of entry of the City of Newark in the State of New Jersey photographic films of a pugilistic encounter or prize fight which had taken place at Havana and demanded of the deputy collector of customs in charge the right to enter the films. On refusal of the official to permit the entry appellant filed his bill of complaint to enforce the right to enter by a mandatory injunction and by other appropriate relief to accomplish the purpose in view. The ground relied on for the relief was the avowment that the prohibition of the act of Congress [329] in question was repugnant to the Constitution because in enacting the same "Congress exceeded its designated powers under the Constitution of the United States and attempted, under the guise of its powers under the Commerce Clause, to exercise police power expressly reserved in the States." The collector moved to dismiss on the ground that the bill stated no cause of action because the assailed provision of the act of Congress was constitutional and therefore on the face of the bill there was no jurisdiction to award the relief sought.

The motion was sustained and a decree of dismissal was rendered, and it is this decree which it is sought to reverse by the appeal which is before us, the propositions relied upon to accomplish that result but reiterating in various forms of statement the contention as to the repugnancy to the Constitution of the provision of the act of Congress. But in view of the complete power of Congress over foreign commerce and its authority to prohibit the introduction of foreign articles recognized and enforced by many previous decisions of this court, the contentions are so devoid of merit as to cause them to be frivolous. Buttfield v. Stranahan, 192 U. S. 470, 24 S. Ct. 349, 48 U. S. (L. ed.) 525; The Abby Dodge, 223 U. S. 166, 176, 32 S. Ct. 310, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 390; Brolan v. U. S. 236 U. S. 216, 35 S. Ct. 285, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 544.

It is true that it is sought to take this case out of the long-recognized rule by the proposition that it has no application because the assailed provision was enacted to regulate the exhibition of photographic films of prize fights in the United States and hence it must be treated not as prohibiting the introduction of the films, but as forbidding the public exhibition of the films after they are brought in—a subject to which, it is insisted, the power of Congress does not extend. But aside from the fictitious assumption on which the proposition is based, it is obviously only another form of denying the power of Congress to prohibit, since if the imaginary premise and proposition based on its were acceded to, the contention [330] would inevitably result in denying the power in Congress to prohibit importation as to every article which after importation would be subject to any use whatever. Moreover, the proposition plainly is wanting in merit, since it rests upon the erroneous assumption that the motive of Congress in exerting its plenary power may be taken into view for the purpose of refusing to give effect to such power when exercised. Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co. 94 U. S. 535, 541, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 148; McCrary v. U. S. 195 U. S. 27, 53-59, 1 Ann. Cas. 561, 24 S. Ct. 769, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 78; Calder v. Michigan, 218 U. S. 591, 598, 31 S. Ct. 122, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 1163.

Affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case is authority for the doctrine that the bringing into the United States motion pictures of prize fights may be prohibited by Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution. STATE

v.

LAPOINT.

Vermont Supreme Court—October 13, 1913.

87 Vt. 115; 88 Atl. 523.

Burglary — Breaking and Entry — Opening Partly Opened Door.

One who finds the door of a freight car partly open and pushes it further open in order to effect an entry for the purpose of committing larceny therein commits a "breaking" which is sufficient to support a charge of burglary, since the breaking is the removal of an obstruction which, if left as found, would prevent an entrance, and the fact that a portion of the space needed for the entrance is already open will not relieve the defendant from the penalty.

[See note at end of this case.]

Trial — Sufficiency of Exception to Charge.

Where one accused of crime submits 23 requests for charges, some of which are complied with, and excepts to the refusal to charge in accordance with each request and to the charge as given on the subject-matter of each request, the exception is too general.

Same.

An exception to a charge that an intent to steal may be inferred from the larceny alone as being improper under the circumstances of the case is not sufficient to direct the court's attention to a complaint that the court charged that the only way the intent can be determined is from the surrounding circumstances, thus excluding from consideration the defendant's testimony concerning his intent.

Criminal Law — Necessity of Instructing as to Circumstantial Evidence.

Where one charged with burglary admits the entry and the subsequent larceny, but denies that he intended to commit larceny at the time of the entry, it is not necessary for the court to charge that, in order to convict where the only evidence of intent is circumstantial, the circumstances must be such as to exclude every reasonable hypothesis except that of guilt.

[See 97 Am. St. Rep. 790.]

Exceptions from Chittenden County Court: TAYLOR, Judge.

Criminal action. Louis Lapoint convicted of burglary and alleges exceptions. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Joel W. Page and Guy M. Page for defendant.

Theodore E. Hopkins and Henry B. Shaw for state.

[116] MUNSON, J.—The respondent was tried on an information in two counts, the first of which charged burglary and the second larceny; and a conviction was had on the first count. The place entered was a freight car, forming part of a train moving from Richmond to Waterbury. The only direct evidence as to the breaking was that of the respondent, who testified that he and his associate found the door of the car open about an inch, and pushed it open about half way and climbed in. The respondent [117] has raised by several motions and exceptions the question whether this was sufficient to constitute a breaking.

It may be conceded at the start that by all the earlier cases, and by the great weight of authority to the present day, the further opening of a door left ajar, of a window slightly raised, is not such a breaking as is essential to the crime of burglary. This being the situation, our examination of the cases will have reference mainly to the reasons given for the rules adopted, and the consistency with which the rules have been applied.

Blackstone says that "if a person leaves his doors and windows open it is his own folly and negligence." 4, *226. This is the same as saying that the law will not undertake to protect by its penalties a man who is not diligent to protect himself. But this is not the rule in other branches of the criminal law; and we do not see that the fact that this crime consists merely of an entrance with intent to commit a further crime calls for any distinction. A man may recklessly and unnecessarily pass through a group of men excited to the point of violence, but if he is assaulted the penalty will follow. A man may issue a check so carelessly drawn as to afford an attractive opportunity for alteration, but the man who makes the alteration will be guilty of forgery. A woman may associate with men under circumstances of great imprudence, but if a criminal advantage is taken of her situation the act will nevertheless be rape. Then why should not one who is tempted to enter a dwelling with felonious intent by seeing a door which has carelessly been left ajar, be held guilty of burglary?

But let us keep the discussion within the limits of the law of the subject. A man may have locks on all his doors and windows, and if he closes the doors and windows without turning a lock, this is not to be accounted negligence. But if in addition to the non-use of his fastenings he leaves a window sash slightly raised, his negligence becomes a shield to the intruder. This distinction evidently turns upon the theory, prominent in both early, and recent cases, that the manifest carelessness of the householder tempts the passer-by to enter. It is doubtless true that a window partly raised or a door standing ajar may attract attention and be a temptation to one who might not be disposed to try a window or door to see if it was unfastened. But other conditions quite as likely to attract attention and [118] tempt the observer have been held sufficient to support the charge; for instance, a network of twine covering a window space otherwise open, or a chain attached to the outside of a door and hooked over a nail. Com. v. Stephenson, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 354; State v. Hecox, 83 Mo. 531. And one court has disagreed upon and left undecided the question of breaking, where the covering of a window opening was a cloth hanging from two nails in the top of the window frame. Hunter v. Com. 7 Grat. (Va.) 641, 56 Am. Dec. 121.

The word "breaking" implies the use of force, but it is universally held that the slightest force will be sufficient. It is evident that the question of force has no bearing upon the distinctions affecting this case as they are established by the decisions. The mere lifting of a closed window is a sufficient breaking, but the further raising of a partially opened window is not. The pushing open of a closed but unlatched door is a sufficient breaking, but the pushing back of one found standing ajar is not. And yet the force used in the two cases of either class is of the same character and degree, differing only in the continuance of the effort.

It is said by way of a general designation that the thing moved or displaced to permit the entrance must be something which is relied upon as a security against intrusion and a means of safety to person and property. The cases show how little this means. No provision for safety is required beyond what is included in the barest construction of a building intended to meet the requirements of civilized life. The occupant may rely upon substances and conditions which are altogether wanting in real security,—provided no opening whatever is left. The requirement, as applied to the ordinary means of entrance, is limited to measures which are about equally adapted to guard against the entering of strangers bent on crime and the unceremonious intrusion of friends.

It has always been held that an entrance through a chimney is a breaking. It is said that a chimney is as much closed as the nature of things will permit—that it is a necessary opening and needs protection. The pushing open of a closed but unfastened transom, that swings horizontally on hinges over an outer door of a dwelling-house, is a breaking. Timmons v. State, 34 Ohio St. 426, 32 Am. Rep. 376. But if it were left to hang slightly away from the frame it would not be a breaking to push [119] it further,—unless it were held otherwise on the ground that the position of the transom was such that the condition in which it was left would not be likely to attract attention. In other words, if such a transom is left in a position to serve in the slightest degree the purpose for which it was put on hinges, an entrance by way of it will not be a breaking. If an upper sash sustained only by a pulley weight is left in position, it will entitle the household to the protection of the law. Rex v. Haines, R. & R. C. C. (Eng.) 451. But if it be left a little lowered, an entrance effected by pulling it down will not subject the intruder to the penalty. As far as the law is concerned, the necessities of convenient, unobstructed and adequate ventilation have thus far yielded to the theories which burden the inmate with the duty of protecting the outsider from temptation. The incongruity of this situation cannot well be overlooked in a time when the necessity of a constant and abundant supply of fresh air is so generally recognized.

Whatever reasons may formerly have existed for making this distinction, there seems to be none for maintaining it longer. The offence consists in breaking and entering with felonious intent; and the real breaking is the removal of the obstruction which, if left as found, would prevent the entering. The fact that a quarter of an inch of the space needed to effect an entrance existed before the intruder commenced operations ought not to relieve him from the penalty. The point has never before been brought to decision in this State. The only cases we know of which directly support the view taken are Claiborne v. State, 113 Tenn. 261, 83 S. W. 352, 68 L.R.A. 859, 106 Am. St. Rep. 833; People v. White, 153 Mich. 617, 117 N. W. 161, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1102, 15 Ann. Cas. 927; State v. Sorenson, 157 Ia. 534, 138 N. W. 411. Convenient references to the cases generally will be found in the notes to People v. Richards, 2 Am. St. Rep. 383; State v. Vierck, 139 Am. St. Rep. 1047.

The respondent submitted twenty-three requests to charge, some of which were complied with. He excepted to the refusal to charge in accordance with each request, and to the charge as given on the subject-matter of each. The exception was too general to be of avail.

Complaint is made that the court charged that the only way the intent could be determined was from the surrounding circumstances, thus excluding from consideration the respondent's [120] testimony regarding his intent. The exception taken was to the charge that "an intent to steal may be inferred from the larceny alone, as improper under the existing circumstances of the case." There was nothing in this to direct the court's attention to the point now argued.

It is claimed that the court misstated the testimony as to the door being closed when the train left St. Albans, and as to its being closed until after the car was looked over at Bolton, and in saying that the respondent's evidence tended to show that Bolton was the place where the car was broken into. The first statement was incorrect but harmless; the second was justified by the testimony of the conductor; and no exception was taken covering the third.

The court charged fully on the subject of reasonable doubt as applied to the element of intent. The respondent excepted to the failure to charge that in order to convict where the only evidence of intent is circumstantial, the circumstances must be such as to exclude every reasonable hypothesis consistent with the respondent's innocence. The respondent's testimony negatived the existence of an intent to steal at the time of entering. The evidence of felonious intent adduced by the State, unless of confessions by the respondent, is necessarily circumstantial. It has not yet been held in this State that the failure to give the above instruction where the evidence is wholly circumstantial, is error; and it certainly ought not to be so held in respect to burglarious intent, where the respondent has testified to the entering and to a subsequent larceny, and has also testified regarding his intent.

Judgment that there is no error and that the respondent take nothing by his exceptions.

NOTE.

Burglary by Opening, Sufficiently to Gain Entrance, Door or Window Partly Open.

This note reviews the recent cases discussing burglary by opening, sufficiently to gain an entrance, a door or window partly open. The earlier cases are collected in the notes to People v. White, 15 Ann. Cas. 929; State v. Vierck, 139 Am. St. Rep. 1047.

The recent cases adhere to the view that to push open a door or window, partly open, sufficiently to gain an entrance constitutes a breaking within a statute defining burglary. State v. Sorenson, 157 Ia. 534, 138 N. W. 411; Goins v. State, 90 Ohio St. 176, 107 N. E. 335, L.R.A.1915D 241. And see the reported case. See also People v. Kaiser, 150 App. Div. 541, 135 N. Y. S. 274, order affirmed 206 N. Y. 46, 99 N. E. 195. Martin v. State, 1 Tex. App. 525. Compare Rex v. Burns, 36 Nova Scotia 257. Thus in State v. Sorenson, 157 Ia. 534, 138 N. W. 411, it appeared that the defendant pushed in a loose sliding door to an extent that enabled him to crowd into a storehouse through the opening thus made. Instructions were asked and refused to the effect that "if the door were 'partly open,' a pushing of the same further open could not constitute a breaking." In upholding the ruling, Evans, J. said: "There is a conflict in the authorities on this question. The numerical majority of the cases favor the contention of the defendant to the effect that, if a door be partly open, it is not a 'breaking' to push the same further open." Indeed, the older cases were practically unanimous to this effect. . . . In the later cases some of the courts have repudiated this rule as being unreasonable and illogical. . . . The majority of this court are disposed to follow the lead of the last cited cases, and to hold that, if a door be so nearly closed that the accused could not enter through the opening without pushing the door further open, then such pushing will constitute a 'breaking' within the meaning of the law. The minority, including Justice Weaver and the writer hereof, are disposed to concede the force of logic in the majority view. In view, however, of the great weight of previous authority to the contrary, they think that the present holding savors somewhat of the ex post facto. It has always been in the power of the legislature to adopt a definition of 'breaking' in accord with the present holding, but it has not done so. In section 4791 it did provide that an entry without breaking should be punishable where such entry was in the nighttime, and the building a dwelling house. In all other respects the definition of burglary is left to judicial decision. In view of the uniform judicial definition, so long followed by the courts and acquiesced in by legislatures, it is the minority view that an innovation ought not to be lightly adopted." So in Goins v. State, 90 Ohio St. 176, 107 N. E. 335, L.R.A. 1915D 241, the court affirmed a conviction of burglary for maliciously and forcibly breaking into and entering a certain chicken house and stealing chickens therefrom. The following were the facts: "The only means of ingress to and egress from the chicken house was through a doorway of ordinary size. On the evening before the chickens were stolen the door of the chicken house, which was hung upon hinges, was open about fifteen or eighteen inches, being held open by means of a fence post placed on one side thereof and a brick on the other side. The owner of the property, Mary Linton, testified that the door had been propped open in that way, 'just so that the chickens and myself could pass in and out.' She stated that the door was not open wide enough to permit her to walk in—she had to take hold of the edge of the door and then pull around the corner." It appears from the evidence that the morning after the chickens were stolen the door was from one-half to two-thirds open, and the fence post and brick were moved out of place." The court said: "If the door of the chicken house was further opened, in order to make the opening sufficiently wide to admit the plaintiffs in error (and this was a question for the jury) unquestionably some force was required, and, however slight it may have been, it was all that was required to constitute a 'forcible breaking' under the statute, and, taken with the other facts established, made a case of burglary." In People v. Kaiser, 150 App. Div. 541, 135 N. Y. S. 274, order affirmed 206 N. Y. 46, 99 N. E. 195, wherein it appeared that the defendant gained admission to a dwelling house through an open basement gate, an uncovered hoistway and a cellar door partly open, the court said that "the manner in which he entered the house meets the statutory definition of breaking." Likewise in Martin v. State, 1 Tex. App. 525, the court by way of dictum said: "Under our statute the entry into the house at night includes every kind of entry but one by the free consent of the occupant, or of one authorized to give consent, and it is not necessary that there should be any actual breaking when the entry is made at night. In this state, whenever any force is applied, even if it be the pushing wider a partly-open door, or pushing up a window partly raised, so as to enable the person to enter the house without the free consent of the occupant, or of one authorized to give consent, with the intent to steal the property of another from said house, the party so entering said house is guilty of burglary."

However, in Rex v. Burns, 30 Nova Scotia 257, wherein it appeared that the accused entered a dwelling house either by lifting one window which was open a few inches and resting on a can, or through another window which was closed and locked, the trial judge instructed the jury that his entry either way constituted a burglarious breaking and entry. The appellate court said: "Clearly he did not commit the crime charged if he entered by the porch window partly open." It was not proved by which window he entered. It was absolutely necessary to prove that he effected an entrance through the closed window. The jury were led to believe that an entrance by either would be sufficient. It is, therefore, quite evident that he may have been convicted of a crime which he did not commit. It was left open to the jury to do so, and the conviction cannot be upheld."

JOHNSON.

Utah Supreme Court—May 8, 1913.

43 Utah 1; 134 Pac. 590.

Findings of Fact — General Conclusion Improper.

Where, in an action on a note for money loaned, the evidence without dispute showed that the transaction was effected through agents of both parties, and plaintiff contended at the trial that she did not enter into a corrupt and usurious agreement, as claimed by defendant, knew nothing about it, received none of the fruits thereof, and never ratified the transaction, a finding that the agreement was entered into "between plaintiff and defendant" is not a finding of fact but a conclusion of law and improper; it being the duty of the court to specifically find the facts with regard to the matters and then draw his conclusion from the facts found.

Usury — Contract of Agent — Responsibility of Principal.

Where money is left by a principal with an agent to be loaned, and the agent takes usury, but without the knowledge of the principal or her receiving any fruits of the transaction, the principal is not chargeable with the effects of the agent's misconduct.

[See note at end of this case.]

What Is Usurious Rate — Monthly Interest.

Under the statute permitting any rate of interest not exceeding 12 per cent. per annum, a note calling for interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month is not usurious.

Proof of Usury — Clear Proof Essential.

Under the usury statute, providing that, whenever it shall satisfactorily appear by admission of the party or by proof that any bond, bill, etc., has been taken or received in violation of the provisions of the act, then, and not otherwise, shall the lender forfeit the whole sum expressed in the contract to the borrower, a forfeiture for usury will not be declared except on evidence clear and convincing that the lender participated in or benefited by the transaction.

Appeal from District Court, Salt Lake county: LOOFBOUROW, Judge.

Action on promissory note. Carrie Brown, plaintiff, and Sarah M. Johnson, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Allen T. Sanford, for appellant.
Adam Duncan for appellee.

[2] FRICK, J.—This was an action to recover upon a promissory note given for $350. The only defense interposed is usury. A trial to the court resulted in findings and judgment for defendant, and the plaintiff appeals.

The interest specified in the note did not exceed the rate permitted by our statute, and hence the defendant undertook to prove usury by parol evidence. We have carefully gone over and examined all of the evidence that was produced at the trial, and which was certified up by the trial court in appellant's bill of exceptions. The material evidence produced by both parties is substantially as follows: Some time [3] in 1910 Mrs. Mansfield, the mother of respondent, applied to one Adolph Lochwitz to obtain a loan of $250 or $300 which she said she needed immediately to pay certain materialmen for material which they had furnished and were furnishing for a new dwelling house she was then building. In this connection she testified that she went to Mr. Lochwitz and asked him for the money, and after telling him that she could secure its payment by a chattel mortgage upon her daughter's (respondent's) property, he said that he would see what he could do for her by way of obtaining the money and that he advised her that she needed at least $250; that within a day or two thereafter she saw him again and he told her that he could let her have the money but that she would have to pay fifty dollars for it for ninety days; that pursuant to this arrangement she, at his request went to the office of Mr. Sanford, an attorney at law, to have the necessary papers drawn to evidence the loan and there to obtain the money; that she met Mr. Sanford and Mr. Lochwitz at the office of the former and he prepared the papers and she signed them by signing her daughter's name, by herself, as attorney in fact; that after the papers were signed Mr. Sanford counted out $300, placing the same in three separate parcels, and also counted out an additional fifty dollars and placed it in a separate parcel and shoved the whole amount across the office desk toward her; that she was about to take the money when Mr. Lochwitz said that the interest and expenses for drawing the papers should be deducted from the amount. After this the witness' memory is not clear with respect to just how the transaction terminated. Mr. Sanford, however, testified that he obtained the $350 from his stenographer, with whom Mr. Lochwitz had left it, and that he counted all of it and shoved it across the desk to Mrs. Mansfield when Mr. Lochwitz spoke up and said that the interest called for in the note, to wit, one per cent. a month, should be taken out of the amount, and further that one-half of the expenses for drawing the papers should also be deducted therefrom. He accordingly asked Mr. Sanford what the expenses were and was informed that they would be five [4] dollars. Mr. Sanford then sought to take the amount of the interest, namely, $10.50, and his expenses, five dollars, out of the $350, but could not do so because he could not make the change correctly. Mr. Lochwitz then paid Mr. Sanford the portion of the expenses Mrs. Mansfield was to pay and immediately left the office to go with her to the bank where she wanted to deposit the money so that she could check against it, where she said she would repay him her share of the expenses. As to what happened at the bank, the witnesses are greatly at variance, but, in view of the conclusions reached, the precise nature of the transaction there is not material. Mrs. Mansfield, however, asserts that Mr. Lochwitz took the whole fifty dollars for interest, while he insists that all he took was $10.50 and one-half of the expenses, and that Mrs. Mansfield gave him thirty-seven dollars as compensation for his efforts in obtaining the money in question and to further assist her to obtain a loan upon her house she was then building. He says that this came about in this way: When Mrs. Mansfield asked him for the money in question he asked her what means she had to repay the loan if made; that she said she wanted to secure $1,200 by mortgaging her house, and if she could do so she could repay the loan from him out of that. After considering her wants as detailed by her, he told her that she had better make a loan of $1,500, and that in consideration of the fifty dollars she offered to pay him he would assist her to obtain the loan from some real estate men with whom he was acquainted. She disputes the latter statement and insists that the fifty dollars was asked as a compensation for the use of the money in question. The evidence is without contradiction that the money in question belonged to the appellant, who is a niece of Mr. Lochwitz, and at the time the loan was made lived and still lives in San Francisco; that some time prior to the transaction in question she had lived at Price, Utah, and from there came to Salt Lake City for surgical treatment; that after she was operated upon and was about to leave Salt Lake City for San Francisco she had more money than she needed and she gave $400 to her [5] uncle, Mr. Lochwitz, telling him to use it or do with it as he thought best, and when she needed it he could upon request return it to her. Mr. Lochwitz states that after he had tried in vain for a number of days to obtain the money for Mrs. Mansfield, and after she had offered him fifty dollars as compensation to obtain it, he finally let her have $350 of the $400 aforesaid and took a chattel mortgage as security; that his niece had no knowledge whatever that he was about to make or that he had made the loan until afterwards, when he advised her of the fact and asked her to execute a power of attorney to him so that he might do everything that might be required of him in collecting the money; that she did not know anything about the arrangements between him and Mrs. Mansfield respecting the interest, commission, or bonus (whatever it may be called), and never obtained any part or share of the same; that no arrangement or understanding of any kind was ever had or talked of between him and his niece about the making of this or any other loan, or about his services in case he made a loan, and that his niece furnished the entire $350. Respondent introduced the aforesaid power of attorney in evidence, which was dated and was executed some time after the note in question was made and delivered. It is not necessary to detail the evidence further.

The only findings of fact made by the court, except the formal ones, are as follows:

"That the said note and mortgage were made and delivered to the plaintiff upon an agreement between the plaintiff and defendant that the defendant should pay to plaintiff, and that the plaintiff should take, receive, reserve, and secure to herself for the loan of the principal sum therein mentioned, a greater sum than at the rate of twelve per centum per annum upon said principal sum, to wit, at the rate of one per cent, per month from date of said note, as provided therein, and in addition thereto the sum of thirty-four dollars; and, in addition to the said interest so reserved by the said note at the rate of 1 per cent, per month from date thereof until paid, the defendant at the time of the execution and delivery thereof paid to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff took and received [6] in pursuance of said agreement, the said further sum of $34 as additional interest or compensation for the loan of the said principal sum."

Upon the foregoing findings the court made conclusions of law and entered judgment in favor of respondent in which the note and chattel mortgage were canceled and appellant was adjudged to pay the costs of the action. Appellant complains that the findings aforesaid are not sustained by the evidence and that the court's conclusions of law and judgment are contrary to law.

We think it requires no extended, if any, argument to show that in view of the evidence to which we have referred the so-called findings of fact are merely a blending of conclusions of fact and conclusions of law interspersed with some ultimate facts. The finding that an agreement was entered into "between the plaintiff and defendant" is, in view of the evidence a conclusion of law pure and simple, since the evidence is without dispute that Mr. Lochwitz acted as agent for and on behalf of the appellant and that Mrs. Mansfield acted as such for and on behalf of the respondent. In view, therefore, that the transaction was effected through the agents of both parties, and since appellant contended, at the trial and now contends that she did not enter into a corrupt and usurious agreement, knew nothing about it, and neither received any of the fruits thereof nor ratified the transaction, the court should have specifically found the facts with regard to those matters and should have made his conclusions of law from the facts found.

There is not the slightest evidence in this record from which any inference can legitimately be deduced that the appellant authorized her uncle to enter into a usurious contract unless such inference is permissible from the mere fact that she left the money with him under the conditions hereinbefore detailed and from the execution of the power of attorney to him after the loan was made. Nor is there any evidence of ratification, nor that she knowingly received or retained any of the fruits of the illegal transaction, nor that she received anything forbidden [7] by law. We think the great weight of authority is to the effect that the facts in this case are clearly insufficient to justify the inference above referred to. We shall refer to some of the cases upon this point further on in this opinion.

The court, however, also found that the note in question upon its face provided for a higher rate of interest than is permitted by our statute in that it calls for interest at the rate of one per cent. a month while the statute permits interest at a rate "not to exceed twelve per cent. per annum." If this were so, the finding is useless, since the note speaks for itself. The finding is, however, a mere conclusion of law, but whether it is called a conclusion or a finding of fact it cannot be sustained because there is no evidence whatever to support it. Nor does the language of the note support it if it be assumed to be a mere legal conclusion. This is easily demonstrable. The statute permits any rate of interest not exceeding twelve per cent. per annum. This means a period of twelve months, no more no less. One per cent. a month is precisely twelve per cent. per annum, and this is especially so where the loan is for less than a whole year. If the interest reserved in the note in question be calculated, we find that upon the $350 it amounts to $3.50 a month and for twelve months to forty-two dollars. Interest at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum would amount to forty-two dollars for a year on $350 and $3.50 for each month, and for three months to $10.50, just the amount reserved in the note. If it were true that the note on its face called for a usurious rate, then we cannot see how the appellant could escape the consequences of a usurious contract, and the judgment would be correct regardless of the findings of fact, and there would have been no need of an extended opinion in this case. We are, however, clearly of the opinion that the note upon its face called for legal interest merely, and hence the usury must be established, if established at all, from facts alunde. The question, therefore, is, Does the evidence in this case establish usury in the sense that it vitiates the note under our statute as between appellant and respondent? While the courts with regard to when a [8] principal is bound by the acts of an agent in entering into usurious contracts or transactions are seemingly not in harmony, yet from a careful examination of the cases it will be found that their divergent views are more apparent than real.

In Boylston v. Bain, 90 Ill. 285, the Supreme Court of Illinois states the law upon the subject thus:

"If the plaintiff did not authorize his agent to charge a higher rate of interest than is given by the statute, and if he had no knowledge that a higher rate was charged, and did not receive the interest paid in excess of that allowed by statute, as stated in the instruction, we perceive no ground upon which the defense of usury could be rested. An unlawful and corrupt intent is the very essence of a usurious transaction, and how the plaintiff could be charged with an intent to violate the law if he had no knowledge that a usurious rate of interest was charged, and never received the illegal interest, as declared in the instruction, it is difficult to understand."

The Supreme Court of Iowa in Greenfield v. Monaghan, 85 Ia. 211, 52 N. W. 193, in the headnote, lays down the following rule:

"Where an agent, for a person lending money upon a promissory note, charged the borrower a rate of interest in excess of that allowed by law, retaining the difference between the rate charged and the legal rate for his own use, held, that the loan was not usurious unless the charge of illegal interest was authorized or ratified by the principal, and that upon such issue the burden of proof was upon the party charging usury."

In Call v. Palmer, 116 U. S. 102, 6 S. Ct. 303, 29 U. S. (L. ed.) 559, the Supreme Court of the United States, after reviewing the Iowa cases in connection with a number of others, says:

"These decisions seem to be founded on plain principles of justice and right. For when two persons (the agent and the borrower) conspire together and for their own purposes violate the law, how can punishment for their acts be justly imposed on the innocent third party (the lender)?"

What have we in this case except a secret arrangement between Mrs. Mansfield and Mr. Lochwitz, the former being anxious to obtain the money and the latter desirous of receiving [9] the bonus or a commission (call it what you will) from her out of the money loaned without the knowledge or consent of appellant whose money was loaned? Why should she be made to suffer for their acts from which each expected some benefits while she could obtain none except the interest allowed by law?

The editor in a footnote to the case of Newport Bank v. Cook, 60 Ark. 283, 30 S. W. 35, 46 Am. St. Rep. 197, 29 L.R.A. 761, after reviewing many of the cases, states the substance of the decisions in the following language:

"If the person to whom a commission or bonus is paid is an agent of the lender, the question whether such payment can be taken into consideration in determining whether the transaction is usurious depends upon whether or not the lender is to profit directly or indirectly by the transaction. If he does not know that a commission has been, or is agreed to be, paid and has no notice of such facts as impose upon him the duty of inquiry, and he does not knowingly receive any benefit from the commission or bonus, he certainly has no usurious intent, and, having neither usurious, nor a usurious profit, the cases agree that he is not to be subjected to the penalties of usury."

Many cases are cited as supporting the foregoing statement of the editor.

Without making further excerpts from the decisions, we refer to the following cases, all of which are in harmony with the cases referred to and in which many others are cited: Estevez v. Purdy, 66 N. Y. 446; Conover v. Van Mater, 18 N. J. Eq. 481; Rogers v. Buckingham, 33 Conn. 81; Franzen v. Hammond, 136 Wis. 239, 116 N. W. 169, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 399, 128 Am. St. Rep. 1079; Silverman v. Katz, 120 N. Y. S. 790.

In the case of Rogers v. Buckingham, supra, the transaction there involved, like the one in this case, was the only one that had been entered into by the agent for the principal, and the court held that a single transaction by an agent, where no arrangement existed between the principal and such agent with regard to the compensation he should receive or the rate he should reserve, was insufficient to authorize [10] an inference or presumption of fact that the agent was authorized to exact usury. That case is frequently cited and approved by the courts upon the question of establishing authority upon the part of the agent to bind the principal upon a usurious contract made by the agent.

It has, however, also been frequently held that, where an agent enters into a usurious contract with a borrower, the lender under certain circumstances may be bound by the acts of the agent, although the former did not know of nor directly authorize the particular transaction. The rule in this respect is perhaps as well stated by the Supreme Court of Minnesota as it is anywhere in the headnote to the opinion in the case of Hall v. Maudlin, 58 Minn. 137, 59 N. W. 985, 49 Am. St. Rep. 492, which we quote:

"Where a money lender intrusts the entire management of his business to a general agent, with unlimited authority to conduct it according to his own discretion, and with the understanding that he shall obtain the compensation for his services as agent from the borrowers, in the form of bonus or commission, if the agent exacts from a borrower a bonus or commission which, together with the interest reserved in the contract, amounts to more than the maximum rate of interest allowed by law, the transaction is usurious."

The following cases clearly support the rule as there stated: Robinson v. Blaker, 85 Minn. 242, 88 N. W. 845, 89 Am. St. Rep. 541; Payne v. Henderson, 106 Ky. 135, 50 S. W. 34; Payne v. Newcomb, 100 Ill. 611, 39 Am. Rep. 69; Fowler v. Equitable Trust Co. 141 U. S. 384, 12 S. Ct. 1, 35 U. S. (L. ed.) 786; Clarke v. Havard, 111 Ga. 242, 36 S. E. 837, 51 L.R.A. 499; Whaley v. American, Freehold Land-Mortg. Co. 74 Fed. 73, 20 C. C. A. 306. See, also cases cited in the footnote to Newport Bank v. Cook, 60 Ark. 288, 30 S. W. 35, 46 Am. St. Rep. 198, 199.

In addition to the cases just cited there are a few in which the principal's liability is extended to all acts which were within the apparent scope of the agent's authority. All that the courts in those cases seemed to inquire into was whether the agent had the authority to make the loan and if he had the principal was held bound by the agent's acts, although the agent transcended the express directions of his principal.

[11] To this effect is an early case from Nebraska which is referred to by Mr. Justice Sullivan in Hare v. Winterer, 64 Neb. 551, 90 N. W. 544. In the latter case it is, however, expressly stated that it was not necessary to go, and that the court did not go to that extent in a later case. The later Nebraska case may therefore be classed as belonging to the second group of cases cited above. Another case which perhaps goes to extent of the early Nebraska case is Austin v. Harrington, 28 Vt. 130.

It is also claimed by respondent that the case of Algar v. Gardner, 54 N. Y. 360, supports the doctrine laid down in the Vermont case. It will be observed that the case of Estevez v. Purdy, supra, to which we have referred, and which is a later New York case, squarely lays down the doctrine of the Illinois case which we have quoted from. Moreover, the reasoning in the opinion in 54 N. Y. is not satisfactory and we have not found the case cited nor followed by any of the later New York or other cases, while the case in 66 N. Y. has frequently been cited and followed.

There is still another case decided by the Supreme Court of Missouri, Western Storage, etc. Co. v. Glasner, 189 Mo. 38, 88 S. W. 917. The decision in that case is, however, squarely based upon a local statute and is therefore not controlling here. There may be a few more sporadic cases which follow the rule laid down by the Vermont court, but we have not found them. We desire to add in this connection that, when all of the cases from which we have quoted, and the others to which we have referred, except the ones from Nebraska, Vermont, and Missouri, and possibly the one in 54 N. Y., are carefully examined and analyzed, it will be found that all of them support the doctrine laid down by the Supreme Court of Illinois in the case of Boylston v. Bain, supra. We are also of the opinion that the doctrine as there laid down is the correct one. The question of whether the agent had authority to enter into a contract in violation of law should not be limited to the mere formal inquiry of whether he had the express or implied authority to lend the principal's money. While that question, as a matter of course, is always an [12] element and lies at the very threshold of the inquiry where the authority of the agent is involved, yet, where the transaction involves the violation of a statute, the inquiry should go farther and it should be ascertained whether the agent had the authority to enter into the contract which is alleged to be in violation of law. To establish such authority it need not be shown that the principal expressly conferred it, but it may be shown in the same manner as it usually is shown by proving the facts and circumstances from which the authority may legally be inferred or implied. And in this regard, if it be shown that there was an understanding, express or implied, between the agent and the principal whereby the former should look to the borrower for a commission or bonus as compensation, or if he has made loans for his principal in which such a course was pursued and the principal knew of it, or approved of it, or if there are any other facts or circumstances from which authority may be clearly implied, it may be found to exist. In the case at bar, as we have seen, there is nothing from which authority may be deduced except the naked fact that the uncle of appellant was authorized to exercise his best judgment in making use of the $400 she had left with him. Assuming that all that Mrs. Mansfield claims is true, still the question remains, What authority has the court to declare appellant's money forfeited to the respondent? Certainly our statute does not require that under such conditions the latter's money should be forfeited to the borrower.

The statute says "whenever it shall satisfactorily appear by the admission of the party or by proof that any bond, bill, etc., has been taken or received in violation of the provisions" of the statutes, then, and not otherwise, shall the lender forfeit the whole sum expressed in the contract to the borrower. We held in Culmer Paint, etc. Co. v. Gleason, 42 Utah 344, 130 Pac. 66, that when the plea of usury is interposed and forfeitures are involved, and "especially such as have the effect of taking property from one and giving it to another (the forfeiture) should be enforced only when the proof is clear and convincing, [13] if not beyond a reasonable doubt." We think that this is what is contemplated by the language of the statute which is, when it shall satisfactorily appear by the admission of the party or by proof that the provisions thereof have been violated, a forfeiture, etc., shall be declared by the court. If this means anything, it means that the proof showing a violation of the statute should be clear and convincing. The proof, in order to be satisfactory, can be no less than this.

Entirely apart, however, from the terms of our statute, the overwhelming weight of authority is clearly to the effect that the burden of proof is upon him who alleges usury and that he must establish it by at least clear and convincing evidence and not merely by a preponderance thereof. Webb, Usury, section 417; Yellow Medicine County Bank v. Cook, 61 Minn. 452, 63 N. W. 1093; Wood v. Babbitt, 149 Fed. 818; Conover v. Van Mater, supra; Short v. Post, 58 N. J. Eq. 130, 42 Atl. 569. The evidence as it now stands is therefore clearly within the rule laid down in Yellow Medicine, County Bank v. Cook, supra, and is insufficient to support the conclusions of law and judgment.

Appellant further contends that the court erred in overruling her motion to strike the testimony of Mrs. Mansfield. This contention is not tenable. While Mrs. Mansfield's testimony, standing alone, was clearly insufficient to make out a case as against the appellant, yet the testimony was properly received by the court. There is a further assignment that the court erred in admitting and excluding certain evidence.

We have carefully gone over the court's rulings in that regard, and we do not find any error excepting in one particular in connection with the claim advanced by appellant, namely, Mr. Lochwitz claimed that he was to receive the fifty dollars as compensation for obtaining a loan upon Mrs. Mansfield's house and lot and for what he had done in looking up persons who had money to lend before the loan in question was made, and in connection with the claim he attempted to prove that he had in fact assisted Mrs. Mansfield, and he offered to show [14] just what he had done in that respect. The court ruled that he could prove the agreement between himself and Mrs. Mansfield, but also ruled that he could not show what he had done after the loan in question was made. Where usury is attempted to be proved by parol evidence or otherwise, it is always proper for either party to go into the whole transaction for the purpose of disclosing all of the circumstances relating thereto. The evidence offered by appellant, while somewhat remote, was nevertheless proper in view of the claim made by Mr. Lochwitz. The question was one of weight and not of relevancy. The only objection was that it was not material. It clearly was material and, as we have seen, was otherwise proper. If this were the only error, we should not reverse the judgment, because it appears from the record that most of the offer to which we have referred was nevertheless before the court, as upon cross-examination Mr. Lochwitz was permitted to state about all of the facts in that regard. We have only mentioned the matter as a guide to the court in case a retrial of the case is had.

For the reasons stated, this judgment is reversed, the case is remanded to the district court, with directions to grant a new trial and to proceed with the case in accordance with this opinion. Appellant to recover costs.

Thus in Brown v. Jones, 89 Misc. 538, 546, 152 N. Y. S. 571, it was said: "And to make out a case against a lender, in a case where the usurious loan has been made by his agent; it must be made to appear that the lender had knowledge of the usurious agreement and assented to it." And in McLean v. Camak, 97 Ga. 804, 25 S. E. 493, the court said: "The general rule is now well settled, that commissions paid or agreed to be paid by the borrower to an agent of the lender for his services in procuring or advising the loan; and which, if added to the stipulated interest, would exceed the statutory limit, do not render the contract of the loan usurious, provided that such commissions are not in any manner shared in by the lender and are not exorbitant or unreasonable in amount; or, if excessive, that they were exacted by the agent without the lender's knowledge or consent." 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, p. 1004. In Lusk v. Smith, 71 Kan. 550, 81 Pac. 173, wherein it appeared that a son obtained five thousand dollars from his mother and loaned it at usurious interest which was paid to his mother, it was said: "The facts proved, considering the relationship of the parties, lead to the conclusion that the payment of usurious interest for more than ten years by the son to his mother was not made in compliance with a contract in which she exacted the rate received. It is a more rational view to attribute the sums paid every month to a recognition of filial duty on the son's part, regardless of whether the mother's money earned the amount paid to her or not. The court cannot escape from giving heed to those sentiments of parental affection which tend to excite liberality in a son when the support and welfare of his mother are concerned. If the deceased received the money for the purpose of investing it for his mother, the fact that he may have exacted and collected usurious interest from persons to whom he loaned it, and paid the usurious rate to his mother, is immaterial in this case." In Brigham v. Myers, 51 Ia. 39, 1

N. W. 613, 33 Am. Rep. 140, it was held that the act of a husband who loaned his wife's money and exacted a usurious commission without the knowledge or consent of his wife did not bind the wife. In Richards v. Purdy, 90 Ia. 502, 58 N. W. 886, 48 Am. St. Rep. 458, wherein it appeared that an agent who negotiated a loan was an agent of both lender and borrower, a commission charged by the agent and unauthorized or unknown to the lender was held not to be binding on the lender as usurious.

But in Bliss v. Sherrill, 24 App. Div. 280, 49 N. Y. S. 561, reversing 42 N. Y. S. 432, wherein it appeared that a husband made a loan of fifty thousand dollars and obtained as a commission ten thousand dollars, five thousand dollars of which he deposited to his wife's credit, the court disregarded the wife's testimony that she was ignorant of the transaction on the theory that she was under a duty to exercise supervision over a loan of that magnitude and that her acceptance of the benefit of the loan constituted a ratification of the agreement. The court said: "It was the duty of the plaintiff to know something about her bank account—to have her husband report to her what he was doing with this large amount of her property. She could not, without investigation and care, permit her husband to proceed with this property, violate the law, oppress the public by usurious contracts, giving her the benefit of it, and she neglecting and refusing to know anything about it. 'Left all my matters to Mr. Bliss,' as she says, 'gave him the entire control,' 'paid no attention to the details of business.' In so doing she infringes another principle of the law of agency, which requires that a principal should, within a reasonable time, examine his agent's report and disavow such acts as are unauthorized, and, if he fails to do so, his silence will be deemed good evidence of a ratification." (1 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law [2d ed.], 1206, and cases cited in note 3.)

It has been held that the usurious contract of an agent in lending money binds an undisclosed principal who knows nothing of the usurious character of the loan. Glick v. Brantner, 78 Ia. 568, 48 N. W. 581.

The mere fact that an agent represented that a bonus exacted by him was for his principal has been held not to alter the rule that a principal is not bound by the unauthorized usurious transaction of his agent. Estevez v. Purdy, 66 N. Y. 448, reversing 6 Hun 46.

Agent's Conduct Known or Authorized.

IN GENERAL.

Where the usurious agreement of an agent is either expressly or impliedly authorized or ratified by the principal, or where the circumstances are such that the agent's conduct is presumed to be known by the principal, the courts have been fairly uniform in holding that the principal is bound.

Canada.—See Kietzkowski v. Dorion, 14 L. C. Jur. 26.

Thus in Richards v. Bippus, 18 App. Cas. (D. C.) 293, it was said: "The note or obligation is affected with usury if the principal makes the loan, knowing that his agent has exacted a bonus or commission, though for his own sole benefit, which, with the interest payable to the principal, would amount to more than the rate permitted by law." And in Braine v. Rosswog, 13 App. Div. 249, 42 N. Y. S. 1098, it was held that the circumstances therein presented made it fairly inferable that the lender knew that her agent was making a usurious bargain. The court said: "It is undoubtedly the rule that the plaintiff must also show that the act of the agent was authorized by the principal, or that he took the bonus with the lender's knowledge and assent, so that the latter, at least by acquiescence, became a party to the usurious transaction. But here there was more than an ordinary agency. The parties were clearly acting in concert to evade the usury law. They were father and daughter. They lived together. The proceeds of the usury went to support them both. There was no pretense of compensation to the father for his services. The daughter knew that he was exacting compensation from the lender, or else that he was acting gratuitously. It seems that she had a small capital deposited in bank in her own name. Upon that the business was transacted. It was what is known as a chattel mortgage business. The father did the business and the daughter signed the checks. That, in fact, was all she did." In McCall v. Herring, 116 Ga. 235, 42 S. E. 468, it was held that the retention by an attorney of a commission which, added to the interest, made the contract usurious, being done with the knowledge of principal, bound the principal.

In McFadden v. Palmer, 83 N. J. Eq. 621, 92 Atl. 396, it was held that a guardian's usurious contract was binding on his infant ward. And in O'Neill v. Cleveland, 30 N. J. Eq. 273, a usurious contract entered into by an executor was held to bind the estate. On the other hand in Fellows v. Longyor, 91 N. Y. 324, a guardian's usurious contract was declared not to bind the estate.

AGENT AUTHORIZED TO LOOK TO BORROWER FOR COMPENSATION.

A principal who authorizes his agent to look to the borrower for compensation as a result of which the agent exacts a commission over and above the legal rate of interest to compensate him for his services is chargeable with the usurious character of the transaction. Fowler v. Equitable Trust Co. 141 U. S. 334, 12 S. Ct. 1, 35 U. S. (L. ed.) 786; Vahlberg v. Keaton, 51 Ark. 534, 11 S. W. 878; 14 Am. St. Rep. 73, 4 L.R.A. 462;

Thompson v. Ingram, 51 Ark. 546, 11 S. W. 881; Payne v. Newcomb, 100 Ill. 611, 39 Am. Rep. 69; Ammondson v. Ryan, 111 Ill. 506; Payne v. Henderson, 106 Ky. 135, 50 S. W. 34, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1789; Avery v. Creigh, 35 Minn. 456, 29 N. W. 154; Hall v. Maudlin, 58 Minn. 137, 59 N. W. 985, 49 Am. St. Rep. 492; Brown v. Archer, 62 Mo. App. 277, 1 Mo. App. Rep. 465; Texas Loan Agency v. Hunter, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 402, 35 S. W. 399; Nesbit v. Goodrich, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 28, 60 S. W. 1017. See also Union Mortg. Banking, etc. Co. v. Hagood, 97 Fed. 360; Whaley v. American Freehold Land-Mortg. Co. 74 Fed. 73, 20 C. C. A. 306. Thus in Texas Loan Agency v. Hunter, supra, it was said: "But when a lender authorizes his agent to make loans for him, under a general agreement that he must look to the borrower for his compensation, and such agent, for the lender, effects a loan, and charges the borrower a commission, this will make the contract usurious, whether the lender knew of the charge or not (Fowler v. Equitable Trust Co. 141 U. S. 385, 12 S. Ct. 1, 35 U. S. (L. ed.) 786); for this exaction is by the authority of the lender, the principal. American Freehold Land Mortg. Co. v. Whaley, 63 Fed. 746; Dayton v. Dearholt [85 Wis. 161] 55 N. W. 148. In this case, Mr. Bright testified: 'We advised, and so agreed with the parties who left money with us, that they should have so much net interest, and that all expenses for loaning and handling the money should come out of the borrower.' Therefore this testimony brings the case squarely within the rule just quoted." In Fowler v. Equitable Trust Co. 141 U. S. 384, 12 S. Ct. 1, 35 U. S. (L. ed.) 786, it was held that the exaction by a lender's agent of an amount of money over the legal interest from the borrower to pay the agent's commission was usurious as against the principal. It was said: "It is not consistent with the law of Illinois, as declared by its highest court, that the lender, when taking the highest rate of interest, shall impose upon borrowers the expense of maintaining agencies in different parts of the state through which loans may be obtained. We, therefore, hold that the exaction by the Trust Company's agent, pursuant to his general arrangement with it, of commissions over and above the ten per cent interest stipulated to be paid by the borrower, rendered this loan usurious." But compare Acheson v. Chase, 28 Minn. 211, 9 N. W. 784, wherein it appeared that an agent was directed by his principal to loan money at the highest legal rate with the understanding that the agent could collect a reasonable compensation from the borrower. The agent procured a loan at the highest legal rate of interest and received a bonus of fifty dollars from the agent of the borrower for effecting the loan. This the court held did not charge the principal with liability for the usury.

AGENT'S USURIOUS COMMISSION DIVIDED WITH PRINCIPAL.

It has been held that whenever it appears that an agent acting for his principal has obtained a usurious bonus or commission and divided the amount thereof with his principal, the latter thereby confirms and ratifies the usurious act of his agent. McBroom v. Scottish Mortg. etc. Invest. Co. 163 U. S. 318, 14 S. Ct. 852, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 729; Sherwood v. Roundtree, 32 Fed. 113; Pottle v. Lowe, 99 Ga. 576, 27 S. E. 145, 59 Am. St. Rep. 246; Byrnes v. Labagh, 42 Hun 659, 4 N. Y. St. Rep. 522, 25 N. Y. W. Dig. 461, affirmed 106 N. Y. 669, 13 N. E. 936; Williams v. Rich, 117 N. C. 235, 23 S. E. 257; Collamer v. Goodrich, 30 Vt. 628. Thus in Sherwood v. Roundtree, supra, it was held that an agent who exacted a usurious bonus on a loan and divided the same with his principal bound the principal. The court said: "Now, the agreement by which Mrs. Roundtree promised to pay twenty per cent., in addition to the eight per cent. per annum interest, to pay all premiums of insurance, all taxes, and to pay off all liens, is part of the plaintiff's case; it is an essential part of the contract, and was put in evidence by the plaintiff. Unquestionably it is the rank-est usury. It is not disputed that one who negotiates a loan may be allowed reasonable compensation for his expenses and trouble, in addition to interest. But where there is no expense, and no trouble, there cannot properly be charged any such remuneration. Tyler, Usury, 335. And no decision can be found where a court of justice has sustained a charge of twenty per cent., where any knowledge of such charge was traceable to the money lender. But here is twenty per cent. in addition to eight per cent. per annum." And in Byrnes v. Labagh, 42 Hun 659, 4 N. Y. St. 522, 25 N. Y. Wkly. Dig. 461, affirmed 106 N. Y. 669, 13 N. E. 936, in speaking of a transaction of this character the court said: "To such a transaction the law against usury clearly attached for it is a necessary consequence that the bonus paid to the lender by the agent for the loan to the borrowers is in legal effect paid by the principal as a bonus or excessive interest for the use of the money beyond the six per cent reserved in the mortgages. None of the cases go so far as to uphold such a transaction as this, although some of them, it must be conceded, go very far to overthrow the statute against usury. The cases that hold that the exaction from the borrower, by the agent of the lender of a bonus for his own benefit unknown to the lender, and in which the latter does not participate is not usury, have no application to this case."

General Agent.

Some cases seem to make a distinction between general and special agents and hold that the principal of a general agent entrusted with the full care and control of his principal's property and to make loans is presumed to know the character of his agent's transactions and is therefore liable for a usurious contract entered into by the agent. Rogers v. Buckingham, 33 Conn. 81; Clarke v. Havard, 111 Ga. 242, 36 S. E. 837, 51 L.R.A. 499; Callender v. Roberts, 17 Ill. App. 539; McNeely v. Ford, 103 Ia. 508, 75 N. W. 672, 64 Am. St. Rep. 195; France v. Munro, 138 Ia. 1, 115 N. W. 577, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 391; Lewis v. Willoughby, 43 Minn. 307, 45 N. W. 439; Stein v. Swensen, 44 Minn. 218, 46 N. W. 360, citing Lewis v. Willoughby, supra; Adamson v. Wiggins, 45 Minn. 448, 48 N. W. 185, citing Lewis v. Willoughby, supra; Hawkins v. Sauby, 48 Minn. 69, 50 N. W. 1015; Horkan v. Nesbitt, 58 Minn. 487, 60 N. W. 132; Cromb v. Olson, 60 Minn. 534, 63 N. W. 106; Western Storage, etc. Co. v. Glasner, 169 Mo. 38, 68 S. W. 917; Little v. Hooker Steam Pump Co. 122 Mo. App. 620, 100 S. W. 561; Austin v. Harrington, 28 Vt. 130. Thus in Cromb v. Olson, supra, wherein it appeared that a bank cashier was in the habit of loaning the bank's money at a usurious rate, it was held that a usurious loan made by him without the knowledge of the bank bound the bank. To substantially the same effect see Stephens v. Olson, 62 Minn. 295, 64 N. W. 898. In McNeely v. Ford, 103 Ia. 508, 72 N. W. 672, 64 Am. St. Rep. 195, it appeared that a husband entrusted with the entire management of his wife's estate and authorized in giving loans to exact whatever terms he saw fit, loaned money at a usurious rate of interest. The wife subsequently sued on a note which included the usurious interest. The court declared the defense of usury to be good against the wife. In Rogers v. Buckingham, 33 Conn. 81, it was declared that a usurious contract entered into by a general agent of a money lender gave rise to a presumption of authority by the lender and therefore of liability, but it was further held that the presumption could be rebutted by proof of the actual non-existence of such authority.

In Austin v. Harrington, 28 Vt. 130, it was held that the action of a general agent who in making a loan, exacted a usurious commission in the form of an additional charge on a pair of horses that were sold simultaneously with the loan, was binding on the principal who was the agent's mother, the court presuming that the mother was aware of the nature of the transaction. In Lewis v. Willoughby, 43 Minn. 307, 45 N. W. 439, it appeared that an agent entrusted with the general management of an estate procured a usurious commission which was included in the securities given to the principal. It was held that the principal was presumed to have knowledge of the transaction and was bound by the agent's conduct.

Rule in Nebraska.

In Nebraska the courts seem to hold unqualifiedly that a principal who entrusts money to an agent for the purpose of effecting loans is bound by the usurious contracts of the agent whether made with the knowledge of the principal or not. Cheney v. White, 5 Neb. 261, 25 Am. Rep. 489; Cheney v. Woodruff, 6 Neb. 151; Cheney v. Eberhardt, 8 Neb. 423, 1 N. W. 197; Olmsted v. New England Mortg. Security Co. 11 Neb. 487, 9 N. W. 650; Courtney v. Price, 12 Neb. 188, 10 N. W. 698; New England Mortg. Security Co. v. Hendrickson, 13 Neb. 157, 12 N. W. 916, 13 Neb. 574, 14 N. W. 519; Joslin v. Miller, 14 Neb. 91, 15 N. W. 214; Anderson v. Vallery, 39 Neb. 626, 58 N. W. 191; Hare v. Hooper, 56 Neb. 480, 76 N. W. 1055. In Hare v. Winterer, 64 Neb. 551, 90 N. W. 544, the court said that it was not necessary in that case to assert such a rule, the evidence showing actual notice, but reviewed the previous decisions as follows: "The doctrine has been repeatedly asserted in this state that where an agent of the lender exacts for the use of money a bonus or commission from the borrower in addition to the highest lawful rate of interest, the transaction is usurious. Hare v. Hooper, 56 Neb. 480, and cases there cited. In such case it is said the whole transaction is but one contract and that the principal, although ignorant of the wrongful act of his agent, is affected by it. Philo v. Butterfield, 3 Neb. 256; Olmsted v. New England Mortg. Security Co. 11 Neb. 487, New England Mortg. Security Co. v. Hendrickson, 13 Neb. 157. In the Olmsted Case, Maxwell, C. J., after remarking that the borrower cannot ground a defense of usury upon the acts of his own agent, goes on to say: 'But on the other hand, if a person places money under the control of another to loan for him, and the agent charges the borrower unlawful interest, or receives a bonus from him for such loan, either with or without the knowledge of the principal, he is affected by the act of his agent. The reason is, the principal has entrusted the business of making loans to him and has placed the money in his hands for that purpose, and in transacting the business by agency, there cannot be a distinct agreement between the lender through his agent with the borrower, and a different one between the agent and borrower, as it is in consideration of the loan that the unlawful interest or bonus is paid. The whole transaction is but one contract; which being made by his agent, the lender is bound by it."

Rule in Washington.

In Washington it appears that a statute exists by virtue of which a principal is bound by the usurious contracts of his agent though entered into without the actual knowledge of the principal. Ridgway v. Davenport, 37 Wash. 134, 79 Pac. 606, wherein it was said: "The contention that the lender is not bound by the wrongful act of his agent not within the scope of his authority is right in the face of the statute, which provides that, in all cases where there is illegal interest contracted for by the transaction of any agent, the principal shall be held thereby to the same extent as though he had acted in person. The statute provides, in so many words, that no person shall directly or indirectly take or receive any money, goods, or thing in action, or in any other way, any greater interest, sum or value for the loan or the forbearance of any money, goods or thing in action, than twelve per cent per annum. In this case it is evident that there was taken and received in money a greater interest than twelve per cent, the sum received amounting to about six per cent per month on the money advanced to the respondent. The indirect taking, then, in this case cannot be disputed, and, under the further provision of the statute that the principal shall be held to the same extent as though he had acted in person, there is no escape from the conclusion that the contract was usurious as to the appellant J. R. Davenport." See also Washington F. Ins. Co. v. Maple Valley Lumber Co. 77 Wash. 686, 138 Pac. 553; Testera v. Richardson, 77 Wash. 377, 137 Pac. 998.

ECHOLS ET AL.

SPEAKE.

Alabama Supreme Court—December 18, 1913.

185 Ala, 149; 64 So. 306.

Guardian and Ward — Powers of Guardian — Sale of Personality.

A guardian of a minor having the same jurisdiction over the minor's choses in action as an executor has over the personal property of his testator, the guardian, at his peril and the peril of his bondsmen, may assign and transfer notes belonging to the minor's estate.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Chancery Court, Morgan county: LOWE, Special Chancellor.

Action by D. W. Speake, plaintiff, against James L. Echols et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. REVERSED.

[149] The case made by the bill is: That the complainant became indebted to one William C. Preston, a minor, in the sum of $1,500, and, to secure the payment of said indebtedness, executed a mortgage to secure five promissory notes, each in the sum of $300, bearing date August 11, 1906, and maturing, respectively, on the 1st of August, 1907, 1908, 1909, 1910, and 1911; said notes [150] bearing interest from date and the interest being payable annually. That, after the execution of the notes and mortgages, Preston, the guardian, discounted the notes falling due in 1907 and 1908, and transferred them and the mortgage to secure them to one Samuel Irwin, without the consent of complainant or without his knowledge, and it is also alleged on information and belief that Irwin transferred, before the first note matured, the said notes and mortgages transferred to him to one James L. Echols; the same being without recourse on said Irwin, and being made without the consent or investigation of complainant. That on August 20, 1907, complainant paid to Preston, as guardian of said minor, the first of said notes, and the interest on the other four notes, and declined to pay said note to Echols, believing that he had no right or title thereto. It is then alleged that Marvin West had succeeded William C. Preston as guardian of the minor Harry Preston. That Echols is threatening to proceed by foreclosure to collect the two notes, and that West, the guardian, is demanding of complainant the payment of the note, with interest thereon, and that complainant is ready, able, and willing to pay and discharge the debt as soon as it can be ascertained to whom it is payable. The notes and mortgages are made exhibits, and both Echols and West answered; each setting up their respective claims. Upon the pleadings and proof and the testimony noted, chancellor held and decreed that the sale by Preston of the note passed no interest to his transferees, and that the title to said notes and mortgages remained in the guardian, and directed the surrender and delivery of the notes and mortgages to the guardian.

Oscoda Kyle for appellant.

Callahan & Harris and West & Lynne for appellee.

[151] DEGRAFFENRIED, J.—In the case of Mason v. Buchanan, 62 Ala. 110, this court, through Brickell, C. J., speaking of the authority of a guardian over the choses in action of his ward, said: "As to these, he may exercise the power which an executor or an administrator may exercise over choses in action coming into his hands for administration. A want of diligence in the exercise of the power will render him liable, but third persons, dealing with him in good faith, are not the guarantors of his prudence; they answer only for their [162] own fair dealing." While much was said by this court in that case which was unnecessary to a determination of the question then before the court, we take it that the quoted excerpt from the opinion is but a statement of the common-law rule on the subject, and it is a familiar proposition that statutes are not to be held to abolish a well-established rule of the common law unless it plainly appears that it was the legislative purpose to abolish the common-law rule. Cook v. Meyer, 78 Ala. 580.

In the case of Butler v. Gazzam, 81 Ala. 493, 1 So. 17, this court said: "Our past decisions sustain the rule that the executor or administrator has the full legal title to all choses in action due the estate of the decedent, and that he may, in the absence of fraud or collusion, release, compound, or discharge them as fully as if he were the absolute owner, being answerable only for any improvidence in the exercise of the power." This quoted rule was approved by this court in Logan v. Central Iron, etc. Co., 139 Ala. 548, 36 So. 729, and we take it that the quoted rule clearly indicates that an administrator certainly before the adoption of the Code of 1907, may sell, without an order of the court, at his peril and the peril of his bondsmen, the choses in action of the estate of his intestate. If, then, this court, in Mason v. Buchanan, supra, was correct in its statement of the law that a guardian may exercise the power which an executor or administrator might exercise, as above stated, over the choses in action of his intestate, then it would follow, as a necessary conclusion, that a guardian, without an order of court, may, at his peril and at the peril of his bondsmen, sell the choses in action of his ward. Schmidt v. Shaver, 196 Ill. 108, 63 N. E. 655, 89 Am. St. Rep. 250.

In a note by Mr. Freeman to the above case of [153] Schmidt v. Shaver, which note is to be found in 89 Am. St. Rep. 281, we find the following:

"(1) General Rule.—Except in South Carolina, the right of a guardian, in the absence of a statute, to dispose of the personal property of his ward is well settled. As is said in Wallace v. Holmes, 9 Blatchf. 65, 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 37, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,100: 'His duty to pay debts and to provide for the support, maintenance, and education of the ward, and generally to manage the estate, . . . all imply the power of the guardian in this respect. In this management, he is under a rigid responsibility, not only for the property, but for its management and disposal for the best interests of the ward.' It is therefore the rule, supported by the great weight of authority, that a guardian may, without application to, or an order of court, sell the personal property of his ward. Woodward v. Donally, 27 Ala. 198; Lee v. Lee, 55 Ala. 590; Mason v. Buchanan, 62 Ala. 110; McConnell v. Hodson, 2 Gilman (Ill.) 640; Schmidt v. Shaver (principal case), 196 Ill. 108, 63 N. E. 655, 89 Am. St. Rep. 250; Schmidt v. McBean, 98 Ill. App. 421; Humphrey v. Buisson, 49 Minn. 221; Field v. Schieffelin, 7 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 150, 11 Am. Dec. 441; Thomas v. Bennett, 56 Barb. (N. Y.) 197; Tuttle v. Heavy, 59 Barb. (N. Y.) 334; Truss v. Old, 6 Rand. (Va.) 556, 18 Am. Dec. 748; Virginia Bank v. Craig, 6 Leigh (Va.) 399; MacLay v. Equitable L. Assur. Soc. 152 U. S. 499, 14 S. Ct. 678, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 528; Mullen v. Wine, 26 Fed. 206; Wallace v. Holmes, 9 Blatchf. 65, 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 37, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,100. A guardian may therefore dispose of his ward's interest in a patent right (Wallace v. Holmes, 9 Blatchf. 65, 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 37, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,100), a right to locate public land as a homestead (Mullen v. Wine, 26 Fed. 206), or a judgment in favor of his ward (Schmidt v. Shaver [principal case], 196 Ill. 108, 63 N. E. 655, 89 Am. St. Rep. 250).

[154] "(2) Assignment of Choses in Action.—The most frequent exercise of this right is, however, in the sale and assignment of promissory notes or other choses in action, in the larger number of cases secured by mortgage. The right of the guardian to assign is in such case undoubtedly (McConnell v. Hodson, 2 Gilman (Ill.) 640; Humphrey v. Buisson, 49 Minn. 221; Tuttle v. Heavy, 59 Barb. (N. Y.) 334; Field v. Schieffelin, 7 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 150, 11 Am. Dec. 441; Fletcher v. Fletcher, 29 Vt. 98), especially where the choses in action are made payable to the guardian (Gentry v. Owen, 14 Ark. 396, 60 Am. Dec. 549; Fountain v. Anderson, 33 Ga. 372; Jenkins v. Sherman, 77 Miss. 884, 28 So. 726; Gillespie v. Crawford (Tex.) 42 S. W. 621), or if shares of stock stand in his name (Atkinson v. Atkinson, 8 Allen (Mass.) 15; Virginia Bank v. Craig, 6 Leigh (Va.) 399)."

It will be noticed that in the above note the case of Mason v. Buchanan is cited by the learned annotator as sustaining the position assumed by him, and we think that, certainly in so far as the sale of choses in action is concerned, the case sustains the conclusions of the annotator.

It would seem, therefore, that in this state a guardian may sell the choses in action of his ward at his peril and at the peril of his bondsmen without an order of court.

The decree of the chancellor is not in accordance with the above views, and the decree is therefore reversed, and a decree is here rendered granting to appellant the relief prayed for in his cross-bill.

Reversed and rendered.

West Virginia.—Buskirk v. Sanders, 70 W. Va. 363, 78 S. E. 937.

In Wallace v. Holmes, 9 Blatchf. 65, 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 37, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,100, the court said: "It is not doubtful, that a guardian of the person and estate of an infant, appointed by the court of probate, has, as incidental to his office and duties, the power to sell personal property of his ward. His duty to pay debts, and to provide for the support, maintenance, and education of the ward, and, generally, to manage the estate, and his trust, indicated and expressed in the bond he is required to give, conditioned to manage, dispose of, and apply the same, and to account for all property and the proceeds thereof, all imply the power of the guardian in this respect. In this management, he is under a rigid responsibility, not only for the property but for its management and disposal for the best interest of the ward."

The rule has been applied to permit the sale of promissory notes whether payable to the ward or to the guardian. Gentry v. Owen, 14 Ark. 396, 60 Am. Dec. 549 (payable to guardian); Fountain v. Anderson, 33 Ga. 372 (payable to guardian); McConnell v. Hodson, 2 Gilman (Ill.) 640; Humphrey v. Buisson, 19 Minn. 221; Jenkins v. Sherman, 77 Miss. 884, 28 So. 726 (payable to guardian); Fletcher v. Fletcher, 29 Vt. 98 (payable to ward or bearer and transferred to a person for collection for benefit of ward's estate). See also Brewster v. Seeger, 173 Mass. 281; 63 N. E. 614 (payable to guardian). And see the reported case.

So it has been held that a guardian may sell a bond and mortgage, Tuttle v. Heavy, 59 Barb. (N. Y.) 334; Field v. Schieffelin, 7 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 150, 11 Am. Dec. 441; Tonges v. Vanderveer Canarsie Imp. Syndicate, 148 N. Y. S. 748; Hunter v. Lawrence, 11 Gratt. (Va.) 111, 62 Am. Dec. 640; a right to make a homestead entry, Mullen v. Wine, 26 Fed. 206, appeal dismissed 736 U. S. 654, 10 S. Ct. 1076, 34 U. S. (L. ed.) 553; Pardoe v. Merritt, 75 Minn. 12, 77 N. W. 552; see also Cox v. Manvel, 56 Minn. 358, 57 N. W. 1062; shares of stock, Lamar v. Mcoun, 112 U. S. 452, 5 S. Ct. 221, 28 U. S. (L. ed.) 751; Ellis v. Essex, Merrimac Bridge, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 243; Cable v. Cable, 111 App. Div. 426, 97 N. Y. S. 773; Virginia Bank v. Craig, 6 Leigh (Va.) 397; an interest in a patent right, Wallace v. Holmes, 9 Blatchf. 65, 6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 37, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,100; and an interest as beneficiary in a policy of life insurance, Clare v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 201 N. Y. 492, 94 N. E. 1075, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) affirming 1123, 128 App. Div. 908, 112 N. Y. S. 1124. See also Pratt v. Globe Mut. L. Ins. Co. (Tenn.) 17 S. W. 382.

In Field v. Schieffelin, 7 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 150, 11 Am. Dec. 441, the court said: "The bond and mortgage which the plaintiff claims, were taken by William James Stewart, in his character of guardian of the person and estate of Hopkins, the infant, and to which trust he had been duly appointed by this court. That he had a legal control over that bond and mortgage, and a right to collect and receive the money due thereon, and a legal right to sell and assign the same, in the due exercise of his discretion as guardian, is a proposition that does not seem to admit of dispute. The bond was not due when it was assigned to the plaintiff; but if the money was wanting for the purposes of the trust, either for discharging incumbrances, or for making more advantageous investments, or for payments of debts, and for the better maintenance and education of the ward, or for any purpose whatever, connected with the faithful discharge of the trust, and beneficial to the infant, the guardian had just right and lawful authority to raise the money by the assignment of the bond and mortgage. The necessity or expediency of the measure rested entirely in the judgment and discretion of the guardian."

In Schmidt v. Shaver, 196 Ill. 108, 63 N. E. 655, 89 Am. St. Rep. 250, wherein it appeared that a guardian sold a judgment in the sum of five thousand dollars, which had been recovered on behalf of his ward, it was said by the court that as the sale of the judgment was not within the terms of any statute, the guardian undoubtedly had a right to dispose of it at its face value, and might also, as in the case at bar, sell it for a lower price when authorized to do so by the court. And in Black v. Keenan, 5 Dana (Ky.) 570, wherein an executor was prevented from buying an infant's legacy from a guardian at a low price, the court said: "It is, at least, extremely doubtful whether the guardian had any right to sell the infant's legacy before it was due, and when the time at which it would be payable was uncertain, and its value for this and other reasons incapable of exact estimate. It is certain that the executor has no right to make personal profit by such a traffic. The transaction in this case, if regarded as a sale of the legacy, is the more obnoxious to jealousy and suspicion, because all of the circumstances on which any probable estimate of its value could be made, were more within the knowledge of the executor than of the guardian."

In Cox v. Manvel, 56 Minn. 358, 57 N. W. 1062, it was held that although a guardian might have the right, in the absence of an order of the court, to dispose of the personal property of his ward, yet where it appeared that the court had made an order with regard to a specific piece of personalty which belonged to the ward, the guardian was controlled by that order and could not pass a valid title in defiance thereof.

STATUTORY REQUIREMENTS.

In some jurisdictions it is expressly provided by statute that a guardian must obtain an order from a court authorizing him to sell his ward's personalty before he can lawfully dispose of it. Kendall v. Miller, 9 Cal. 591; De La Montagnie v. Union Ins. Co. 42 Cal. 290; Baltimore v. Norman, 4 Md. 352; Gentry v. Bearss, 82 Neb. 787, 118 N. W. 1077 (construing Oklahoma statute); Washabaugh v. Hall, 4 S. D. 168, 56 N. W. 82; Browne v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 98 Tex. 55, 80 S. W. 593 (modifying judgment Brown v. Fidelity, etc. Co. (Tex.) 76 S. W. 944). Gillespie v. Crawford (Tex.) 42 S. W. 621. See also Schmidt v. Wieland, 35 Cal. 343.

In Canada a tutor is prohibited from disposing of his minor's shares in a joint stock company without the authority of a judge or prothonotary. Raphael v. McFarlane, 18 Can. Sup. Ct. 183.

In Harrison v. Ilgner, 74 Tex. 86, 11 S. W. 1064, it was held that a sale by a guardian of his ward's personal estate must be confirmed by the court in addition to being ordered by it, before the sale will be valid.

In Iowa a statute provides that "guardians of the property of minors must prosecute and defend for their wards," and "must also, in other respects, manage their interests under the direction of the court," and that "they may thus lease their lands or loan their money during their minority, and may do all other acts which the court may deem for the benefit of the wards." It has been held that this statute modifies the common-law rule as to the power of a guardian over the property of his ward and that an order of the court must precede the sale of the ward's personality. Bates v. Dunham, 58 Ia. 308, 12 N. W. 309; Slusher v. Hammond, 94 Ia. 512, 63 N. W. 185; McCutchen v. Roush, 139 Ia. 351, 115 N. W. 903.

A Nebraska statute provides that "the courts of probate in their respective counties, on the application of a guardian, or of any person interested in the estate of any ward, after such notice to all persons interested therein as the court shall direct, may authorize or require the guardian to sell and transfer any stock in public funds, or in any bank or corporation, or any other personal estate or effects held by him as guardian, and to invest the proceeds of such sale, and also any other moneys in his hands, in real estate, or in any other manner that shall be most for the interest of all concerned therein, and the said court may make such further orders and give such directions as the case may require for managing, investing, and disposing of the estate and effects in the hands of the guardian." Under that act it has been held that a sale or transfer of the personal property of a ward must be by authorization of the court. Hendrix v. Richards, 57 Neb. 794, 78 N. W. 378; In re O'Brien, 80 Neb. 125, 113 N. W. 1001.

In Merchants, etc. Sav. Bank Co. v. Schirk, 27 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 125, wherein a Missouri statute was construed, it was held that an act which provided that "when it shall appear that it would be for the benefit of the ward that his real estate, or any part thereof, be sold or leased, or his personal property, or any part thereof, be sold . . . the probate court may authorize and color such sale" and that the court may "after a full examination . . . make an appropriate order for such sale," etc., gave a guardian no power to sell his ward's personal estate without an order of court.

Where statutes give a guardian the power to sell his ward's personal estate only "when for the interest of the ward," it has been held that one who buys promissory notes from a guardian at less than their face value without inquiring whether by the sale thereof the interests of the ward will be promoted or sacrificed, and with knowledge that they belong to a trust fund, gets no title to them and therefore holds the notes in trust for the ward. Strong v. Strauss, 40 Ohio St. 87, reversing Strong v. Hope, 7 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 700, 4 Ohio L. Bul. 1034. Compare Engel v. Ortman, 3 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 237, 3 Wkly. L. Gaz. 53.

Power to Sell Denied.

It has been held in South Carolina that a guardian has no power to dispose of the personal estate of his ward and that, if he does so, the purchaser gets only a voidable title to the property. Bailey v. Patterson, 3 Rich. Eq. 156; Moore v. Hood, 9 Rich. Eq. 311, 70 Am. Dec. 210; McDuffie v. McIntyre, 11 S. C. 551, 32 Am. Rep. 690. In McDuffie v. McIntyre, supra, the court said: "The cases of Bailey v. Patterson, 3 Rich. Eq. 156, and Moore v. Hood, 9 Rich. Eq. 311, are conclusive on the point that a guardian has no legal title to the personal property of his ward, and that a sale by him is voidable at the option of the infant, when he comes of age. In the former the purchaser was made to deliver up the property, while in the latter case the court said: 'It is not intended to be intimated that the purchaser in this case could not have been successfully pursued if he and the slaves had been found within the jurisdiction.' Page 327. The appellants only ask against the purchaser the proceeds of the judgment of foreclosure. They are entitled to that relief. The bond and mortgage have been held by the purchaser in trust for them, and must now be turned over to them as the legal owners. The remedy for the purchaser, if he has any, is against the guardian."

In Woodbridge v. Pope, 22 La. Ann. 293, the court said: "The general rule is, that persons acting in a fiduciary capacity, such as ayadics, executors, tutors, etc., have no right to transfer, by indorsement, the promissory notes, bills and other paper held by them in their representative capacity, except under an order of court, and, in the case of tutors, with the advice of a family meeting. But this, like other general rules, is not without its exceptions. Thus it has been held that such a transfer is not an absolute nullity, and if the transfer be made in the interest of the party, in whose favor the restriction or rule is made and this fact be proved by the transferee, the bona fide ownership is established, and the holder may recover on the note." And see Pertuit v. Damare, 50 La. Ann. 893, 24 So. 681.

It was held in Michael v. Fripp, L. R. 7 Eq. (Eng.) 95, 19 L. T. N. S. 257, 17 W. R. 23, that without express provisions in a shipping act empowering him to do so, a guardian had no authority to sell or mortgage his ward's ship.

PARKER-WASHINGTON COMPANY

v.

CITY OF CHICAGO.

Illinois Supreme Court—February 17, 1915.

267 Ill. 136; 107 N. E. 872.

Contracts — Freedom of Contract — Intent of Parties Controls.

Parties competent to contract, and free to do so may, in the exercise of their judgment, make their own contracts; and when their intention is ascertained, it is ordinarily the duty of the courts to carry it out, if not in conflict with any rule of law, good morals, or public policy.

Damages — Contracts Liquidating Damages.

Contracts by which parties, who are under no compulsion, agree beforehand upon the amount of damages which shall be allowed for a breach, are as lawful as any others, unless inhibited by some rule of law.

Penalty or Liquidated Damages.

Where the intention of the parties to a contract is in doubt, the courts are inclined to construe a sum stipulated for in case of breach as a penalty, since the general theory of the law is that compensation shall be the rule, and the application of that rule works justice between the parties.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In determining whether a stipulated sum to be paid for the breach of a contract was intended to be a penalty or liquidated damages, the language used and the subject matter of the contract will be considered to ascertain the intention of the parties, and generally the language used will control; but the use of the word "liquidated" is not always controlling.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

If a provision in a contract fixing a stipulated sum in case of breach has reference to uncertain damages, and it appears that serious damage might have been incurred, and no fraud has been used in procuring the contract, the courts cannot interfere, and the stipulated sum furnishes the measure of damages.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where different acts to be performed under a contract are of unequal degrees of importance, some resulting in great damage, and others in trifling and inconsiderable loss, a stipulated sum in gross, to be paid for a failure to perform any one of the acts, will be construed as a penalty.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A stipulation in a contract with a city for the construction of a pumping station for pumping water to be distributed to certain parts of the city for the use of the inhabitants and for protection against fire, for the payment of $50 for each day that completion was delayed beyond a time fixed, is a stipulation for liquidated damages, and not for a penalty, as the contract was made for the purpose of preserving the health and promoting the convenience and welfare of citizens, and protecting them and their property, and there can be no estimate of the damages, or compensation for the inconvenience to the public, especially where the contract recites that the damages from such delay cannot be calculated with any degree of certainty.

Ann. Cas. 1916C.—22.

[See note at end of this case.]

Liquidated Damages — Defenses to Recovery — Delay in Other Work.

Under a contract for the construction of a pumping station for a city, providing for the payment of $50 for each day that the completion of the contract was delayed as liquidated damages, such damages are recoverable, though the pumping station was designed to bring water through a tunnel which was not completed until after the completion of the pumping station; the contracts for the construction of the tunnel having provided for its completion nine months before the time fixed for completion of the pumping station.

Error to Branch "D" Appellate Court, First District.

Action by Parker-Washington Company, plaintiff, against City of Chicago, defendant. Judgment for defendant in Municipal Court of Chicago: COTTRELL, Judge. Judgment affirmed by Appellate Court. Plaintiff brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Olsen & Boord and Clarence N. Boord for plaintiff in error.

William H. Sexton, George L. Reker and Max M. Korshak for defendant in error.

[137] CARTWRIGHT, C. J.—On September 10, 1909, the Parker-Washington Company, plaintiff in error, entered into a contract by which it agreed to construct for the city of Chicago, defendant in error, the foundations of a boiler room, auxiliary buildings and chimney of a pumping station at One Hundred and Fourth street and Stewart avenue, in the city of Chicago, and to complete the same by December 22, 1909. The work was not completed until March 5, 1910, seventy-three days after the date fixed for its completion. The contract contained the following provision: "It is distinctly understood and agreed by the parties hereto that the work to be performed hereunder shall be completed within the time hereinabove fixed for its completion. Inasmuch as failure to complete the same within the time herein fixed will work an injury to the city of Chicago, and as damages arising from such failure cannot be calculated with any degree of certainty, it is hereby agreed that if such work is not fully [138] completed within the time fixed herein there shall be deducted from the contract price and retained by said city, as its ascertained and liquidated damages, the sum of fifty dollars ($50) for each and every day passing after the date fixed for the completion, until said work is fully completed as specified." When the work was completed the defendant in error retained the stipulated sum of $50 a day for the seventy-three days as liquidated damages and the remainder of the contract price was paid. The plaintiff in error brought suit in the municipal court of Chicago for the sum so retained and also for a balance due on another contract. The court tried the case without a jury and found in favor of the plaintiff for a balance due on the other contract, but found against the plaintiff on this contract on the ground that the defendant was justified in retaining $3050 as liquidated damages. Judgment was entered accordingly, and the plaintiff appealed to the Appellate Court for the First District and assigned as error the holdings of the municipal court on propositions of law and the refusal to allow the full sum claimed on both contracts. The Appellate Court affirmed the judgment, and a writ of certiorari was awarded to bring the record to this court for review.

The law permits parties competent to contract and free to do so, in the exercise of their judgment, to make their own contracts, and the proper function of courts is to enforce such contracts as made, where they do not conflict with any rule of law or good morals or the declared public policy of the State. When the intention of the parties to a contract is ascertained it is ordinarily the duty of the courts to carry it out (U. S. v. Bethlehem Steel Co. 205 U. S. 105, 27 S. Ct. 450, 51 U. S. (L. ed.) 731), and they cannot properly assume a guardianship over those who have the requisite capacity and are free to make such contracts as they may choose. Contracts by which parties who are under no compulsion agree beforehand upon the amount of damages which shall be allowed for a breach are as lawful as any others unless they [139] are inhibited by some rule of law. There is a class of contracts in which stipulations for liquidated damages are not permitted because the law has fixed a definite standard for such damages and an agreement to pay more is necessarily in violation of the law. Those are cases where there is an agreement to pay a certain sum of money, or in default to pay a sum exceeding the lawful rate of interest, as liquidated damages. (Tiernan v. Hinman, 16 Ill. 400; 13 Cyc. 101.) That rule was alluded to in Peine v. Weber, 47 Ill. 41; and in the case of Scotfield v. Tompkins, 95 Ill. 190, 35 Am. Rep. 160, where the agreement was held to be for a penalty and not liquidated damages, the contract was to pay $22,770 as the price of land, and also as liquidated damages in case the sum was not promptly paid. Where the agreement does not interfere with any rule of law the intention of the parties, as in all other cases, must govern. Where the intention of the parties is in doubt the courts are inclined to construe the stipulated sum as a penalty, because the theory of the law generally is that compensation shall be the rule and the application of that rule works justice between the parties. (Iroquois Furnace Co. v. Wilkin Mfg. Co. 181 Ill. 582, 54 N. E. 987.) In order to determine whether a stipulated sum to be paid for the breach of a contract was intended to be a penalty or liquidated damages, the court will consider the language used and the subject matter of the contract to ascertain the intention of the parties. The use of the word "liquidated" does not always determine the question, and in the case of Iroquois Furnace Co. v. Wilkin Mfg. Co. supra, the fact that the supplemental contract recited that the purchaser was desirous that the contract should contain a penalty in the nature of stipulated damages was given weight. With respect to the subject matter of the contract, if the provision has reference to uncertain damages and the case shows that serious damage might have been incurred, and no fraud has been used in procuring the contract, the courts cannot interfere and the stipulated sum furnishes the full [140] measure. Generally, the language in which the parties have expressed their intention will control. One matter to be considered is the question whether different acts to be performed are of unequal degrees of importance, some resulting in great damage and others in trifling and inconsiderable loss. In such a case, if a stipulated sum in gross is to be paid for a failure to perform any one of the acts the sum will be construed as a penalty, because it cannot be presumed that the parties intended to satisfy a breach of either condition by the same stipulated sum. (19 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 40; 13 Cyc. 101.) That doctrine does not apply to this case, for the reason that the sum agreed upon as liquidated damages related to the completion of the entire work. Where the damages that will result from a failure to perform the contract are of such a nature that they can not be definitely ascertained or proved and the parties have stipulated a sum as liquidated damages, there is no reasonable ground for saying that the parties did not intend to fix and define the amount of damages and their agreement will be upheld. These rules are to be gathered from the following decisions: Peine v. Weber, supra; Poppers v. Meagher, 148 Ill. 192, 35 N. E. 806; Gobble v. Linder, 76 Ill. 157; Hennessy v. Metzger, 152 Ill. 505, 38 N. E. 1058, 43 Am. St. Rep. 267; Westfall v. Albert, 212 Ill. 68, 72 N. E. 4; Pinkney v. Weaver, 216 Ill. 185, 74 N. E. 714; Western Gas Constr. Co. v. Dowagiac Gas, etc. Co. 146 Mich. 119, 10 Ann. Cas. 224, 109 N. W. 29.

We do not see how there can be any doubt as to the meaning of the parties as expressed in this contract, inasmuch as they specified that the failure to complete the work would work an injury to the city and the damages arising from the failure could not be calculated with any degree of certainty, which brings the case exactly within the rule of law on the subject. Not only did they express the fact that the damages could not be calculated with any degree of certainty, but that was the truth. The construction contracted for was a part of a pumping station for pumping [141] water from Lake Michigan, to be distributed to the south and southwest parts of the city for the use of the inhabitants and for protection against fire. The city, in its corporate capacity, would suffer no damages by the failure to complete the work, but the citizens in whose behalf the contract was made would suffer damages which it would be practically impossible to prove. The contract was made by the city for the purpose of preserving the health and promoting the convenience and welfare of its citizens and protecting them and their property. (Brooks v. Wichita, 114 Fed. 207, 52 C. C. A. 209.) It is beyond question that there could be no estimate of damages or compensation for the inconvenience to the public or damage resulting from a failure to complete the contract as agreed (Harley v. Sanitary Dist. 226 Ill. 213, 80 N. E. 771) and if the parties did not intend that the stipulated sum should be liquidated damages they did not intend that any damages could be recovered, since none could be proved.

Counsel insist that the defendant could retain nothing as liquidated damages because contractors for other work did not complete their contracts, and the pumping station, therefore, could not be used before the plaintiff completed its work. The pumping station was designed to bring water through a tunnel from Lake Michigan, and the tunnel was divided into three sections and different contracts were let for the construction of the sections. By these contracts all the work was to be completed more than nine months before the time fixed for the completion of this contract, but the tunnel was not completed until after the work of the plaintiff had been finished. Neither the intention of the parties nor the construction of the contract can depend upon what happened afterward, which was not reasonably in contemplation when the contract was made. Cases where the actual damages suffered have been capable of ascertainment and could be considered by the parties do not apply to the situation here. It was intended that each contract [142] should be performed within the time agreed upon, and if there was a similar stipulation in every contract, the argument would lead to the conclusion that each one could say that nothing could be deducted from his contract price because someone else had not performed.

The contract was construed by the municipal court in accordance with the views we have expressed and the propositions of law held were in harmony with such views.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case discusses at length the various considerations which control in determining whether a stipulated forfeiture for breach of a contract is a penalty or liquidated damages. Applying the rules laid down, it is held that a provision for a forfeiture of fifty dollars for each day of delay in completing a municipal pumping station is recoverable as liquidated damages. The subject is fully treated in the notes to Stony Creek Lumber Co. v. Fields, 1 Ann. Cas. 242; Western Gas Constr. Co. v. Dowagiac Gas, etc. Co., 10 Ann. Cas. 224; Webster v. Bosanquet, Ann. Cas. 1912C 1019, and Stillwell v. Paepeke-Leicht Lumber Co. 108 Am. St. Rep. 42. For the application of the rules for determining the nature of the stipulation to a deposit by a tenant to secure the performance of the terms of the lease, see the note to Cunningham v. Stockton, 19 Ann. Cas. 212.

WILLARD ET AL.

HIGDON.

Maryland Court of Appeals—June 24, 1914.

123 Md. 447; 91 Atl. 577.

Landlord and Tenant — Estoppel to Deny Landlord's Title — Right to Crops.

Where on a conveyance of leased land the landlord's interest in a growing crop is reserved, the rule that a tenant cannot deny his landlord's title does not prevent the tenant from defending an action by the grantee for the value of such crop on the ground that it has been delivered to the grantor.

Statute of Frauds — Transfer of Growing Crop.

Growing crops, if fructus industriales, such as a crop of wheat, are chattels, and may be sold without complying with the requirements of the statute of frauds, especially in view of Uniform Sales Act (Code Pub. Civ. Laws, art. 83), § 97, providing that "goods" includes all chattels personal other than things in action or money, and that the term includes emblements; industrial growing crops, and things attached to or forming a part of the land which are agreed to be severed before sale or under the contract of sale.

Part Payment — Reservation of Part on Sale.

Within the provision of the Uniform Sales Act (Code Pub. Civ. Laws, art. 83) that a contract to sell or a sale of goods of the value of $50 or upward shall not be enforceable by action unless the buyer shall accept part of the goods and actually receive them or give something in earnest to bind the contract or in part payment, etc., if a reservation of a growing crop by a grantor amounts to a contract to sell or a sale, the grantor both accepts and receives the crop and gives something in part payment, where the crop is subsequently delivered to him by a tenant; the conveyance of the property constituting payment in full.

Effect of Statute — Oral Contract as Defense.

A party may rely upon an oral contract as a defense, though the contract could not be enforced on account of the statute of frauds, especially in view of the provision of the Uniform Sales Act (Code Pub. Civ. Laws, art. 83) that a contract to sell or a sale "shall not be enforceable" unless the buyer shall accept part of the goods and actually receive them, etc.

Parol Reservation of Growing Crop.

As a growing crop may be sold by parol, a parol reservation of such a crop upon a conveyance of land is valid, since a crop may be so dealt with as to make it personal property, and therefore does not necessarily pass with the land upon which it is growing.

[See note at end of this case.]

Harmless Error — Exclusion of Evidence — Effect of Verdict.

In an action by the grantee of leased premises against the tenant to recover the value of a growing crop delivered by the tenant to the grantor, defended on the ground that the crop was orally reserved by the grantor, where the jury finds for defendant, the exclusion of a question asked the grantee as to what steps he took to protect himself against the delivery of the crop is harmless.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Frederick county: UNTER, WORTHINGTON and PETER, Judges.

Action by Charles F. Willard et al. plaintiffs, against Henry W. Higdon, defendant.

Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Albert S. Brown, Charles McC. Mathias and Emory L. Ooblenz for appellant.

Milton G. Urner, John S. Newman and Benjamin F. Reich for appellee.

[448] BOYD, C. J.—The appellee rented a farm from David H. Roelkey from April 1st, 1910, to April 1st, 1911 by an agreement in writing which contained various provisions—amongst others that Mr. Roelkey was to have one-half of all the wheat, corn, oats, clover seed, timothy seed, rye and hay raised on the farm, which the appellee agreed to deliver to any point within five miles therefrom free of cost to Mr. Roelkey. On December 27th, 1910, Mr. Roelkey agreed to sell the farm to the appellants. At that time the following note was given to him:

[449] "Knoxville, Md., Dec. 27, 1910.

"Ninety days after date we jointly and severally promise to pay to David H. Roelkey five hundred dollars for value received as part payment of purchase of farm known as Locust Grove, containing 284 acres, more or less, except part reserved between two farms, of about two or three acres, more or less, purchase price to be $18,000.00."

That was signed by C. F. Willard, E. H. Willard and M. L. Willard. On the same day Mr. Roelkey gave the appellants a receipt as follows:

"Knoxville, Md., December 27th, 1910.

"Received of C. F. Willard, E. H. Willard and M. L. Willard five hundred dollars in form of note as forfeit on farm known as Forest Grove, price to be $18,000.

"$500. DAVID H. ROELKEY."

On March 25th, 1911, Roelkey and wife executed a deed to the appellants for two tracts of land described by courses and distances, which in the aggregate contained 284 acres, more or less, and it seems to be conceded that the land conveyed by the deed was the same intended to be sold as referred to in the note and receipt above. There is no such reservation in the deed, but Roelkey claims that at the time of the sale, it was agreed, distinctly but orally that he was to have the half of the wheat crop then growing, to which under the terms of the lease to the appellee he was entitled. The appellants deny that there was such an agreement and contend that there could be no binding reservation made by parol, as it would be in contradiction of the written agreement and of the deed. Roelkey claims that he positively refused to sell the farm for less than $18,000 and the reservation of the half of the wheat crop, and that when he insisted upon there being inserted in the agreement provisions that the appellee was to remain on the farm and that he reserved [450] the growing wheat crop, Charles F. Willard, who wrote the papers, said: "It is not worth while, it is not like strangers, we have been friends all our lives, we want only what is right." He had made a mistake in one of the papers which had to be written over again, and Roelkey claims that he again insisted upon those provisions being inserted, and said his son did not understand the omission, and Willard then turned to the son and, addressing him, said: "Dave, Mr. Higdon is to stay on there and your father reserves the growing wheat crop, is that plain enough to you?" Roelkey claims that the reservations were accordingly omitted at the instance of Willard.

The appellee delivered the half of the wheat to a mill for Roelkey, instead of delivering it to the appellants who notified him of their claim to it. The appellants sued him and at first simply had six of the usual common counts in the narr., but amended by adding a seventh count, "For money due for the use and occupation of the plaintiffs' lands in Frederick County, Maryland." The plaintiff finally abandoned all of the counts in the declaration except the seventh. There are twelve bills of exception containing rulings as to the admissibility of evidence, and the thirteenth embraces the prayers,—the plaintiffs having offered seven, all of which were rejected excepting the fourth, and the defendant three, the first and second of which were rejected and the third granted. The case resulted in a judgment for the defendant, and from that this appeal was taken.

As the important question in the case is whether there could be a valid reservation of the wheat crop by parol, notwithstanding the agreement of December 27th, 1910, and the deed in evidence, we will consider that question before referring to the exceptions and prayers separately. Before doing so, however, it will be well to say that we do not understand how the question whether a tenant can deny his landlord's title is involved in this case. That was argued at some length orally and in the brief of the appellants, but there can be no difficulty about the law on that subject. If it was [451] validly agreed between the appellants and Roelkey that the latter was to have the one-half of the wheat crop, it could hardly be contended that the appellee could not defend against this suit by reason of the fact that he is the tenant of the appellants. If, for example, the deed had contained such a reservation; the right of the appellee to defend on the ground that he had delivered the wheat in pursuance of that reservation could not have been questioned, and therefore we say that the important question is whether there was a valid reservation of the wheat crop.

It cannot be doubted that in this State growing crops, if fructus industriales, such as a crop of wheat, are regarded as chattels and can be sold without complying with the requirements of section 4 of the Statute of Frauds (29 Charles II, Ch. 3). Purner v. Piercy, 40 Md. 212, 17 Am. Rep. 591; Wilson v. Fowler, 88 Md. 601, 42 Atl. 201, 71 Am. St. Rep. 452, 42 L.R.A. 849. In this State even a sale of growing trees to be presently cut and removed by the vendee is not within the operation of that section. Smith v. Bryan, 5 Md. 141, 59 Am. Dec. 104; Leonard v. Medford, 85 Md. 666, 37 Atl. 365, 37 L.R.A. 449. If prior to the passage of the Uniform Sales Act of 1910 (Ch. 346, p. 272) there could have been any doubt about growing crops being chattels, that statute dispels it. In section 97 of Article 83, it is declared that, "Goods include all chattels personal other than things in action or money. The term includes emblements, industrial growing crops, and things attached to or forming a part of the land which are agreed to be severed before sale or under the contract of sale." As that act took effect June 1st, 1910, it is applicable to this agreement, which was made December 27, 1910.

Under the decisions in Bichelberger v. McCauley, 5 Har. & J. (Md.) 213, 9 Am. Dec. 514, and Rentch v. Long, 27 Md. 188, a sale of a crop not yet thrashed, shucked or gathered was not within the 17th section of Statute of Frauds (29 Charles II, Ch. 3), because work and labor being necessary to prepare it for delivery, it was not a sale of goods, wares and merchandise within the meaning of that section, but that has been changed by the Uniform Sales Act, which reads as follows:

[452] (1) "A contract to sell or a sale of any goods or choses in action of the value of fifty dollars or upward shall not be enforceable by action unless the buyer shall accept part of the goods or choses in action, so contracted to be sold, or sold and actually receive the same, or give something in earnest to bind the contract, or in part payment, or unless some note or memorandum in writing of the contract or sale be signed by the party to be charged or his agent in that behalf.

(2) "The provisions of this section apply to every such contract or sale, notwithstanding that the goods may be intended to be delivered at some future time, or may not at the time of such contract or sale be actually made, procured or provided, or fit or ready for delivery, or some act may be requisite for the making or completing thereof, or rendering the same fit for delivery; but if the goods are to be manufactured by the seller especially for the buyer and are not suitable for sale to others in the ordinary course of the seller's business, the provisions of this section shall not apply.

(3) "There is an acceptance of goods within the meaning of this section when the buyer, either before or after delivery of the goods expressed by words or conduct his assent to becoming the owner of those specific goods."

Although sub-section (2) has changed the rule announced by our predecessors, if the alleged agreement as to the crop between the appellants and Mr. Roelkey can be said to amount to a contract to sell or a sale, then the latter is the buyer, and the further question arises as to whether he had done any of the things which are a compliance with the statute. That must be answered in the affirmative, as Roelkey did actually accept and receive the wheat and he did give something in part payment—indeed in payment in full—as he conveyed the property for which the consideration was the $18,000.00 and the reservation of the wheat crop, if his contention in that respect be correct. Moreover, section 25 says that a contract to sell or a sale, shall "not be enforceable by action, unless," etc. Under our decisions a party may defend although the contract cannot be enforced on account of the [453] statute of frauds. Crane v. Gough, 4 Md. 333; Webster v. LeCompte, 74 Md. 258, 22 Atl. 233; see also 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 818, 822.

We must therefore consider the question of the validity of a reservation by parol, with the understanding that a growing wheat crop may be treated as a chattel and that the statute of frauds does not stand in the way of the defense in this case of such a reservation. The authorities are not uniform on the subject, but inasmuch as the growing crop can be treated as a chattel, and the owner of the land can undoubtedly sell it as such, we are of the opinion that it is more reasonable and more in accord with the spirit of the decisions in this State to hold that such a crop can be reserved by parol. Of course if a third party deals with the vendee of the real estate, without knowledge of the reservation, another question might arise, but as between the vendor and vendee it seems to us to be more logical to hold that such a crop can be reserved by parol, without infringing upon the rule that the terms of a written instrument or a deed cannot be varied by parol, although there are many decisions to the contrary in other jurisdictions.

In 2 Devlin on the Law of Real Property and Deeds, section 980C, it is said: "On the ground that parol evidence is inadmissible to contradict or alter the terms of a written instrument, the rule announced in many cases is that it cannot be shown by parol that the grantor reserved the growing crops upon the land conveyed. But in a number of cases a contrary rule is announced. In the first class of cases it is said that to admit the reservation, by parol, of growing crops would be in direct conflict with the rule forbidding the introduction of parol evidence to vary the terms of a written instrument. In the other class it is said that the allowance of a parol reservation of a growing crop is not to contradict the deed, but to show what, in some instances, would pass with the land as a part of the realty has, by the agreement of the parties, been transformed into personality." The case [454] of Grabow v. McCracken, 23 Okla. 612, 102 Pac. 84, is annotated in 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1218, and also in 18 Ann. Cas. 503, and in both of those volumes many authorities are cited in the notes. In that case it was held that a matured crop of corn and wheat standing ungathered upon a tract of land may be specifically reserved by parol in the sale of the land as a part of the contract price or consideration of the deed. The Court cited a large number of cases in which it had been permitted to prove by parol that there was a consideration in addition to the one mentioned in the deed, as that was not contrary to the general doctrine that parol evidence could not be admitted in contradiction of or to vary a written instrument or deed.

In the notes referred to, cases on both sides of the question are cited; among those holding that the vendor may avail himself of a parol exception of growing crops, and that parol evidence is admissible to show that a crop growing on the land was excepted from the operation of the deed, are Heavilon v. Heavilon, 29 Ind. 509; Harvey v. Million, 67 Ind. 90; Benner v. Bragg, 68 Ind. 338; Hisey v. Troutman, 84 Ind. 115; Bourne v. Bourne, 92 Ky. 211, 17 S. W. 443; Flynt v. Conrad, 61 N. C. 190, 93 Am. Dec. 588; Walton v. Jordan, 65 N. C. 170; Baker v. Jordan, 3 Ohio St. 438; Youmans v. Caldwell, 4 Ohio St. 72; Backenstoss v. Stahler, 33 Pa. St. 251, 75 Am. Dec. 592; Harbold v. Kuster, 44 Pa. St. 392; Kerr v. Hill, 27 W. Va. 576. Without now quoting from any of these cases, we are of the opinion that they sustain the position apparently adopted by the lower Court that in this State a reservation of a wheat crop can be validly reserved by the parol agreement of the parties, and the fact that the deed does not include the reservation does not defeat it. There can be no doubt that under our law this wheat crop could be treated by the parties as personal property and if they did agree that it should be reserved by the vendor when he executed the deed it is manifest that it was not intended to convey it.

[455] While Roelkey was the owner of the reversion he could undoubtedly have sold his interest in the growing crop of wheat by parol, and after the appellants became such owners they could have sold the landlord's interest in the crop, if it was not reserved by Roelkey. As then it is permissible for a vendor to sell such a crop by parol before he conveys the land and as the vendee can sell it, if still his, by parol after he becomes the owner of the land, it seems to us to be illogical to hold that although before executing the deed the vendor and vendee agreed that it should be reserved to the vendor, yet because it was not reserved in the deed itself the execution and delivery of the deed operate to so reattach this chattel to the real estate as to make it realty, and not personality, and thereby convey to the grantee what was expressly and at the time validly agreed should not go to the grantee. An interest in a growing crop is of a temporary character, and it uselessly burdens a deed in fee simple to insert such a reservation in it. If a growing crop would necessarily pass by a deed of real estate, regardless of what had been done with reference to it before the deed was made, that would be a good reason for requiring it to be reserved when the deed for the real estate is executed, but as the sale of a growing crop such as this is not the sale of an interest in land but of a chattel, and is now so declared by statute, a deed for the land does not necessarily convey the crop. If Roelkey had sold his interest in this wheat crop to the appellee, or to some other third person, and the appellants knew it, could it be pretended that they could nevertheless in an action for use and occupation recover from the appellee one-half of the value of the wheat simply because the deed did not reserve it? Certainly not, and why then can they recover it, if they agreed that it should be paid to Roelkey? If the appellee had a valid lease, of which the appellants had notice, could they eject him because there was no reservation in the deed in favor of his lease? A tenant may have property so attached to the land as to appear to be a part of the realty, but if it [456] was such property as a tenant has the right to remove, there can be no doubt of his right to prove that it was his, and remove it—notwithstanding a deed had been made which made no such reservation. The case of Baker v. Jordan, 3 Ohio St. 438, is so well reasoned out and in our judgment announces such a wise and correct rule, that we will quote at some length from it. It concludes as follows: "A deed purports to convey the realty. But what is the realty? Growing corn may be part of it, for some purposes, but it is generally to be considered as personality. If the parties to a deed either by words or their behavior signify their understanding that as between them it is personality, the law will so regard it, and will respect their intention in the construction of the deed. When the evidence of such understanding is produced, it is not to contradict the deed, for with that it is perfectly consistent; but it is to show that what in some instances would go with the lands as part of the realty, was, in that case, converted into personality by the will of the parties, and thus to hold the deed to its true meaning and effect."

Without deeming it necessary to determine whether under our decisions it could be shown that the reservation of the wheat crop was a part of the consideration for the deed, and therefore parol evidence was admissible on that ground, we are satisfied to base our conclusion on the ground announced in Baker v. Jordan, supra, and other cases adopting the same view. We understand the position taken by such cases in effect to be, that a conveyance of land may or may not have been intended by the parties to include growing crops, such as wheat, corn, etc., and hence that such a crop does not necessarily pass by a deed for the land, but on the contrary if before the conveyance it has been by the action or agreement of the parties converted into personality, parol evidence is admissible to prove that fact. That is so for the obvious reason that when a deed for real estate is made, it does not convey personal property on or in the land, and if a crop [457] has been so dealt with by the parties before the execution and delivery of the deed as to make it personal property, the parties did not intend the crop to pass with the land. In other words the crop is not included in the sale of the land, and if it be not permitted to prove the previous dealings of the parties the deed would convey what was not sold. A growing crop of wheat is not such a character of property under our decisions, or under our statutes, as to necessarily pass with the land in which it is growing, in the absence of a reservation in the deed of conveyance.

We therefore hold that it was permissible to submit to the jury the question whether it was agreed between the appellants and Roelkey before the sale was consummated that the latter should have the growing crop of wheat, and that if they so found (as they did) this action could not be maintained against the appellee.

We will briefly refer to the exceptions. The first and second are not pressed. The third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth and tenth were to the admission of testimony in reference to the parol agreement about the wheat crop. From what we have said it will be seen that such testimony was admissible. The eleventh was to the action of the Court in sustaining an objection to a question asked Charles F. Willard: "What steps did you take to protect yourself against the delivery of the wheat?" We do not understand how that ruling could have injured the appellants, in view of our conclusion on the main question. There was no error in the twelfth exception. Without discussing the prayers separately, we are of opinion that the plaintiff's fourth and the defendant's third, which were granted, were sufficient to fairly present to the jury the real question involved in the case, and we will affirm the judgment.

Judgment affirmed, the appellants to pay the costs.

NOTE.

Validity of Parol Preservation of Crops by Vendor of Land.

The reported case seems to be the only recent decision involving the validity of a parol reservation of crops by a vendor of land. The authorities are not uniform on the subject, and in holding that the vendor of land may avail himself of a parol reservation of growing crops, and that parol evidence is admissible to show that a crop growing on land was excepted from the operation of the deed, the Maryland court follows the minority view, as will be seen by reference to the notes to Grabow v. McCracken, 18 Ann. Cas. 503, and Bjornson v. Rostad, Ann. Cas. 1915A 1151, wherein the earlier cases are reviewed. See also the note to In re Anderson, 131 Am. St. Rep. 621.

CANNING

v.

CANNING.

Vermont Supreme Court—February 11, 1914.

87 Vt. 492; 89 Atl. 1088.

Divorce — Separation Agreement as Bar.

A separation agreement reciting that it was made because the marital relations of the parties were not pleasant, and providing that the husband should pay the wife $6 a week during his life, and in case of his death for four years, by which the husband waived all right to the wife's property, and the wife released all her interest in her husband's real estate, and agreed to contract no bills on his credit, cannot be construed as an agreement not to sue for separation for a pre-existing cause unknown to the innocent party.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A valid separation agreement does not bar the husband's petition for divorce from bed and board on the ground of the wife's adultery unknown to him when he entered into such agreement, nor, in the absence of an express stipulation against a suit for divorce for pre-existing causes then known to the other party, prevent either party from maintaining an action for divorce, either absolute or limited, whether the cause therefor occurred before or after such agreement.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

An action for divorce for abandonment or desertion occurring after a separation agreement cannot be maintained.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Articles of separation may be taken, in connection with lapse of time and other circumstances, as evidence that a party thereto, petitioning for divorce, is not acting in good faith, so as to be entitled to the favorable consideration of the court.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A separation agreement entered into by the husband, without knowledge of the wife's pre-existing adultery, cannot be held to have condoned the pre-existing cause for divorce, since, without knowledge, there can be no condonation.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A husband's petition for divorce, after entering into a separation agreement, is not dependent upon a rescission of such agreement, which, if valid, may, notwithstanding the divorce, be effective so far as it stipulates for the wife's support.

[See note at end of this case.]

Exceptions from Washington County Court: Fish, Judge.

Action for divorce. James Canning, petitioner, and Martha Canning, petitioness. Judgment for petitioner. Petitioness, alleges exceptions. The facts are stated in the opinion.

AFFIRMED.

Theriacult & Hunt for petitioness.

Fred L. Laird and Senter & Senter for petitioner.

[493] TAYLOR, J.—This is a petition for divorce from bed and board. The petitioness pleaded in bar articles of separation. To this plea the petitioner replied that the cause alleged in his petition was unknown to him at the time of the execution of the separation agreement. To the replication the petitioness demurred. The court below overruled the demurrer and adjudged the replication a sufficient answer to the plea and that the petitioner might maintain his petition for divorce to which the petitioness was allowed an exception and the cause passed to this Court before final hearing.

The plea alleges, in substance, that on the 24th day of October, 1907, because of the fact that the marital relations between the petitioner and petitioness were not pleasant, and being unable to live happily as husband and wife, they entered into the following agreement:

"An agreement, made and entered into by and between James C. Canning, of Montpelier, in the County of Washington and State of Vermont, of the first part, and Martha Canning, [494] of said Montpelier, in the County of Washington and State of Vermont, of the second part.

Witnesseth: That whereas the said James C. Canning and Martha Canning, being husband and wife, and whereas their marital relations are not pleasant; therefore, in consideration of the covenants, agreements, grants, releases and stipulations hereinafter expressed, agreed upon and consented to, the said James C. Canning and Martha Canning are to separate and live separately and apart from each other until said marital relations are severed by the decease of one or the other of said parties.

In consideration of the covenants and agreements hereinafter set forth, the said James C. Canning hereby agrees to pay, or cause to be paid, to the said Martha Canning the sum of six dollars per week, said sum to be paid to the said Martha Canning every week during the lifetime of the said James C. Canning, but if the said Canning should decease within four years from the date of this instrument, then the said six dollars per week is to be paid out of his estate up to a period of four years from October 24th, A. D. 1907.

The said James C. Canning, for himself and his heirs, further agrees, for the consideration hereinafter expressed to remise, release and waive any and all claims to any property, real or personal, which he might have or would have in and to the property of the said Martha Canning, as her husband.

The said Martha Canning, for herself, her heirs and assigns, for the consideration of the agreements above set forth, to be performed by the said James C. Canning, agrees as follows: to accept said six dollars a week during the lifetime of the said James C. Canning; to release all her right, title and interest to and in the real estate of the said James C. Canning by signing, as wife of the said James C. Canning, a deed conveying said real estate to

C. P. Pitkin and Antoine Galaise in trust and as trustee for the said James C. Canning; to remise, release and waive any and all claims she may or might have in and to the estate of the said James C. Canning, as his wife, or, at his decease, as his widow; to contract no bills in the name of the said James C. Canning from the date of the execution of this instrument; to vacate the house of the said James C. Canning, located on North Street, in the City of Montpelier, immediately upon the execution of this agreement.

Both of said parties, by this instrument, mutually agree to live apart, and separately from each other during their natural lifetime, and at the decease of either the other shall make no [495] claim to, or assert any interest in, the property of the deceased.

Dated October 24th, A. D. 1907.

In the presence of

FRED L. LAIRD,

MARY CANNING."

The plea further alleges that the petitioness has fully performed said agreement on her part and that the same is in full force and effect. One of the alleged grounds of divorce is adultery claimed to have been committed by the petitioness prior to the date of the separation agreement. In his replication the petitioner alleges that at the time of making the pretended agreement for separation, set forth in the petitioness's plea, he had no knowledge, information or belief as to the fact that the petitioness had committed the crime of adultery, as alleged in his petition for divorce.

The petitioness contends that the agreement pleaded is an undertaking on the part of both parties to remain husband and wife, living separate and apart from each other, until the death of one of them. Conceding that the agreement amounts to an undertaking to remain husband and wife "until death doth us part," it is, in that behalf, but a confirmation of their marriage vows. It contains no express promise not to sue for separation for causes afterwards arising and we think cannot be construed into an agreement not to do so for a pre-existing cause unknown to the innocent party.

The petitioness relies upon Squires v. Squires, 53 Vt. 208, 38 Am. Rep. 668, in support of her claim that the agreement is a bar to this petition. That was a libel for divorce on the ground of intolerable severity and the contract was entered into after the separation had occurred through the intervention of a third person acting for the wife. From the very nature of the alleged cause of divorce it must have occurred before the separation and must have been known to the petitioner at the time of the agreement was entered into. In the case at bar the alleged cause for divorce, though antedating the agreement, was then unknown to the petitioner. Unlike the Squires' case the agreement is not by a third party on behalf of the wife but is a contract between husband and wife alone; moreover, in this case the separation had not occurred and it does not [496] appear that it was then imminent. It was said in the Squires' case: "It is not the policy of the law to encourage separation between husbands and wives. The rule established in many cases is that articles calculated to favor a separation which has not yet taken place will not be supported."

The argument in the case at bar proceeded upon the theory that the separation agreement is a valid contract. We think there is room for doubt, (1) whether such a contract entered into between husband and wife without the intervention of a third person can be upheld at law. 1 Bish. Mar. Sep. & Div. § 1286; P. S. 3037; Montpelier First Nat. Bank v. Bertoli, 87 Vt. 297, 89 Atl. 359, and cases cited; Monographic note to Baum v. Baum, 109 Wis. 47, 85 N. W. 122, 83 Am. St. Rep. 859, 53 L.R.A. 650, and cases cited; (2) whether in the absence of allegations that the separation had already taken place, or was fully decided upon prior to and apart from the contract, the plea could be regarded, in any event, as an answer to the petition for divorce. (See note to Baum v. Baum, supra, and cases cited); (3) and whether it should not be held that agreements for separation between husband and wife, so far as they stipulate against cohabitation, are against public policy and so in that respect void and of no force in law. Luttrell v. Boggs, 168 Ill. 361, 48 N. E. 171; note to Baum v. Baum. Bishop in his treatise on Marriage, Separation and Divorce sums up the law on this subject thus: "The law is a harmonious system, and what it forbids the courts to do with the consent of the parties, it does not permit the parties to do out of court. It has always forbidden judicial divorces on default of defendants, on their acknowledgments in and out of court, or on their and the plaintiff's agreements. Marriage is a public institution as well as private; the public is in effect a party to every marriage and every divorce; and two persons who have united in matrimony cannot by their mutual consenting create a separation even from bed and board,—for this is an act requiring also the sanction of the third party, the public. In circumstances pointed out by the laws, the courts will give this sanction in the form of a judicial decree. So that bargaining for a separation, made simply between the married parties, whether with or without the intervention of a trustee, are nugatory. But there is no public interest which under any circumstances forbids a husband to maintain his wife, or invalidates his contracts to provide for her a support. So that articles [497] of separation are good as provisions for maintenance, but not as a bar to cohabitation." 1 Bish. Mar. Sep. and Div. § 1312.

But as the case can be disposed of without deciding those questions we leave them for consideration when a case is presented in which they are argued. Treating the separation agreement as valid, still it does not bar the petition for divorce on the ground of adultery unknown to the petitioner at the time he entered into the agreement. Such an agreement when valid does not prevent either party from maintaining against the other an action for divorce, either limited, as in this case, or absolute, whether the cause therefor occurred before or after such agreement was entered into, unless, perhaps, as to pre-existing causes the agreement expressly stipulates against suit for divorce on grounds known to the other party at the time of the agreement. 2 Bish. Mar. Sep. and Div. § 445; Clark v. Foadick, 118 N. Y. 7, 22 N. E. 111, 6 L.R.A. 132, 16 Am. St. Rep. 733; J. G. v. H. G. 33 Md. 401, 3 Am. Rep. 193; Foadick v. Foadick, 15 R. I. 180, 23 Atl. 140; Winn v. Sanford, 148 Mass. 39, 18 N. E. 677, 1 L.R.A. 512; Franklin v. Franklin, 154 Mass. 515, 28 N. E. 681, 18 L.R.A. 843, 26 Am. St. Rep. 266; Walker v. Walker, 14 Cal. App. 487, 112 Pac. 479; Archbell v. Archbell, 158 N. C. 408, 74 S. E. 327, Ann. Cas. 1913D 261; Clark v. Clark, 143 Mo. App. 350, 128 S. W. 218; Lemmert v. Lemmert, 108 Md. 57, 63 Atl. 380.

This rule is doubtless subject to the limitation that divorce for abandonment or desertion accruing after the separation contract cannot be maintained. Clark v. Clark, supra.

When rightly understood Squires v. Squires does not hold that a separation agreement necessarily bars a subsequent petition for divorce. The holding goes no further than saying in effect that in a particular case, but not always or as of course, a separation contract taken in connection with the circumstances under which it was made and under which the petition for divorce is brought, may operate as a defense to a divorce suit for a cause known to exist at the time such contract was executed. The opinion concludes with these words: "We think this case belongs to that class when the parties should be held to their own settlement; and that the deed of separation under the circumstances is a good defense to this petition." After correctly stating the common-law rule that a voluntary deed of separation is not per se a bar to a petition [498] for divorce, the opinion proceeds: "But there are other cases where the deed taken in connection with the circumstances under which it was given and under which the application for divorce was made, and with the conduct of the parties, was held to constitute a defence." The doctrine of the cases cited is not that the articles of separation are per se a bar to a divorce for causes previously existing and known to the petitioner, but only that they may be taken in connection with lapse of time and other circumstance as evidence to show that the petitioner is not prosecuting the petition in good faith and therefore not entitled to the favorable consideration of the court. Excepting the case of Squires v. Squires, all the cases both English and American are to the effect that such articles are not per se a bar. Note to Squires v. Squires, 53 Vt. 208, 38 Am. Rep. 668, and cases cited. As is said in Fosdick v. Fosdick, supra: "There is no good reason on which such articles can be held to be a bar unless they can be held to rest on an implied condition that the marital relation shall continue notwithstanding the separation. . . . An agreement for separation and provision for the wife is not inconsistent with divorce, for divorce is only a more absolute separation."

The petitionee contends that the separation agreement operates as a condonation of the pre-existing cause for divorce. It may be that under special circumstances and when expressly stipulated in the contract it would amount to a condonation. 1 Bish. Mar. Sep. and Div. § 1282. In the ordinary case of separation, instead of condoning, or forgiving, the guilty party, the wrong remains unforgiven and is the moving cause of the separation; so it is said that "unless expressed in special terms" such an agreement does not amount to a condonation. But to have condonation there must be knowledge. When, as here, the wrong was unknown at the time of the contract, it cannot in any possible view of the contract be held to have been condoned thereby. 2 Bish. Mar. Sep. and Div. § 269.

The petitionee contends that the bringing of the petition for divorce is an attempt to rescind the agreement which the petitioner cannot do until he has restored what he received under it. But we do not think the right to maintain the petition is dependent upon a rescission of the agreement. If valid, it may, notwithstanding the divorce, still be effective so far as it stipulates for future support of the wife.; Besides the county [499] court has ample power to make a just allowance for the wife in view of any property rights she may have relinquished under the contract in case a decree of separation is awarded. 1 Bish. Mar. Sep. and Div. 1633; P. S. 3074, 3098.

The judgment below was in accordance with these views.

Separation Agreement as Bar to Action for Divorce.

 - c. Subsequent Desertion, 359.

I. Generally.

It may be stated as a general rule that a separation agreement entered into by a husband and wife is not per se a bar to an action for a divorce of the parties, except that a divorce for desertion is precluded when the agreement operates as giving consent to the acts relied on as a cause of action.

Goslin v. Clark, 12 C. B. N. S. 681, 692, 104 E. C. L. 681, 692; Westmeath v. Westmeath, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 238; Charlesworth v. Holt, L. R. 9 Exch. 38, 43 L. J. Exch. 25; Grant v. Budd, 30 L. T. N. S. 319; Lipman v. Lipman, 60 Sol. J. 157; Adamson v. Adamson, 23 Times L. Rep. 434; Miller v. Miller, 19 British Columbia 563; Riddell v. Riddell, 7 Alberta L. Rep. 4, 25 West. L. Rep. 656, 10 Dominion L. Rep. 222; J. G. v. H. G. 33 Md. 401, 3 Am. Rep. 183; Rogers v. Rogers, 4 Paige (N. Y.) 516, 27 Am. Dec. 84; Clark v. Fosdick, 118 N. Y. 7, 22 N. E. 1111, 16 Am. St. Rep. 733, 6 L.R.A. 132; Henderson v. Henderson, 37 Ore. 141, 60 Pac. 597, 61 Pac. 136, 82 Am. St. Rep. 741; 48 L.R.A. 766; Eby v. Eby, 17 Pa. Co. Ct. 289; Litzenberg v. Litzenberg, 57 Pa. Super. Ct. 123; Blaker v. Cooper, 7 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 500; Mondean v. Mondean, 30 Pittsb. Leg. J. (N. S.) 364; Alleman v. Alleman, 2 Dauphin Co. Rep. 209; Andrus v. Randon, 34 Tex. 536. And see the cases cited throughout this note. Thus in Fosdick v. Fosdick, 15 R. I. 130, 23 Atl. 140, the court said: "With the exception of Squires v. Squires, all the cases, both English and American, are to the effect that such articles are not per se a bar. . . . We can think of no ground on which such articles can be held to be a bar, unless they can be held to rest on an implied condition that the marital relation shall continue notwithstanding the separation. But is any such implication warranted? We think not, where the agreement is only an agreement for separation, with provision for the injured party. Such an agreement is not inconsistent with divorce, for divorce is only a more absolute separation. It is reasonable to suppose that such a condition, if it had been intended, would have been expressed. It follows that the agreement, whatever effect we might give to it, if it were subject to such a condition, is no bar, and that the divorce, the cause alleged being proved, must be granted." Similarly in J. G. v. H. G. 33 Md. 401, 3 Am. Rep. 183, the court said: "Some cases have arisen upon applications for divorce in the Ecclesiastical Courts, in which a voluntary deed of separation between the parties has been considered, in connection with lapse of time and other circumstances, as sufficient to show that the application was not made bona fide, for the cause assigned; but for some sinister or collateral purpose, and the application upon that reason has been denied. . . . But, as we have said, such a voluntary deed has never been considered per se as a bar to the suit. . . . We think it is very clear upon the authorities, that the deed of separation in this case is not per se a bar to the maintenance of the present suit. There is no evidence in the case to impeach the good faith or bona fides of the appellant in bringing this suit. The only circumstance relied on by the appellee for that purpose, is the lapse of time after the execution of the deed, before filing the bill. But this is satisfactorily explained by the proof in the record. It appears the complainant was restrained from instituting this proceeding by conscientious scruples, supposing it to be inconsistent with his religious duty, to seek a divorce for any cause; and it appears also, that the same motive led him to enter into the deed for an amicable separation. Those conscientious scruples were afterwards removed by a decision upon the subject, rendered by the highest ecclesiastical tribunal of the Church of which he and the appellee are members, and to whose authority he felt himself bound to submit, declaring the marriage null. These facts disclosed in the record, while they in no otherwise affect the rights of the parties in this cause, are a sufficient answer to the suggestion, that the appellant has lost his remedy by laches or acquiescence, or that his application for a divorce has not been made in good faith and for the cause assigned." Likewise in Bloom v. Bloom, 8 Pa. Dist. 563, 22 Pa. Co. Ct. 433, it was said that all the causes for a divorce, except perhaps where the ground is desertion, which exist prior to the time a separation agreement is entered into, remain the same and the agreement is not a bar. And in Eby v. Eby, 17 Pa. Co. Ct. 269, wherein it was held that an agreement to separate made after the commencement of divorce proceedings did not bar the action with respect to pre-existing causes, the court said: "The agreement . . . is not a bar to a proceeding by either party for an absolute divorce. It is simply an agreement to live apart, containing the usual provision for the support of the wife and children, and declaring that payment thereof may be enforced in the same manner as if a decree from bed and board with alimony had been entered. In fact, however, no decree of the court was made, and the parties had no power to divorce themselves by agreement. But they might lawfully separate; and as we construe the contract they did not try to do more than this. Moreover they expressly provided that payment of the sum agreed upon for the wife's support should continue until the happening of one of several contingencies, among which is the obtaining of a 'divorce absolute . . . by either party;' implying plainly that either party was free to proceed for an absolute decree. There is nothing in the agreement which compels the party thus proceeding to rely only upon a cause for divorce which might arise after the agreement was signed; and the court has no power to impose such a restriction. A new application, therefore, asking for an absolute decree for reasons which existed when the agreement to separate was executed, would be unobjectionable; and as the same result has been reached by allowing the original libel to be amended, it would be a useless formality to compel the libellant to begin anew."

A distinction should be noted between an agreement of separation and a consent to the commission of an act constituting a cause for a divorce. Cases which deal with the passive consent alone have been excluded from this note as not being within the scope thereof and the discussion is limited to cases involving an active consent as expressed in or implied from an agreement between the parties for a separation. As to the validity of a separation agreement between husband and wife as dependent on the manner of its execution, see the note Archbell v. Archbell, 158 N. C. 408, Ann. Cas. 1913D 261, 74 S. E. 327.

In England it has been said that by peculiar expressions in the separation agreement the parties may become bound not to institute a suit for a divorce for a pre-existing cause. See Flower v. Flower, 25 L. T. N. S. 902, 20 W. R. 231; Branton v. Dixon [1892] W. N. 105.

II. Antenuptial Agreement.

The general rule that a separation agreement does not per se preclude the parties from obtaining a divorce is applicable to an antenuptial agreement that the parties shall live separately. Franklin v. Franklin, 154 Mass. 515, 28 N. E. 681, 26 Am. St. Rep. 266, 13 L. R. A. 843; Donohue v. Donohue, 159 Mo. App. 610, 141 S. W. 465. Thus an antenuptial agreement for a separation and a divorce on the default of an appearance by the husband does not bar a suit on the ground of the adultery of the wife. Donohue v. Donohue, 150 Mo. App. 610, 141 S. W. 465, Similarly in Franklin v. Franklin, 154 Mass. 515, 28 N. E. 681, 26 Am. St. Rep. 266, 13 L.R.A. 843, wherein it was held that an antenuptial agreement to live separately and apart did not bar a divorce on the ground of the wife's adultery, though it might constitute a bar to an action based on desertion; the court said: "The agreement that they would not live together had no effect upon the marriage contract entered into in regular form in the presence of a magistrate or minister authorized to solemnize marriages. It is against the policy of the law that the validity of a contract of marriage or its effect upon the status of the parties, should be in any way affected by their preliminary or collateral agreements. . . . The consummation of a marriage by coition is not necessary to its validity. The status of the parties is fixed in law when the marriage contract is entered into in the manner prescribed by the statutes in relation to the solemnization of marriages. . . . The libellant is not guilty of such a marital wrong as will prevent him from obtaining a divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery. The parties lived apart by mutual consent, and, on the facts reported, neither could have obtained a divorce from the other on the ground of desertion. In such a separation there was no desertion within the meaning of the word in the statutes in relation to divorce. . . . Living apart by agreement is no bar to a suit for divorce brought by either against the other on the ground of adultery. A voluntary separation is not a license to commit adultery; and it has uniformly been held that, in case of adultery under such circumstances, the innocent party may have a remedy against the other in a suit for a divorce."

Likewise the qualification of the general rule that where a separation of the parties is relied on as a ground of divorce the agreement is a bar if it can be construed in connection with the surrounding facts as a consent to the desertion, applies to antenuptial agreements. McAllister v. McAllister, 71 N. J. Eq. 13, 62 Atl. 1131; Dennison v. Dennison, 52 Misc. 37, 102 N. Y. S. 621. See also Tipton v. Tipton, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 360. Thus in the case last cited it seems to have been held that if the parties agreed prior to the celebration of the marriage to live separately and apart, no divorce could be secured on the ground of desertion until the arrangement was rescinded. Similarly in McAllister v. McAllister, 71 N. J. Eq. 13, 62 Atl. 1131, it was held that though an antenuptial agreement to live separately is void, if it is not followed by an expression by one of the parties of a willingness to live with the other and a demand that they shall live together, it is a bar to a divorce on the ground of desertion. In Dennison v. Dennison, 52 Misc. 37, 102 N. Y. S. 621, wherein it was held that an antenuptial agreement to live separately was a bar to an action for a judicial separation on the ground of abandonment, the court said: "In this case the intention of the parties, after marriage, to continue to live separately as they had done before marriage, prevents such living separately from becoming an abandonment by the husband of the wife in the sense in which the meaning of that term is employed in the statute, as understood and defined by the courts; hence it must be held that the plaintiff has failed to establish a cause of action on the ground of abandonment. It may very well be that an antenuptial agreement that provides for the living separately of husband and wife would be deemed void as against public policy; but, until something has intervened, such as an effort on the part of the wife to live with the husband in a common home, and his refusal and his wilful persistence in living separately from her thereafter, he cannot be deemed to have deserted her and abandoned her in the sense in which 'abandonment' occurs in the statute. No attempt has been made on the part of the plaintiff in this case to require her husband to live with her; and, in that respect, the circumstances have remained the same since the time of the marriage as they did before and at the time of making the antenuptial agreement."

But a voluntary deed of separation between the parties is not per se a bar to a divorce for desertion, especially when the husband has repudiated his obligation under the deed. See Walker v. Walker, 125 Md. 649, 94 Atl. 346. And an antenuptial agreement to live separately beginning four months after the marriage is consummated, obtained by the husband without the real concurrence or the consent of his wife, and without justification, cannot be set up to justify desertion by the husband one month after the marriage on the birth of a child by him. Dagg v. Dagg, 7 P. D. (Eng.) 17, 51 L. J. P. 19, 47 L. T. N. S. 132, 30 W. R. 431.

It has been held that an antenuptial contract by which each party renounces all right to the property of the other is not to be construed as a provision for a separation and does not bar a judicial separation with alimony on the ground of abandonment. See Logan v. Logan, 2 B. Mon. (Ky.) 142.

III. Postnuptial Agreement.

1. DIVORCE FOR ADULTERY.

a. Prior Adultery.

An action for a divorce for an act of adultery committed prior to a postnuptial separation agreement is not per se barred by it. Durant v. Durant, 1 Hagg. Ecc. (Eng.) 733, Beeby v. Beeby, 1 Hagg. Ecc. (Eng.) 789; Kremelberg v. Kremelberg, 52 Md. 553. See the reported case. See also Brown v. Brown, L. R. 7 Eq. (Eng.) 185, 38 L. J. Ch. 153, 19 L. T. N. S. 594, 17 W. R. 98; Mortimer v. Mortimer, 2 Hagg. Const. 310; Anderson v. Anderson, 1 Edw. (N. Y.) 380. Thus a postnuptial deed executed by a husband by which he bound himself to allow his wife five hundred pounds a year should she at any time choose to live separately, followed by a suit by the wife on the deed after a separation consequent on his adultery, has been held not to bar a suit for divorce for acts committed prior and subsequent to the separation. Durant v. Durant, 1 Hagg. Ecc. (Eng.) 733. Similarly articles of separation executed subsequent to the separation are not a bar to the wife's setting up the prior matrimonial offenses of adultery and communication of a venereal disease by way of a recrimination in the husband's suit for a divorce a mense for her adultery. Beeby v. Beeby, 1 Hagg. Ecc. (Eng.) 789. Likewise the reported case holds that while a postnuptial agreement to live separately until the marital relations are severed by the decease of one of the parties may sometimes operate as a condonation of a pre-existing cause for a divorce, in the ordinary case of separation, instead of condoning or forgiving the guilty party, the wrong remains unforgiven and is the moving cause of the separation, so that, unless expressed in special terms, such an agreement does not amount to a condonation of the adultery and when it is unknown it cannot in any case be considered condoned by the separation agreement. And it was said in Mortimer v. Mortimer, 2 Hagg. Const. (Eng.) 310, that a postnuptial separation agreement is not a bar to an action for a divorce based on an act of adultery known at the time of the execution of the agreement. But in Gee v. Gee, 13 Pa. Co. Ct. 382, 2 Pa. Dist. 773, it was said that for adultery committed before the separation agreement, if known by the parties, the courts will not grant a divorce, on the ground that the agreement by either party to separate is a condonation of the crime of the other, so far as to withhold the legal remedy. In Kremelberg v. Kremelberg, 52 Md. 553, it was held that articles of separation executed immediately after the discovery by the husband of the wife's infidelity, not expressly condoning the adultery, did not bar a suit for divorce even after the lapse of a considerable period, the court saying: "We do not understand it to be contended, that there has been any forgiveness or condonation in express terms on the part of the complainant; but the argument is, that the lapse of time between the discovery of his wife's guilt, and the filing of this bill, a period of three years and a half, taken in connection with the deed of separation of October, 1874, and the circumstances under which it was executed, amount in fact to a condonation of offense, and constitute therefore a bar to the relief now prayed. . . . Nor do we understand that it is contended, that a deed of separation will in itself constitute a bar. This question was argued by eminent counsel, and fully considered in J. G. v. H. G. 33 Md. 401, and it was held that a voluntary deed of separation did not operate as a bar to a petition for divorce. And in support of this, the court refers to a number of English decisions, and we have not been able to find a case in which a contrary doctrine has been held. So we think it is quite clear that neither lapse of time nor mere articles of separation will, when separately considered, operate as a bar; and it is equally clear we think, that they cannot have this effect when combined, unless there be other circumstances to show that the application was not made bona fide, but for some sinister or collateral purpose." In Brown v. Brown, L. R. 7 Eq. 185, 38 L. J. Ch. 153, 19 L. T. N. S. 594, 17 W. R. 98, it was said that where the husband executes a deed of separation on the solemn assurance of the wife that she has not been guilty of adultery, he does not thereby condone her prior adultery, although there is a clause expressly condoning all past matrimonial offenses. The court said: "I have always understood that in all proceedings by a husband or wife—for instance, in the case of a proceeding by a husband to obtain a divorce, a vinculo from his wife on the ground of adultery—if it can be shown that a condonation has taken place, there is an end of the proceedings of the husband. But it must be a condonation of a known fact, and, therefore, the act of the husband, if it amounted to a condonation in case of his being aware of the adultery, can have no operation when he was in total ignorance of it. Now, if this husband had been aware of his wife's adultery, it can admit of no shadow of doubt, in my mind, that if that be shown to the Court, the deed which he has executed is a complete and final bar against his taking any proceedings in that Court, because he has contracted with her that every offence which has been committed, or permitted, by either party against the other shall be considered as, and the same hereby is, forgiven and condoned."

b. Subsequent Adultery.

Of course the aggrieved party is not precluded from maintaining an action for a divorce for the adultery of the other party committed after the execution of a postnuptial separation agreement. Bourne v. Bourne [1913] P. (Eng.) 164, 32 L. J. P. 117, 108 L. T. N. S. 1039, 29 Times L. Rep. 657; Durant v. Durant, 1 Hagg. Ecc. (Eng.) 733; Ross v. Ross, L. R. 1 P. & D. (Eng.) 734; Wilson v. Wilson, 40 Ia. 230; Anderson v. Anderson, 1 Edw. 380; Gee v. Gee, 13 Pa. Co. Ct. 382, 2 Pa. Dist. 773. See also Dowling v. Dowling [1898] P. (Eng.) 228, 68 L. J. P. 8, 47 W. R. 273; Rose v. Rose, 8 P. D. (Eng.) 98, 52 L. J. P. 25; Nash v. Nash, 2 Hagg. Coms. (Eng.) 140; Morrall v. Morrall, 6 P. D. (Eng.) 98, 60 L. J. P. (Eng.) 62, 47 L. T. N. S. 50, 29 W. R. 897; Gandy v. Gandy, 7 P. D. (Eng.) 168; Stokes v. Stokes, 1 Mo. 320; Rennie v. Rennie (N. J.) 95 Atl. 571; Carpenter v. Osborn, 102 N. Y. 552, 7 N. E. 823, 3 Cent. Rep. 304. Thus a written agreement between husband and wife to live separately during the course of their natural lives, each agreeing not to hold the other responsible for any obligation growing out of the marriage relations and to release all claims to the property of the other, does not bar an action for a divorce with alimony for the subsequent adultery of the husband. Wilson v. Wilson, 40 Ia. 230. In Bourne v. Bourne [1913] P. (Eng.) 161, 32 L. J. P. 117, 108 L. T. N. S. 1039, 29 Times L. Rep. 657, it appeared that a husband and wife entered into a separation deed by which they agreed to live apart and mutually and expressly covenanted that any matrimonial offenses which might have been committed by either before the execution of the deed were condoned thereby. By another clause it was agreed that if the marriage should be dissolved or if the parties should be judicially separated by reason of any misconduct of the husband occurring after the date of the deed, then all the covenants and provisions therein contained should become void. Cruelty and adultery by the husband before the date of the deed and his adultery afterwards were proved. It was held that the wife was entitled to a decree of divorce on the latter ground at least, the court saying: "It was proved that the respondent had been guilty of cruelty and adultery before the date of the deed, and that he had also committed adultery after its date. The petitioner's counsel contended that the subsequent matrimonial offence revived, either under, or apart from, the deed, the anterior offences which had been expressly condoned. I am of opinion that this contention is not sound. Upon the facts of this case, the petitioner might no doubt obtain a judicial separation on the ground of the adultery committed after the deed. Thereupon the covenants in the deed, including the condonation covenant, would become void. She might then, in other proceedings, obtain a decree of dissolution on the ground of the previous cruelty and the adultery. This would be a circuitous way of obtaining redress." And in Galusha v.

Galusha, 116 N. Y. 635, 22 N. E. 1114, 15 Am. St. Rep. 453, 6 L.R.A. 487, it was held that the parties to an agreement entered into after a separation could not provide that they should not have the right to a divorce on the ground of the subsequent adultery of one of the parties, the court saying: "The parties to that agreement were powerless to provide that they should not be visited with the legal consequences of adultery. Any agreement to that effect would have been void. Such was and is the law, and they are presumed to have known it, and to have made their contract with the knowledge and understanding that in the event of the commission of the act of adultery, by either the husband or the wife, the other party would be at liberty either to permit the legal relation of husband and wife to continue or sunder the marriage tie in an action brought for that purpose. No provision was inserted that this contract for maintenance should be affected by the subsequent wrongful act of either party and none can be implied."

It has been held that an agreement between a husband and wife reciting that the husband was then living with another woman and that proceedings were about to be taken on account of his adultery, and providing that if the proceedings should not be taken a certain sum should be settled on the wife, barred a suit for a divorce for the subsequent adultery with the same woman. Thomas v. Thomas, 2 Sw. & Tr. (Eng.) 113. Furthermore it has been said that a deed of separation may virtually amount to the assignment of the wife to a co-respondent to the extent of precluding a divorce on the ground of the continued acts of adultery. See Walton v. Walton, 28 L. J. P. & M. (Eng.) 97. In Ross v. Ross, L. R. 1 P. & D. (Eng.) 734, however, it was held that a deed of separation did not bar a suit for divorce for the subsequent adultery of the husband, where it did not appear that the wife knew of the adultery with the paramour previous to the execution of the agreement, though she knew of their intimacy, and it could not be said under the facts proved that she had consented to the continuance of the adulterous intercourse.

2. DIVORCE FOR CRUELTY.

659, 29 L. J. P. & M. 118; 2 L. T. N. S. 472, 1 Sw. & Tr. 499, 8 W. R. 591; Besant v. Wood, 12 Ch. D. (Eng.) 605, 40 L. T. N. S. 445; Kunski v. Kunski, 23 Times L. Rep. (Eng.) 615; Potts v. Potts (N. J.) 42 Atl. 1055; Archbell v. Archbell, 158 N. C. 408, Ann. Cas. 1913D 261, 74 S. E. 327; Compere Squires v. Squires, 53 Vt. 208, 38 Am. Rep. 668, distinguished in the reported case. Thus a separation agreement is not a bar to a suit for a divorce based on acts of cruelty committed subsequent to the execution of the agreement. See Kunski v. Kunski, 23 Times L. Rep. (Eng.) 615. Similarly a postnuptial agreement of itself does not preclude a suit for a divorce based on acts of cruelty committed prior to the separation. Brown v. Brown, L. R. 3 P. & D. (Eng.) 202, 43 L. J. P. & M. 47, 31 L. T. N. S. 272; Williams v. Williams, L. R. 1 P. (Eng.) 178, 35 L. J. P. & M. 85, 14 L. T. N. S. 770, 14 W. R. 1022; Bloom v. Bloom, 8 Pa. Dist. 568, 22 Pa. Co. Ct. 433; Yeager v. Yeager, 19 Pa. Dist. 726; Fosdick v. Fosdick, 15 R. I. 130, 23 Atl. 140. See also Potts v. Potts (N. J.) 42 Atl. 1055; Archbell v. Archbell, 158 N. C. 408, Ann. Cas. 1913D 261, 74 S. E. 327. For example, it has been held that articles of separation agreed to and embodied in a deed after the treatment complained of as amounting to extreme cruelty and when the parties were living apart, were not a bar to a divorce on the ground of cruelty. Fosdick v. Fosdick, 15 R. I. 130, 23 Atl. 140. Likewise a postnuptial deed of separation cannot per se be considered a bar to an action for a divorce for the prior cruelty of the husband or a condonation of it. Williams v. Williams, L. R. 1 P. (Eng.) 178, 14 L. T. N. S. 770, 14 W. R. 1072, 35 L. J. P. & M. 85. And a deed of separation made in contemplation of an immediate separation but not executed in accordance with the statutory formalities is no bar to an action for a divorce with alimony for the acts of cruelty committed prior to the separation. See Archbell v. Archbell, 158 N. C. 408, Ann. Cas. 1913D 261, 74 S. E. 327; In Brown v. Brown, L. R. 3 P. & D. (Eng.) 202, 43 L. J. P. & M. 47, 31 L. T. N. S. 272, it was held that where a husband prayed for a dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the adultery of the wife and she denied the acts and charged cruelty prior to the execution of an agreement to live separately, a judicial separation might be granted to her, the court saying: "At the trial the jury found that the respondent was not guilty of adultery and that the petitioner was guilty of cruelty. I was asked, on behalf of the petitioner, not to grant a decree of judicial separation, on the ground that the petitioner and the respondent were, at the time of the institution of the suit, living apart, under a deed of separation, the terms of which have always been complied with by the husband, and to the obligation of which he still remains liable. I have several times expressed an opinion that it is not the duty of the court to discourage the settlement of matrimonial differences by arrangement between the parties rather than by litigation. It is always for the benefit of the children, if there be any, and it is generally to the advantage of the parties themselves that publicity should not be given to their charges and countercharges against one another. A wife who has reason to complain of her husband's conduct may be disposed to submit to very disadvantageous terms rather than injure her children's prospects and run the risk of injury to her own reputation (as in this case, where charges of drunkenness were made against the respondent), by the unavoidable exposure which must follow if she should institute a suit against her husband. But if the husband, by bringing an unfounded charge against the wife, compels her to make known, in self-defence, her own ground of complaint against him, the foundation of the settlement between them is removed, and the consideration fails upon which it was entered into. In such a state of things, it is only just that the wife should be remitted to her original position, and should be allowed to claim the fullest redress to which she is entitled. Her rights, under a decree of judicial separation pronounced by this court, are larger and better assured than those that are gained by a deed of separation, and being driven to appeal to the law, she cannot be restrained from claiming all that the law can give her. This is not the occasion to consider what may be the effect of a deed of separation if one of the parties to it should, without fresh circumstances rendering it necessary, institute a suit for judicial separation, or whether it is of any force in answer to a suit for restitution of conjugal rights." In Potts v. Potts (N. J.) 42 Atl. 1055, it was held that the failure to disclose the existence of a separation agreement in a suit for a divorce based on acts of cruelty committed prior to the execution of the agreement was not a sufficient reason for annulling the decree of divorce and that the mere fact that the husband and wife agreed to live apart did not bar a suit for a divorce for cruelty inflicted before the execution of the agreement, as it did not amount to a condonation of the past matrimonial offences. The court said: "The articles of separation in this case contain no covenant not to sue, nor any stipulation looking towards a condonation of any preceding conduct. On the contrary, there is a provision that the articles shall be void, except as to the third clause, if the parties become reconciled to each other and resume cohabitation, or if their marriage shall be legally dissolved by a court of competent jurisdiction over the parties in the cause of action, for any just cause of divorce other than desertion, whether arising before or after the date of this agreement. By this provision for a partial change in the articles of separation in case of divorce, it negatives the idea of any condonation." Compare Squires v. Squires, 53 Vt. 208, 38 Am. Rep. 668, distinguished in the reported case, wherein it was held that an agreement after the parties had parted, entered into between the husband and the father of the wife acting in her behalf, was a bar to a divorce on the ground of cruelty where the cause accrued prior to the agreement and the husband has acted under the agreement, the court saying: "The question as before stated is as to the effect of this contract, under the circumstances disclosed upon this petition for divorce. It will be noticed that this contract was entered into after the separation and through the intervention of a person acting for the wife. . . . This contract is therefore one of a character that the court may recognize for some purposes. It is not necessarily and utterly void. In this case it is not invoked by the defendant as a bar to the restitution of the libellant to any of her conjugal rights. The separation grew out of trouble between the husband and wife. The alleged cause of divorce then existed in her favor, if it existed at all, and was known to her. In this situation, and after the separation, she, through the intervention of a trustee, agreed upon the terms as to property upon which she would live separate from her husband. This property (including the money specified in the contract), except, as is claimed, a portion of household furniture, was delivered or paid to and accepted by the trustee in her behalf. After all the other provisions as to what property and money she was to have, it was further provided in the contract as follows: 'And the said parties further agree to and with each other that they will not molest, disturb or trouble each other or in any way publish or speak or circulate slanderous matter of or concerning each other, but live separate and apart in a quiet and peaceable way according to the true intent of these presents.' He has substantially performed on his part, and she has received the benefits. The question about the household furniture seems to be one of difference as to what the contract covered in that respect, not a refusal to perform by the husband. The contract was not strictly a condonation of alleged wrongs. The wife, instead of forgiving her husband upon promise of better treatment, agreed with him upon terms of separation, which were satisfactory, and no complaint is now made in regard to them. Nearly two years afterwards this petition was brought. In the English Ecclesiastical Courts it is held that a voluntary deed of separation between husband and wife is not per se a bar to a suit for a restitution of marital rights or to a petition for divorce. . . . But there are other cases where the deed, taken in connection with the circumstances under which it was given, and under which the application for divorce was made, and with the conduct of the parties, was held to constitute a defence, and the application was denied. . . . We think this case belongs to that class where the parties should be held to their own settlement; and that the deed of separation, under the circumstances, is a good defence to this petition."

It has been held, however, that a postnuptial deed of separation taken in connection with the long lapse of time before the institution of a suit for a judicial separation on the ground of cruelty may show bad faith sufficient to preclude a decree in favor of the wife. Matthews v. Matthews, 6 Jur. N. S. (Eng.) 659, 29 L. J. P. & M. 118, 2 L. T. N. S. 472, 1 Sw. & Tr. 499, 8 W. R. 591; Besant v. Wood, 12 Ch. D. (Eng.) 605, 40 L. T. N. S. 445. But in Yeager v. Yeager, 19 Pa. Dist. 726, it was held that an agreement to separate executed thirteen years before the institution of the suit did not bar a divorce on the ground of cruelty since condonation of cruelty could be inferred from a bare agreement to separate and a delay in instituting proceedings where in the interim the parties had lived apart.

An express condonation of all matrimonial offenses committed prior to the execution of a deed under which the parties separate is final and the subsequent adultery of the husband does not revive the wife's right to complain of the cruelty committed before the separation. Rose v. Rose, 8 P. D. (Eng.) 98, 52 L. J. P. 25, wherein Jessel, M. R. said: "Having then power to compromise her right to bring a suit for judicial separation, she has, by the present deed, contracted that she will not in any suit enter into the conduct of her husband before the execution of the deed. This is, in my opinion, a perfectly binding agreement. It appears to me to be perfectly consistent with public policy to hold that there may be what, for want of a better term, I will call final condonation. In the old Ecclesiastical Courts condonation was never final, but I do not see that public policy is against final condonation, indeed I think that it is in favor of allowing it. . . . That bygones should be bygones is as advantageous between husband and wife as between any other parties. The lady here made a final bargain that she would not take any proceedings against her husband in respect of past offenses, nor plead any past offenses in any proceedings as to subsequent offenses. Now she turns round and says that she will repudiate one of the most important stipulations in the deed. I am of opinion that she cannot do this, and that the decision of the President is right. We were referred to another doctrine: It is said that adultery by a husband, however condoned or got rid of by deed, would prevent his obtaining a decree for dissolution, and that this shows that condonation of matrimonial offenses is not final. That question may come before the Court of Appeal, and I do not mean to give a concluded opinion upon it, but my present impression is that adultery by a husband which has been condoned is not necessarily a bar to his obtaining a dissolution for adultery of the wife, and the point must be considered as open." In Dowling v. Dowling [1898] P. (Eng.) 228, 68 L. J. P. 8, 47 W. R. 272, it appeared that the parties separated under a deed which provided that neither party should take any proceedings against the other to obtain a divorce or judicial separation in respect to any misconduct which had hitherto taken place but that if they should be reconciled and return to cohabitation or if the marriage should be dissolved or they should be judicially separated by reason of any misconduct on the part of either occurring after the date thereof then the covenants were to be void. The husband subsequently committed adultery. It was held that since the deed of separation was not pleaded by the husband, a decree for the dissolution of the marriage on the ground of his prior cruelty and subsequent adultery could be entered, the latter by itself being a ground for a judicial separation only.

3. DIVORCE FOR DESERTION.

a. Generally.

In an action for a divorce on the ground of desertion, a postnuptial separation agreement is not a bar unless it can be construed as giving consent to the separation relied on as constituting cause for the divorce. See the cases cited in the following subdivisions of this note. Of course if the separation agreement can be considered as not being in force, it cannot operate as a bar to a suit for a divorce on the ground of desertion: Hussey v. Hussey, 109 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 192, 29 Times L. Rep. 673; Cock v. Cock, 10 Jur. N. S. (Eng.) 806, 3 Sw. & Tr. 514, 33 L. J. P. & M. 157, 10 L. T. N. S. 726. See also Curtin v. Curtin, 111 App. Div. 447, 97 N. Y. S. 771. Thus it has been held that a deed of separation entered into some months before the husband left the wife and never acted on was no bar to a suit by her for a divorce on the ground of desertion, in the absence of consent, it appearing also that about the time the husband left the country he cohabit-ed with another woman as his wife. Cock v. Cock, 10 Jur. N. S. (Eng.) 806, 3 Sw. & Tr. 514, 33 L. J. P. & M. 157, 10 L. T. N. S. 726. And the husband's expression of his intention to leave followed by the wife's request for support is not such a mutual agreement to live apart as will bar an action for a judicial separation on the ground of the abandonment. Curtin v. Curtin, 111 App. Div. 447, 97 N. Y. S. 771. Similarly it has been held that where the husband has failed to make the covenanted payments a deed of separation is not a bar to a divorce for desertion. Hussey v. Hussey, 109 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 192, 29 Times L. Rep. 673. But it has been said that while, it may be true that where a man, determining to abandon his wife, sets about fraudulently, under cover of an agreement which he never intends to fulfil, to induce or extort her consent to their mutual separation, concealing his true purpose under delusive covenants, the agreement will not bar a divorce on the ground of desertion, yet if he merely fails to fulfil his bargain by the continued payment of the stipulated annuity the separation cannot be regarded as in origin and continuance a desertion. Crabb v. Crabb, L. R. 1 P. & D. (Eng.) 601, 37 L. J. P. & M. 42, 18 L. T. N. S. 153, 16 W. R. 650. See also Parkinson v. Parkinson, L. R. 2 P. & D. (Eng.) 25, 39 L. J. P. & M. 14, 21 L. T. N. S. 732.

In a suit for a divorce for desertion, testimony to explain the intent of the parties in signing a contract or deed of separation is inadmissible as the paper speaks for itself, but testimony showing the circumstances surrounding its execution, such as the pendency of the divorce proceedings, the fact that the parties were then separated, and similar facts, are admissible in evidence. Lemmert v. Lemmert, 103 Md. 57, 63 Atl. 380.

b. Prior Desertion.

A postnuptial separation agreement executed subsequent to the desertion is not to be construed as per se giving such consent to the desertion as will bar an action for a divorce on that ground. Nott v. Nott, L. R. 1 P. & D. (Eng.) 251; Moore v. Moore, 12 P. D. (Eng.) 193, 51 J. P. 632, 56 L. J. P. 104, 57 L. T. N. S. 568, 36 W. R. 110; Walker v. Walker, 14 Cal. App. 487, 112 Pac. 479; Parker v. Parker, 28 Ill. App. 22; Nichols v. Nichols (Ky.) 11 S. W. 286; Lemmert v. Lemmert, 103 Md. 57, 63 Atl. 380; Caleme v. Caleme, 25 N. J. Eq. 548; Power v. Power, 66 N. J. Eq. 320, 58 Atl. 192, 105 Am. St. Rep. 653, reversing 65 N. J. Eq. 93, 55 Atl. 111; Ogilvie v. Ogilvie, 37 Ore. 171, 61 Pac. 627. See also Wood v. Wood, 27 N. C. 675. Thus where it appeared that a husband left his wife without the slightest notice and went to live with another woman and later the wife at his request made him an allowance and signed a deed of separation, but fearing that if she continued the payments he would not return to her she discontinued them, it was held that he was guilty of desertion. Nott v. Nott, L. R. 1 P. & D. (Eng.) 251. Similarly it has been held that an agreement to live separately, with collateral stipulations concerning property rights, executed after the separation did not amount to the consent of the husband to the separation and that the court would deny by way of recrimination a divorce a vinculo for the subsequent adultery of the husband where it appeared that the wife abandoned the husband before the agreement was executed. Wood v. Wood, 27 N. C. 674. An agreement reciting the desertion of the husband by the wife, settling the property rights and making provision for the custody and care of the children of the marriage is not a bar to a divorce by the husband from the wife on the ground of the desertion. Ogilvie v. Ogilvie, 37 Ore. 171, 61 Pac. 627. Likewise in Power v. Power, 66 N. J. Eq. 320, 58 Atl. 192, 105 Am. St. Rep. 653, reversing 65 N. J. Eq. 93, 55 Atl. 111, it was held that an agreement, executed after the husband had left his wife, providing for her living apart from him and fixing the property rights and custody of the children, was no bar to a divorce on the ground of desertion where she protested against the separation. The court said: "The effect upon this desertion produced by the agreement of November 15th, 1899, requires more consideration. It is certain the agreement did not give to either spouse, as against the other, the right to continue the separation. Notwithstanding it, each was entitled to demand of the other a resumption of marital relations. . . . Consequently the only question is whether it either indicates or gave rise to a change in the mental attitude of either party, showing mere consent to the separation instead of protest on the part of the wife, and instead of obstinate persistence on the part of the husband. In solving this question the terms of the instrument are, of course, important, and they militate strongly against the petition of the appellant. But from the very nature of the inquiry they cannot be conclusive; they are only a part of the circumstances from which the truth must be inferred. No matter how explicit the declaration of the wife's agreement to live apart from her husband and to release him from his marital obligations, it is credible that she was but yielding to the necessities of the case, still recognizing, as the law recognized, the continuance of marital duty, both for herself and for her husband. And it is equally credible that the husband was aware of this condition and remained separated from his wife, not because he believed she assented to such separation, but because his resolution never to resume cohabitation was unaltered. If such a state of facts appears, they constitute wilful, continued and obstinate desertion, no matter what is said in article of separation." So in Moore v. Moore, 12 P. D. (Eng.) 193, 51 J. P. 632, 56 L. J. P. 104, 57 L. T. N. S. 568, 36 W. R. 110, it was held that a deed of separation executed subsequent to desertion by the husband but not condoning it expressly was not a bar to a divorce on that ground, the court saying: "The conclusion I have come to is that I ought not to hold that the agreement bars the wife's remedy. There is authority for saying that the court is not bound to take notice of the deed if it is not pleaded, but even if I were bound to take cognizance of the document I should hold that it was no bar to a decree for judicial separation. There is no covenant in the deed not to sue, neither is there anything approaching to such a covenant. There is no condonation of past marital offenses in the deed, and no expression pointing to condonation. The cited decisions were based either on the fact that there was an agreement to live apart before the two years' desertion was completed, or that there was condonation or a covenant not to sue." Also in Walker v. Walker, 14 Cal. App. 487, 112 Pac. 479, it was held that a separation agreement entered into ostensibly for the purpose of settling property rights after the husband's right to a divorce on the ground of desertion had been perfected could not be regarded as a condonation of the abandonment where no intention of the resumption of marital cohabitation was evinced in the instrument. The court said: "At the time the defendant entered into his contract she had given plaintiff a sufficient ground for divorce; she had wilfully deserted him for a period considerably beyond the statutory time prescribed; her matrimonial offense was complete and plaintiff's right of action had accrued. 'If one party deserts the other, and before the expiration of the statutory period required to make the desertion a cause of divorce, returns and offers in good faith to fulfil the marriage contract and solicits condonation, the desertion is cured.' (Civ. Code, sec. 103.) There is no pretense that defendant did this, or even made the slightest conciliatory advance toward her husband. The evidence was that she had previously declared that she never would again live with him. The contract shows on its face that she returned for no purpose of remaining and fulfilling her marital obligations and soliciting condonation, but quite to the contrary, for the agreement declares that 'it has become impossible for them longer to live together in that condition of amity and accord essential between husband and wife;' and she relinquished to him 'all claims, rights, benefits and privileges to which she may be entitled by reason of their marriage.' It is impossible to find in this agreement any suggestion of a purpose on her part, or either of them, for that matter, ever again to resume the marriage relation. Furthermore, she declared in the agreement, as showing her purpose in making it, that 'it is therefore necessary that some arrangement be arrived at whereby the respective property and personal rights of the parties and their future relations be forever settled and adjusted.' It is in view of this state of the case we are asked to hold that the parties intended by their contract to obliterate the past, execute an accord and satisfaction of any right of action arising out of past conduct and continue the separation, but upon a different footing.

There was no such lapse of time here as would bar the action, for there is not the slightest indication of 'connivance, collusion, or condonation of the offense,' and there was no showing of full acquiescence in the desertion 'with intent to continue the marriage relation,' with all its rights and privileges. The 'status of the separation' was not changed by the agreement, for to all intents and purposes this status was to continue precisely as it had existed while the offense was being committed. We are unable to discover anything in the conduct of the parties or in the language of the agreement indicating any intention to condone past offenses or ever again to live together as man and wife. It seems to us that the purpose of the agreement and its sole purpose was to adjust the property rights of the parties and that their agreement to live thereafter separate and apart did not affect the legal consequence flowing from the prior desertion of the wife. Where the offense of desertion has once been committed and has continued for the statutory period, the statute (Civ. Code, sec. 102) points out how 'the desertion is cured.' Anything short of substantial compliance in good faith therewith does not cure the desertion. But it is claimed, and this was apparently the view of the trial court, that the provision of the agreement of separation is a bar to the action by reason of the clause, 'Said first party does hereby release and forever absolutely discharge said party of the second part of and from any and all claims and demands, action and causes of action of any and every name and kind whatsoever as the wife of the said party of the first part.' It will be observed that the language purports only a release of the wife by the husband of all claims and causes of action as the wife. If the husband intended to release all claims and causes of action he had against his wife, the language fails to so express such intention. However, if we treat the clause as intended to import a discharge of any claim or cause of action the husband then had against his wife, it seems to us that, taking the contract in its entirety and considering the context, the intention was to discharge any causes of action involving property rights. The contract was drawn pursuant to the authority given by the code (Civ. Code, sec. 158, 159, supra), and in any construction given it we must keep not only its main purpose in view, but also the statute which authorized it, and this statute forbade altering their 'legal relations except as to property' and except as 'to an immediate separation.' And in Parker v. Parker, 28 Ill. App. 22, wherein it was held that a separation agreement entered into after the desertion of the husband by the wife made primarily for the division of property did not bar a suit by the husband for a divorce on the ground of desertion, the court said: "Upon this state of facts it appeared that the court held there was collusion and a mutual agreement between the appellant and appellee to live separate and apart. Hence there could be no desertion as claimed in the bill. We are inclined to take a different view of the evidence. The appellant in all his evidence appears to be frank and truthful and is corroborated by all the other evidence in his statement of the facts, even by appellee's own daughter. It appears that he made every reasonable effort to induce his wife to return and she refused and would not give him any answer whether she would ever come back. No doubt she was politic in this as she wanted to get an advantageous compromise. A division of the property was what she wanted. He, no doubt, felt that there was no hope of her ever returning and we think the preponderance of the evidence justified him in so thinking. There is no evidence going to show that he desired a separation but simply yielded to the necessities of the case, and to save himself greater loss, as he thought, made the required division of the property. It seems to us he has tried throughout to do what was right and just by the appellee. She has never made any complaints, so far as the evidence shows, of his treatment of her. We think there was no collusion on his part for her to live separate and apart from him. It was a matter of necessity on his part. As he says he has always held himself in readiness to live with her but she still lives apart from him. We must hold, under the circumstances, that the appellant has made out a case of desertion by, at least, a preponderance of the evidence, and that he is entitled to a divorce under the statute." In Nichols v. Nichols (Ky.) 11 S. W. 286, it was held that a written agreement between a husband and wife executed several months after the abandonment settling the rights of property and of custody of the children did not bar a suit for a divorce for the desertion. The court said: "We are at a loss to know upon what ground the petition was dismissed, unless it was upon the ground that a writing was filed, executed in March, 1877, several months after the abandonment, in which it was stated that, the appellant and appellee having separated, certain arrangements in reference to their children and property rights and alimony were entered into, from which the chancellor might have drawn the inference that the separation was by mutual consent. In view of the facts stated in the record, such inference would be wholly unjustified; for it conclusively appears that the appellee abandoned the appellant, and that such abandonment was without any fault of his whatever, and that she had lived separate and apart from him without his fault ever since. The judgment dismissing the appellant's petition must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to grant the appellant a divorce in accordance with the prayer of the petition." In Lemmert v. Lemmert, 103 Md. 57, 63 Atl. 380, wherein it appeared that a contract or deed was executed between husband and wife while the latter was living apart and suing for a divorce a mensa et thoro not expressly providing for but evidently contemplating living apart, it was held that the agreement was not a bar for divorce on the ground of abandonment. The court said: "This brings us to the consideration of that paper, which is dated May 24th, 1901. It does not in terms agree that the parties should live apart, although it does undoubtedly imply that they expected to so live. After reciting the marriage and that they had lived together until the 18th of April, 1900, it proceeds: 'Whereas owing to certain disagreements it is impossible for the said parties hereto to live together in peace and happiness, and whereas the said August Lemmert, considering the condition in life and the health of the said Barbara M. Lemmert, and of her ability to support herself, has agreed to pay her the sum of two hundred dollars in full payment, release and satisfaction of all claims and demands of all kind and nature which she has against him or may have for support and maintenance, or against his property, real, personal and mixed, which he now owns or may hereafter acquire,' etc. She then in consideration of that sum of money paid her, the receipt of which she acknowledged, released him and his property from all such claims, and assigned and conveyed and agreed, at any future time, to make other assignments and conveyances to John R. Lemmert, trustee, of all her right, title, interest and claim of all kind and nature which she had against August Lemmert; by virtue of said marriage, or against his property. The contract cannot be read without reaching the conclusion that they did contemplate living apart for they would not have considered 'her ability to support herself,' or provided for a release of all the wife's claim upon her husband and his property, which he then owned or thereafter acquired, if they expected to live together. Such expressions taken in connection with that quoted above, in which they said it was impossible to live together in peace and happiness, do not seem to admit of any other conclusion. But it does not follow from the language used in the contract, when considered in connection with the surrounding circumstances, that the separation was by mutual consent. The proof is that the wife had left the husband more than a year before, and she had filed a bill for a divorce a mensa et thoro and asking for alimony, just three days before the contract was signed. . . . But in this case we have seen that the facts were such that it cannot be said that the appellant gave his consent to his wife's abandonment of him, but she had left him, was demanding alimony and the contract was executed in settlement of that case. No case that we are aware of has held a deed or contract of this character to be a bar under such circumstances as these."

But when the postnuptial agreement construed in the light of the surrounding facts is indicative of consent to the prior desertion, it is a bar to an action for a divorce on that ground. Crabb v. Crabb, L. R. 1 P. & D. (Eng.) 601, 37 L. J. P. & M. 42, 18 L. T. N. S. 153, 16 W. R. 650; Buckmaster v. Buckmaster, L. R. 1 P. & D. (Eng.) 713; Parkinson v. Parkinson, L. R. 2 P. & D. (Eng.) 25, 39 L. J. P. & M. 14, 21 L. T. N. S. 732; Barclay v. Barclay, 98 Md. 366, 56 Atl. 804; Brown v. Brown, 2 Md. Ch. 316, affirmed 5 Gill. 249; Eckert v. Eckert, 20 Pa. Dist. 836; McCoy v. McCoy, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 367. Thus where it appeared that the parties never cohabited after the marriage and the wife began by insisting on her rights, but in a short time resigned them in consideration of a hundred pounds, it was held that desertion had not been proved. Buckmaster v. Buckmaster, L. R. 1 P. & D. (Eng.) 713. Similarly a written agreement to live separately executed subsequent to the separation of husband and wife is a bar to a divorce on the ground of desertion where the circumambient circumstances are indicative of consent. McCoy v. McCoy, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 367. And an agreement to live separately and apart with collateral provisions for the maintenance of the wife and child, in conjunction with the mutual consent evidenced by living apart for many years, is a bar to a divorce on the ground of desertion. Barclay v. Barclay, 98 Md. 366, 56 Atl. 804. Likewise in Brown v. Brown, 2 Md. Ch. 316, affirmed 5 Gill. 249, wherein it was held that a separation deed executed only a few months before the institution of a suit for a divorce on the ground of abandonment, where the separation had continued for about ten years, precluded the entry of a decree of divorce, the court said: "The parties, we have seen, on the 18th of April last, executed a deed of separation, by which, provision was made for the support of the wife and children, and by which, these parties mutually agreed, during their joint lives, to live separate and apart from each other. This deed, so long as the terms of it are complied with on the part of the husband, exonerates him from the obligation to support his wife, and is a protection against any claim which can be made upon him for supplying her, even with necessities. . . . Having selected their own remedy by the execution of this deed, after the actual separation had lasted nearly or quite ten years, no sufficient reason has been assigned, why within less than three months from the date of the deed, this court should be called upon absolutely to dissolve the marriage. It is not alleged or proved, that any circumstances have transpired since the execution of the deed, which render it necessary or proper, that the relations of the parties as established by that instrument, should be changed, and the court would be almost reluctant to do so, especially in the manner, and to the extent proposed by this bill, unless a case of strong urgency was made out, as the effect of such a change upon the rights secured by the deed might occasion embarrassing, if not injurious, consequences. The third section of the original Act, authorizes the court of equity, upon applications for divorce a vinculo matrimonii, to decree them a mensa et thoro, if the causes proved are sufficient to entitle the parties to such relief, and it has already been stated, that abandonment and desertion alone, without regard to its duration, or the absence from the state of the party complained against, is sufficient cause for a divorce of this qualified character. But a decree of this description is rendered unnecessary, and would, perhaps, be improper in this case, in consequence of the deed of separation, by which the parties have placed themselves, very much in the condition with respect to each other which the law would have empowered the court to do, by decreeing a limited divorce." In Eckert v. Eckert, 20 Pa. Dist. 835, it was held that an agreement, executed after a separation and pending proceedings for a divorce a mensa and followed by the dismissal of the suit, providing for the parties living separately and against mutual molestation and settling questions of maintenance and property rights, was a bar to divorce on the ground of desertion. The court said: "There is not, nor, either in reason or under the authorities cited by the master, can there be, any doubt that an agreement to live apart entered into between husband and wife robs a separation of the one from the other begun subsequently or within two years previously of the character of a desertion in the sense in which that term is by our statutes made a ground of divorce. In itself separation is not such desertion. To constitute the latter there must be both actual abandonment of matrimonial cohabitation and withdrawal from coresidence, and a lack of cause therefor and of consent thereto, and, in order to entitle the abandoned party to a divorce, it must be causelessly and adversely persisted in for the space of two years. . . . It follows inevitably that the moment a separation, though begun as a desertion, becomes consentable, it ceases to go on as such; the essential element of its continuance as an abandonment of the other party without his or her consent is taken away from it, and it thenceforth loses its ability to ripen into a cause of divorce. Another thing about which there is and can be no dispute in this case is that the agreement . . . is on its face and according to its express and unequivocal terms an agreement of separation. Giving it the effect resulting from its plain language and the purpose and intention to be gathered from it, it is therefore clear that, made within a year after the commencement of the desertion, it would have to be deemed to have interrupted the same and converted it into a separation continuing by mutual consent. Necessarily that would put an end to the libellant's right to ask for a divorce on the ground of a desertion . . . persisted in adversely for over two years. But it is contended on her behalf that this effect ought not to be given to the transaction; that she had no intention of agreeing to a separation; that she inquired from her counsel whether, by signing the agreement, she would be debarred from proceeding for an absolute divorce if the libellant persisted in the separation; that she was advised that she would not; that she executed the agreement upon the faith of this information; that except for it and the impression she received from it she would not have joined in the contract; in short, that she became a party to it under a mistake of law, and that therefore she is not to be held to it or affected by it. This contention was made before the master on the basis of evidence submitted in support of the facts involved in it. He has found that separation was in fact intended by the parties, though libellant may have misunderstood the legal effect of her agreement thereto. He has rejected the conclusion urged upon him in view of the doctrine that equity will not relieve against a contract because a party to it, not deceived or mistaken as to any matter of fact out of which the law arises, misconceived the latter." In Parkinson v. Parkinson, L. R. 2 P. & D. (Eng.) 25, 39 L. J. P. & M. 14, 21 L. T. N. S. 732, wherein it appeared that shortly after the desertion of a wife by her husband they executed a deed of separation by which he covenanted to pay her an allowance but it was never paid and she covenanted to live apart from him, it was held that the facts did not constitute such desertion as to entitle her to a divorce. And in Crabb v. Crabb, L. R. 1 P. & D. (Eng.) 601, 37 L. J. P. & M. 42, 18 L. T. N. S. 153, 16 W. R. 650, wherein it appeared that the husband left home after an altercation with his wife about a female servant and a month later a deed of separation was executed, it was held that the agreement prevented the separation from being involuntary, precluding a divorce on the ground of desertion. The court said: "The proposition hardly bears stating, unless, indeed, all 'separations,' voluntary or involuntary, be 'desertion,'—the consent of complaining parties unimportant and the person deserted, not he who was left in the common home, but she who quitted it. It was, however, argued that the deed in this case would have been held invalid in a court of equity, because its provisions stripped the father of all control and supervision over his child. It is needless to inquire whether this proposition is correct or not, because, in this court at least, it has always been held that such deeds are utterly inoperative to abrogate the duty of cohabitation involved in the contract of marriage. And if the mere fact that this deed was impotent to maintain and enforce the permanent separation of the parties be material to this question, that fact may be found in the first principles of matrimonial law. For, no doubt it would have been quite competent to either party the day after they parted, in obedience to their mutual agreement, to come to this court in defiance of that agreement and obtain a decree for restitution of conjugal rights. Their separation, therefore, was not only voluntary at first, but has practically continued to be so."

b. Subsequent Desertion.

A postnuptial agreement to separate entered into prior to or contemporaneous with the desertion alleged in an action for a divorce is construed as giving consent. Cooper v. Cooper, 17 Mich. 205, 97 Am. Dec. 182; Moore v. Moore, 16 N. J. Eq. 275; Litzenberg v. Litzenberg, 57 Pa. Super. Ct. 123, affirming 22 Pa. Dist. 943; Van Voorhees v. Van Voorhees, Wright (Ohio) 636; Bacon v. Bacon, 68 W. Va. 747, 70 S. E. 762. See also Desbrough v. Desbrough, 29 Hun (N. Y.)

592; Curtin v. Curtin, 111 App. Div. 447, 97 N. Y. S. 771; Butler v. Butler, 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. (Pa.) 334. Compare Beauclerk v. Beauclerk [1895] P. 220. Thus an agreement executed in contemplation of an immediate separation to continue "for the space of two years . . . and so on from year to year thereafter, unless either party hereto shall have given the other party at least sixty days' written notice prior to the expiration of any year of his or her intention or desire to terminate said agreement," bars a suit for a divorce on the ground of desertion where there is no evidence of an unequivocal notice to the other party of an election to terminate the agreement. Litzenberg v. Litzenberg, 57 Pa. Super. Ct. 123, affirming 22 Pa. Dist. 943. Similarly it has been held that articles of separation whereby certain property and the custody of some of the children were secured to the wife, even though later followed by a conditional and temporary resumption of marital relations, barred a suit for a divorce on the ground of desertion because the separation was by mutual consent. Cooper v. Cooper, 17 Mich. 205, 97 Am. Dec. 182. In a case wherein it appeared that the alleged abandonment, which was the sole ground of the action, had no existence, the wife having voluntarily left her husband and agreed to live separately for a good and valuable consideration furnished by him, it was held that a divorce could not be granted. See Desbrough v. Desbrough, 29 Hun 592. Likewise an agreement made in contemplation of an immediate separation and reciting that the parties could not agree and live amicably together as man and wife, followed by a short trip together and then separation, has been held to constitute a bar to a divorce based on the separation as abandonment. Bacon v. Bacon, 68 W. Va. 747, 70 S. E. 762. But where it appeared that the wife avowed her purpose to separate from her husband and never to live with him again and on leaving agreed to release all claims she had against his property on the payment of five hundred dollars, it was held that the husband was not precluded from maintaining a suit for a divorce on the ground of her desertion. Stoffer v. Stoffer, 50 Mich. 491, 15 N. W. 564. In Moore v. Moore, 16 N. J. Eq. 275, wherein it was held that a prior agreement to live separately barred an action based on the separation as a ground of divorce, the court said: "It is further argued that a voluntary agreement by husband and wife to live separate is not regarded by the courts as binding, and hence it is insisted that the agreement of the husband can constitute no defence for the desertion of the wife. It is true that courts do not favor agreements by husband and wife to live apart. They are regarded as against the policy of the law, and although not treated for all purposes as absolutely void; they constitute no bar to an action by either of the parties for a restitution of marital rights. Nor does it operate, in the eye of the law, as a release of either of the parties from their matrimonial obligations. It will not, therefore, be permitted to stand in the way of the restitution of such rights and the enforcement of such obligations. But the principle is invoked by the complainant, not for the purpose of sustaining the policy of the law and enforcing the performance by the wife of her conjugal duties, but for the purpose of destroying the marriage relation, in direct contravention of the policy of the law. It would be a gross perversion of the principle to abrogate the contract under color of maintaining the rights of the husband, and thus inflict upon the wife the severest penalty for an act done with the husband's assent." In Butler v. Butler, 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. 385, it was said that a separation agreement is a bar to a divorce based on separation by prior consent, the court saying: "Although no court determining on the marriage relation, recognizes such consent-separations as arrangements strictly legal; yet, when it is clearly shown that the withdrawal of a wife or husband from mutual cohabitation, has been the result of such an understanding or agreement; or where the withdrawal of one has received the subsequent approbation of the other, the continuity of absence under such circumstances is not a 'wilful and malicious desertion.' The malice of the desertion arises from its being the perverse act of the one, in refusing the performance of the matrimonial obligations and duties, which the other has the legal right to require. But when such separation has been the result of mutual arrangements, and these clearly established in proof, then each are in equal fault in this particular, and neither can claim a legal right against the other, in consequence of an act in which he or she has been an equal participant. Such assent or acquiescence, however, are revocable acts. And if either party persists in a state of separation after such revocation, he or she thenceforth occupies the position of a party quitting cohabitation on his or her own motion. . . . But so long as the consent on which the original absence was founded, or continued in, is not withdrawn, a continuity of the absence is not desertion within our Act of Assembly. Of course, if either party has the legal right to separate from the other, for causes which lawfully justify such separation, and subsequently a consent-separation takes place between them; a withdrawal of that consent by the aggressor, will leave the party aggrieved in no worse position than that originally occupied. A refusal to renew cohabitation, would be justified or otherwise, according to the state of things which preceded the separation."

TIPTON

v.

TIPTON.

Iowa Supreme Court—February 17, 1915.

169 Ia. 182; 151 N. W. 90.

Divorce — Desertion — Separation Pursuant to Antenuptial Agreement.

Abnormal conditions in the marital relation instituted by mutual agreement between husband and wife will afford neither party ground for judicial action against the other, as where the wife lived with her people apart from the husband from the time of the marriage, except for his occasional visits, but such abnormal conditions are to be considered in determining, if there existed a marital relation for the husband to sever by desertion and in determining if his conduct constituted a desertion.

[See note at end of this case.]

What Constitutes Desertion.

There may be a separation of husband and wife without desertion, and desertion of a wife by her husband without separation.

[See 138 Am. St. Rep. 147.]

Same.

Where husband and wife never lived together in the same house, to establish a desertion by the husband there must be a radical change in such peculiar marital relation as had existed between the parties.

Same.

Where the wife lived with her parents from the time of marriage, receiving visits from her husband several times weekly, and visiting occasionally at his parents' home, where he lived, there is a marital relation that might be severed by the husband by desertion.

Same.

What is a desertion of one spouse by another is a question of fact.

Evidence of Desertion Sufficient.

Evidence held sufficient, in a suit for divorce, to show that defendant had severed the marital relation by desertion, with an intent to do so, and had continued his action for the statutory period prerequisite to the granting of divorce for such cause.

Desertion as Ground for Divorce — Want of Reasonable Excuse.

It is not alone sufficient to justify a divorce that there was a desertion; but the desertion must have been without reasonable excuse.

Pleading — Cross-Petition as Admission.

In a divorce suit, allegations in the dismissed cross-petition of the defendant may be taken against him as admissions.

Divorce — Desertion — Conduct of Wife Not Justifying.

In a suit for divorce, evidence held insufficient to show that plaintiff wife was guilty of misconduct sufficient to bar her of relief and justify later misconduct of her husband, as having refused to live with him at the home of his parents.

[See 119 Am. St. Rep. 626; 138 Id. 156.]

Same.

In a suit for divorce, evidence held insufficient to show that plaintiff wife was guilty of misconduct sufficient to bar her of relief and justify later misconduct of her husband, having refused to keep house with him.

Same.

Where defendant husband, in a divorce suit, requested his wife, then living with her parents, to go to housekeeping, and she wrote asking him not to think of it until spring, because of her condition, defendant's contention is unsound that this was an agreement to remain separated until spring, so that plaintiff cannot succeed in her attempt to prove a desertion begun by such separation.

Same.

In a suit for divorce for desertion, where plaintiff wife asked her husband to postpone going to housekeeping until spring, on account of her illness, to which he made no response, he cannot claim that between the time of the request and the spring he lived apart from his wife on agreement to resume cohabitation, and therefore there could have been no intention to desert her until after the spring.

Same.

Evidence in divorce held to show that a desertion of plaintiff wife by her husband was without reasonable excuse on his part.

Same.

Want of affection of a wife for her husband, giving rise to a dislike of him, that leads her to refuse reconciliation after a separation or desertion, or that makes such a separation or desertion practically with her consent, will excuse the husband for deserting her only when his own evil conduct has not caused the dislike.

Refusal of Reconciliation.

Evidence held sufficient to show that plaintiff's refusal to live with her husband, after his desertion of her, was caused solely by his own conduct.

[See 119 Am. St. Rep. 623.]

Same.

Where the defendant deserted his wife, her refusal of reconciliation, due to his own evil conduct, is not a ground to deny plaintiff wife relief, nor available as defense.

Desertion — Offer to Return after Lapse of Statutory Period.

Where the right of a wife to a divorce for desertion continued for the statutory period is made out, no court has power to deny her relief, when she insists upon divorce merely because her husband promises to return to the marital relation.

Appeal from District Court, Warren county: FAHEY, Judge.

Action for divorce. Blanche Tipton, plaintiff, and Ralph Tipton, defendant. From judgment rendered, plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Berry & Watson for appellant.

O. C. Brown for appellee.

[183] SALINGER, J.—I. Though defendant responds to the allegation of plaintiff that the parties lived together until October, 1910, by answering that plaintiff never did live with him, and though we concede they did not "live together," as husband and wife ordinarily do, we have no occasion to give these contentions and the departure of the parties from the standard marital relation any exhaustive consideration. Whatsoever they did or failed to do before October was on mutual arrangement, and for mutual convenience, and will afford neither a ground for invoking judicial action against the other. Indeed, none is invoked. Both declare that no fault is found with what occurred before October, 1910, and the desertion charged is based wholly on what occurred after that time. Where the mutual conduct and the relationship maintained contents both parties, the courts are not called upon to standardize conjugal conduct and relationship, and will not divorce parties because they have departed more or less from such standard. But while that which was done upon consent prior to desertion cannot be a basis for granting a divorce, for reasons stated later, we must consider it. At this time we consider it, first, on whether there was a marital relation [184] to sever—and we hold that there was. Second, we must consider it to determine whether the conduct of defendant after October so differed from what it was before as that the difference proves he has severed the marital relation. Ordinarily, it is easy to determine whether there has been a separation. Though separation and desertion are not synonyms, though it is neither true nor essential that the two occur the same instant; though there may be separation without desertion, and though there may be desertion without physical separation by removal to a different domicile,—see Kupka v. Kupka, 132 Ia. 191, 109 N. W. 610,—it remains true that, ordinarily, this element in the proof is made out by showing that the alleged guilty party has removed from the place in which theretofore the parties lived together in the usual way. Whether this defendant severed the relationship cannot be so determined, because the parties did not live together in the usual way. The wife was immediately after the marriage taken to the home of her parents. From then until October 10, 1910, her father supported her. In strictness, defendant never made his home where he had placed the plaintiff, and up to October the marital relation was maintained by visits of defendant at the home of her parents several times a week, and by occasional short period visits of the wife at the home of his parents. If, then, the defendant severed the marital relationship, it must be by the conduct so differing from what it had been before October 10, 1910, as that therefrom a separation from his wife appears as clearly as though the two had been constantly living in their own house, and defendant had removed himself therefrom.

It is not and cannot well be denied that the conduct of the defendant subsequent to October 10, 1910, does differ from what it had been before. While prior to October, 1910, there was a failure to support a wife not in ill health, thereafter there was a failure to support a sick wife and a baby which was born in 1911. While prior to October, 1910, the parties were on friendly terms and at times at the homes of their [185] respective parents, thereafter, and up to the time of the trial, the defendant had no communication whatever with plaintiff and attempted none. Though advised of her serious illness, and of that of his baby, and though sent for by the wife, he made no response in person or otherwise. He never saw the child, nor attempted to see it, until the day of the trial. It does not appear that he caused it to be brought to the trial, or knew that it would be there; nor that he displayed any sign of natural affection when he did see it. This is emphasized because defendant swears on the trial that he was then willing and able to care properly for both wife and child without a claim that he was not as able earlier.

We hold: (1) Though the manner of living together is a departure from the usual in marital life, if the parties are content therewith, it creates a relation which may be severed in the sense of divorce law. (2) There can be no hard and fast rule as to what constitutes such severance, and whether one party has severed the relation must ordinarily depend upon the facts of each case. (3) The evidence shows the defendant did sever the relationship.

II. But mere severance of the relation is not sufficient. There must be a wrongful intent to desert, continued for the statutory period. This, however, means merely that desertion must be intentional.

"The act is wilful when there is a design to forsake the other spouse wilfully, or without cause, and thereby break up the marital union; deliberate intent to cease living with the other as spouse; abnegation of all duties of the marriage relation, not to return.

"Desertion consists in the actual ceasing of cohabitation and the intent in the mind of the offending party to desert the other." Kupka v. Kupka, 132 Ia. 191, 193, 109 N. W. 610, and cases cited.

[186] We think that what we have set out as being proof that defendant severed the relation between plaintiff and himself, and evidence which we discuss later on other branches of our inquiry, establish the second element—that the desertion was intentional, and that the intent continued for the statutory period.

III. While thus two necessary elements have been established, this will not suffice. The act of separation, and the continued intent to remain separate, must be wrongful in the sense that there is no reasonable excuse for the one who separated with such intent. The real conflict in this case is on this head. In substance, the real defense attempted is that plaintiff was and defendant was not in fault.

What shall herein be said on this head should not be misunderstood. To determine whether defendant entertained a wrongful, because inexcusable, intent to desert, an analysis of and pronouncement upon alleged misconduct of each party, and of excuses offered for conduct, is necessary. But we are not attempting to decide whether the misconduct discussed is or may be a ground for divorce. Here, plaintiff is not entitled to a decree except upon proof that she has suffered a statutory desertion. To determine that ultimate question, conduct which of itself is no ground for divorce and evidence addressed to a ground for divorce other than desertion may or may not be relevant. Non-support is no ground for divorce; blows inflicted might warrant a decree on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment, or might fall short of doing so—but the nonsupport or the blows might or might not be relevant on the ultimate question of whether there has been an unjustifiable desertion within the meaning of our statute. These and kindred lines of testimony may or may not have probative value on this ultimate question. Kupka v. Kupka, 132 Ia. 191, 195, 109 N. W. 610; Smith v. Smith, 55 N. J. Eq. 222, 37 Atl. 49, 52.

Our discussion of alleged misconduct and as to whether, if it exists at all, it was without excuse, is merely a method [187] for determining whether or not there has been a statutory desertion; and what is said in the course of it decides nothing except the bearing such misconduct, and the like, has upon whether defendant has unjustifiably deserted—an ultimate question which involves whether he separated himself from his wife with a wrongful intent to desert.

The misconduct of plaintiff, which is urged as a warrant for denying her relief, is presented by the answer as follows:

A. Defendant urged her to live with his parents. She refused to do this, and has persisted in living with her parents; and she has not lived with him.

B. About October 10, 1910, he arranged to commence housekeeping with plaintiff; that he arranged for a house and ground, and bought certain provisions; that he urged his wife to come to him in fulfillment of her obligations as a wife in order that a home for both might be made—and that she wholly refused to comply, and persisted in remaining at the home of her parents.

If there was a request that the wife change to living with his parents, it must have been one made before October, 1910. For defendant pleads and attempts to show that the request which he made about and after October 10th was not one to live with his parents, but to live with him in a house which was not the home of his parents. We are fully persuaded the record does not sustain a claim that there was either request or refusal to change the mode of life pursued by plaintiff up to October. While defendant does testify broadly that his wife deserted him and would not come to make her home with his people, and that he could have "taken her home" if she had wanted to go, there is no evidence that his parents were ever willing to let the couple make their home with them; and defendant says, in terms, that he took her to the home of her parents because he had no home for her. Plaintiff's statement that he never asked her to live with his folks, and that she remained with her own because he wanted her to do [188] so, is fully sustained by the record. All the attendant circumstances and the great weight of all the testimony establish the fact that her remaining at her father's home before October 10th was an arrangement natural under all the conditions existing, and one entered into and maintained by mutual consent, for mutual convenience. At the time of the marriage the mother of the plaintiff was in such helpless physical condition as to supply one natural reason for a consent that the daughter might, for a time at least, remain with her. Defendant himself testifies that his wife wanted to remain with her father because the father had a broken leg; that she desired to stay with him until the leg was well, and that it was in accordance with this request that he went to his folks. While, because he has not appealed, his dismissed cross-petition is not, in strictness, to be treated as a pleading in the case, it is still in the record in the sense that its admissions are competent against the one who filed it—and it is therein pleaded that the daughter desired to remain with the father until he recovered; that at the same time she requested the defendant to remain with his parents until some arrangement could be made for their living together, and that he complied with her request. It appears by a clear preponderance that early in July he arranged for her staying until her confinement, which was thought to be due January following, was passed. So far from complaining of her living at the home of her father, he seeks to excuse himself for not visiting her there more frequently on the ground that his work made it practically impossible for him to be with her more; and he asserts that she acquiesced in this and made no objection to his thus attending to his business.

It is very clear that plaintiff was guilty of no misconduct in remaining at the home of her father up to October 10, 1910.

The next contention is that refusing to go to housekeeping, on request made about October 10, 1910, is misconduct.

[189] Unless we reabstract the record in this opinion, it is impossible to do more on this head than to point out the ultimate deductions which we find should be drawn from the evidence. It so appears that about October, 1910, the husband and wife came to an understanding that some time in the next spring they would remove to South Dakota, and so far from then feeling unwilling to live with her husband, she made preparations for that venture. Somehow, defendant concluded it would be an aid to the Dakota project to begin a temporary housekeeping between the middle or end of October and the coming spring, and he requested her to co-operate. By way of arranging for this, he obtained the consent of his family that the couple might live in a house then vacant, on a farm then leased by his folks. He says he thinks the house was all right because a family had lived in it the year before; it looked nice; that he does not know how many rooms it had; that it had a roof, but he couldn't say whether it was good or not. By way of further arrangement he bought two barrels of apples, quite a quantity of tomatoes and cans to can them in, and he also provided for all the potatoes they would want to eat, and for fuel. He provided no furniture, but his mother says that he told plaintiff she could get anything she wanted, and that "he would pay for it and set up housekeeping." There is nothing to show he had credit, and his own testimony, perhaps colored by the fact that alimony was in issue, indicates he had no means. This sums up the preparations for this housekeeping; and it corroborates the claim of plaintiff that defendant never offered to furnish her a home, any place. The plaintiff responded to this request by letter. Considering her evident inability to express herself aptly in writing, the letter shows an affectionate interest in him. As to the request, she writes: "Ralph, I just can't come down," which is preceded by a statement that she does not feel a bit well. She adds: "Oh, Ralph, don't think about keeping house until spring. I will either be better or be a thing of the past." She writes she hasn't done much that [190] week, and that her mother may not go to Dakota with her father as the latter desires, because she (plaintiff) guesses her mother is afraid to leave her. This letter is relied on as the main evidence of a refusal which constitutes misconduct. We do not so view it, and think that such refusal as the letter amounts to is not unjustified, and is not misconduct. It should be borne in mind that in July preceding, defendant had arranged with plaintiff's father that she should remain at the father's home until her confinement was passed, and that this proposed arrangement to go housekeeping not only overturned that arrangement, but contemplated, as a temporary aid for removal to Dakota, that the wife, then within two or three months of her confinement, should in the winter season go to housekeeping in a "home" thus, and thus only provided. Moreover, the Dakota project was not only abandoned by the defendant, but he claims he informed his wife of that fact early in the year 1911; so that had she gone to this place, if there was one to go to, the reason given for moving there at all would have ceased to be a reason shortly after she had made the change.

This failure to join in the proposed housekeeping was in the circumstances not unreasonable, and did not justify the conduct of defendant thereafter. Kupka v. Kupka, 132 Ia. 193, 194, 109 N. W. 610; Smith's case, supra.

In this connection it becomes necessary to consider a claim that the action is, in any event, prematurely brought, because the letter written by the plaintiff in some way created a time limit which did not expire until the spring of 1911, and that no desertion could begin until then. This proceeds on the theory that the letter was a refusal to live with plaintiff until the spring of 1911 arrived, that this was acceded to, and that plaintiff may not agree to be separated during a fixed period and make separation for that period the basis of claiming a desertion. In our opinion, this contention is not tenable. [191] In the first place, the letter made no request for such an arrangement and it obtained none such. An affectionate request to defer housekeeping until spring, made by one who on consent was to live with her parents until her confinement was over, was not yet confined, and was sick when she asked such postponement of housekeeping, is neither a refusal to live with her husband until spring nor a consent that there shall be a separation until spring. At most, it is a request that the arrangement made for her living at her father's be not changed till spring. In essence, it was a plea that no housekeeping be started then because she was too ill, and a request for mere indulgence in beginning housekeeping, which housekeeping was an illogical, quickly abandoned and inopportune makeshift pending a removal to another state.

Next, as defendant made no response, and there was, therefore, no agreement reached, it cannot well be claimed that between October and the spring following he acted under the belief that for that period he was living apart under agreement to resume cohabitation at the end of the period, and that, therefore, there could be no intent to desert until that period had ended. Of course, if he entertained such belief erroneously, but in good faith, his mere absence up to the spring of 1911 would not prove such intent. But we feel that he did not so believe. Clearly, the letter itself gives no ground for it. He soon abandoned the plan of going to Dakota, and any claimed agreement covers only such absence on his part as was made necessary to carry out his ideas of preparing for the removal to Dakota. If he believed that they would live together and go away together in the spring, how can it be accounted for that between the receipt of the letter and the end of the period covered by such claimed agreement he ceased visiting her and had no communication with her? During that period he failed to visit her in confinement, and her child in its sickness, though sent for. In his answer he declares that he has neither knowledge nor means of information as to how mother and child obtained support. Was this the conduct [192] of one who had no intent to abandon the relations and duties of a husband and who believed that while there was an agreement to delay housekeeping for a fixed time, he and his wife would soon assume full conjugal relationship? We are constrained to believe that the period between October, 1910, and the spring of 1911 is not to be subtracted from the time in which an intent to desert was entertained; that the intent to desert present after the spring of 1911 was in existence before—and hold that the suit was not premature.

IV. From October 10, 1910, to the time of the trial, defendant, as said, had no communication with plaintiff, and attempted none. Though advised of the wife's serious illness, that a child had been born and, later, that the child was sick unto death, and though sent for by the wife, he responded in no manner. So far as appears, he made no inquiry as to the condition of the mother or as to the birth of the child, and made none after the child was born. He declares in his answer his supreme indifference by stating that he has neither knowledge nor information sufficient to form a belief as to how the wife and child had been kept alive during some two years. He never saw the child until he saw it on the trial. It does not appear that he caused it to be brought there, or knew that it would be there, nor that he displayed any sign of natural affection when he did see it. Yet he insisted on the hearing that he had affection for the child, and we are asked to believe him when he then said that he was then willing and able to care properly for both wife and child. He makes no explanation why he was not able to do this earlier, and why he made no attempt to do it.

The record presents the following excuses for defendant's failure to visit or hold communication with his wife, and for his treatment of his wife and child. He says he was not notified when the child was born; that at the time it was born he was working away from home at some place, he does not "just remember." This, however, is coupled with the statement that he heard of the birth within three or four days, but [193] did not go to see about it; that he "never went near." Another statement is, that he can hardly say why he made no effort to see the baby, and did not see it until the trial, and that, for another thing, "he didn't just exactly like to make the neighbors gossip out of it more than anything else. That is the only reason I can say. By neighbors' gossip I mean that when we wasn't living together it looked kind of bad, you know, for a person to go out to meeting any place like that, and I kind of hated to not being around the child myself and the way I never did, I never was a great hand over children."

Finally, he gives his conclusion that he "wasn't wanted over there;" that at first her father made him feel pretty welcome, but after a while he acted as if he did not care whether he came or not; that he got so he only spoke to him on the street when they met; that he took the hint from this that he wasn't wanted up here and, therefore, he didn't care to go there. He both limits and amplifies this by a statement that his wife wrote him in a letter, which he believes he can but does not produce, that her father was mad at him and that he so had orders to stay away—that this was one of the main reasons for his not going. While his claim that the testimony as to this letter is not denied by plaintiff is technically true, it does not follow that the existence of the letter is established, or that the excuses of defendant are valid. His theory on this head is not undisputed. It is met by the circumstances, by the testimony of plaintiff's father that he knows of no reason why defendant did not come; that they had no trouble whatever; that he was particular not to let him know his visits were distasteful or let it be known that he did not care for him to remain there, and that he talked to him in a friendly way. Defendant's contention is also met by the fact that when his mother went to see the sick baby, she was treated nicely, and that she informed defendant of it.

V. Defendant urges that the plaintiff is wanting in natural affection for him. That she did not desire reconciliation—[194] in effect, that she should have no relief because the separation between the parties was really by her consent. It is undoubted that where one who charges desertion complains of a justified departure, and it appears that if it were not for the contumacy of the plaintiff a return could be brought about, such a showing of want of proper affection on part of the complaining party will authorize a court of equity to deny relief on the ground that such absence is, in effect, assented to by him. Wright v. Wright, 80 Mich. 572, 45 N. W. 365; Smith v. Smith, 55 N. J. Eq. 222, 37 Atl. 49. On the other hand, it is manifest that if the want of feeling on the part of complainant and the absence of a desire for reconciliation is due to the conduct of the defendant, he cannot well defeat relief against him by using a change or want of feeling which is due to his own misconduct. Smith v. Smith, supra. Mr. Justice Pitney, speaking for the Chancery Court of New Jersey in the Smith case, well states the principle:

"Volenti non fit injuria does not apply where defendant himself is responsible for the feelings of aversion entertained by the wife. If by his conduct he has alienated her affections and given her good cause to dislike him, and to have no desire to live with him, he cannot take advantage of those feelings to excuse himself for a continued desertion with any serious and honest effort to terminate it."

The case holds, also, that misconduct has probative value on whether refusing to resume relations is due to aversion created by such misconduct. The question is one of evidence.

Plaintiff says that when he left her in October she did want to live with him, and had no other thought or expectation; that for a long time afterwards she was willing to live with him; that she thought well enough of him; that she sent for him when the baby was sick, and that she certainly would not have done this had she not wanted to see him. While, in strictness, it is true she did not ask defendant to resume [195] marital relations, if we assume that in all the circumstances disclosed by the record she should have asked this of him, the foregoing is fairly equivalent to an effort on her part to have him return, made while she desired his return. If we assume that this effort must be continuous, it is true that she did not continue it. She finally reached a state of mind that makes her say that as he just went off and left her she sees no reason why she should want to live with him; that she never said anything to him about it because she thought he did not want to live with her. In time the attitude of the father to his child added to these feelings resting in wounded pride seems to have had its natural effect, and she writes him complaining that she has suffered everything for his sake, and now he will not notice his own flesh and blood; that she would have tried to live with him but when he would not look at his own baby she just couldn't have the heart to think of living with him. As the decision here cannot be clearer than the facts upon which it is based, we have almost too fully for the purposes of an opinion set out much of the conduct of defendant and have pointed out the weakness of his excuses. These make it fairly plain that the change in the feelings of plaintiff is not merely captious. But there is more.

Defendant was asked if he had not been in trouble "about that time" (probably referring to the time at which he claims plaintiff refused to come to or live with him). He replied that, to his knowledge, he was not in trouble. Being asked if he was not then or shortly afterwards under indictment in that court he answered, "Well, not specially, I think." Being next asked whether it was not an indictment caused by trouble with another woman, he said, "Yes." To the next question, whether at that time he did have trouble with another woman, he answered, "Not that I know of." Then he was asked, "Well, you found it out later on," and he answered, "I don't quite catch your meaning." Finally being pressed with the question, "You found it out later on, anyway, you had been [196] having improper relations with another woman,"—he made no reply.

Plaintiff testifies that in March, 1912, she was informed defendant had another child named Roy; that its mother wrote her so on a postal card; that everybody says there is such a child; that it is younger than her own and is out west of Indianola, and that since hearing this she had never wanted to live with her husband. The trial judge asked her: "Is there any reason, if he would take you and keep you and provide for you, and live with you as your husband, do you know any reason why you couldn't do that?" She answered: "I couldn't possibly. He is the father of my baby and I will educate her all right. I couldn't possibly live with him. He has got another child, and I don't want to live with him. I am not positive he has had intercourse with any other woman since I married him, but they say he has, he said he had."

There is no denial that he said this.

The text of 14 Cyc. page 620, is, that failure to effect or attempt a reconciliation will not constitute desertion where there is just cause for such failure.

It has been held to be a defense for the wife who departed, justifiably, that after returning from a hospital to the home of her parents she remained away from her husband because he was indifferent. Kupka v. Kupka, 132 Ia. 195, 109 N. E. 610. While we do not agree with the contention in the brief of appellant, that she never refused to live with her husband, we conclude that when she finally did refuse, the refusal was justified.

VI. It is finally insisted that when the defendant testified and informed the trial court that he was now willing and able to live with his wife, and to properly care for her and her child, this was an offer of reconciliation, and that her refusal to accept the same justified the dismissal of her petition which ensued. Having found that the intent to desert existed at all times since October 10, 1910, this attempted reconciliation, if we treat it as such, was made after the [197] statute period had elapsed, and is not available as a defense, nor a ground for denying plaintiff relief.

An offer of reconciliation by a guilty spouse after the expiration of the statutory period of desertion does not obliterate the offense and so deprive the innocent spouse of the right to a divorce. 14 Cyc. 620.

Waiving, for the sake of argument, the contention that this attempted reconciliation came too late, it must still have been one which the court could reasonably find to be made in good faith, and likely to be fairly carried out. In the Smith case, supra, there was substantially such an offer of reconciliation and substantially such claim for its nonacceptance. The court held that, assuming what occurred to be an offer of reconciliation, the conduct of the husband in the past was such that his mere promise of amendment, if made, was insufficient; that in such circumstances there should have been some guarantee or assurance—and it is concluded that as to such an issue it is reasonable and fair to judge the future by the past.

VII. Appellee assures us by the brief of his counsel that if there be an affirmance the parties will in all probability, and in the course of time, accept a suggestion of the trial judge and resume relations; that in that event the plaintiff will have a good husband, able to provide for her, and the little girl will have a father to care for her and provide for her education; that they should be left to their own resources to reconcile whatever difficulties may exist between them, and to take up their reciprocal obligations to each other and their child. There is a remark in the Kupka case to the effect that there is no good reason why the parties should not adjust their differences, "which are not serious," and fulfil the marital obligations which they have assumed. This, of course, was not intended to state the essence of the decision, and on its face discloses that the differences existing are not serious. Giving to that detached phrase in that decision [198] every reasonable weight, it will scarcely authorize us to proceed upon the lines suggested by appellee.

Passing, for the moment, a graver matter, —the question of our power—this record hardly indicates that defendant is pining for a home in which to cherish his wife and child. Judging the future by the past, an impartial observer finds little basis for the optimism of counsel. One point not before noticed throws a sinister light on the tenderness of defendant is likely to display. In the petition, the date of the marriage was fixed as in January, 1910. The answer declared, in at least two places, that it occurred in June. Defendant then went on the stand and in answer to a question which stated that this mistake in date had already been corrected, testified that the marriage took place in June. With the date already corrected, this could have no purpose except to publish that the child born in January, 1911, was begotten out of wedlock.

But, in any event, we have no power to deny divorce because of such assurances as are here given. Such may be given in every divorce appeal, as an inducement to reverse or affirm. Of course, the injured party can forgive and is not obliged to demand a divorce, no matter how much entitled thereto. But how can this court, against the protest of one who demands divorce, and has proven herself entitled to the same, refuse relief because the guilty party is of opinion that if the court will disregard the law a happy marital union may result. Where the court is convinced that the parties may and will become reconciled if there be no divorce, it may have some bearing on determining whether it be conclusively proven that a divorce should be granted. In other words, the feeling of the parties towards each other may be such as to make a reconciliation so very likely as to create a doubt whether, in spite of appearances, any serious wrong was perpetrated by one against the other—but that is surely the limit. We do not exercise the pardoning power, and no matter how sincerely counsel may be of opinion that society will be benefited more by refusing a divorce than granting it, we have no [199] choice where the requirements of the law are met and a litigant demands what the law grants.

We are constrained to differ from the learned trial judge, and to hold that defendant has been guilty of desertion as plaintiff charges. It follows that there must be a reversal.

VIII. In view of the result below, it is possible that the controversy as to alimony was not given any very considerable consideration, and we feel unwilling, and we might say unable, upon the record presented to us, to undertake decreeing what financial aid this defendant should give his wife and child. We, therefore, remand this cause for a decree in harmony with this opinion, and with direction that the trial court, either upon the record now made or such additional one as it may order or the parties may desire to present, make provision in said decree for such arrangements by way of alimony as in its judgment the evidence then before it warrants.

Reversed and remanded.

Deemer, C. J., Ladd and Gaynor, JJ., concur.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that while an agreement to live separately precludes a divorce for desertion if the arrangement is by mutual consent, after the consent has been revoked, the wife may maintain an action for a divorce based on the subsequent acts of the husband as constituting desertion. The cases on this point are collated in the note to Canning v. Canning, reported ante, this volume, at page 344.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Monongalia county.

Action for divorce. Marshall W. McCoy, plaintiff, and Amanda McCoy, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Van A. Barrickman and Chas. E. Hagg for appellant.

W. S. John and E. M. Everly for appellee.

[64] POFFENBARGER, J.—The trial court's refusal, in this cause, of a decree of divorce a vinculo matrimonii, on the ground of desertion for a period of more than three years, is fully sustained by the record.

No replication to the defendant's answer, unqualifiedly denying desertion or abandonment on her part and averring expulsion from her home by the plaintiff, as well as his subsequent consent to her living separate and apart from him and his offer to maintain her elsewhere, was filed, wherefore the answer is taken as true for the purposes of the case and bars the relief prayed for in the bill, notwithstanding the evidence adduced by the plaintiff to sustain its allegations, since the defendant took no depositions. Sansom v. Blankenship, 53 W. Va. 411, 44 S. E. 408; Bierne v. Ray, 37 W. Va. 571, 16 S. E. 804; Snyder v. [65] Martin, 17 W. Va. 276, 41 Am. Rep. 570; Findlay v. Smith, 6 Munf. (Va.) 142, 8 Am. Dec. 733; Cocke v. Minor, 25 Grat. (Va.) 246. Nothing in our own jurisdiction, conflicting with this rule, is cited or has been discovered.

As shown by a nunc pro tunc order, there was produced and read to the court on the hearing a certified copy of a recorded written agreement of separation between the parties, which was made a part of the record and brought up to this court. The order shows no objection to the introduction of the copy of the agreement. On the contrary, it says the fact was admitted and agreed to in the presence of the court and it fully sustains the averment of a voluntary separation. Such admissions and agreements made in court and acted upon by the court are binding. Hoggs Eq. Proc. sec. 847; Savage v. Blanchard, 148 Mass. 248, 19 N. E. 396; Lewis v. Wilson, 151 U. S. 551, 14 S. Ct. 419, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 267; 30 Cyc. 1280; Jones on Ev. 2 Ed. sec. 257. An agreed separation bars right to divorce. Bacon v. Bacon, 68 W. Va. 747, 70 S. E. 762; Hall v. Hall, 69 W. Va. 175, 71 S. E. 103, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 758.

The decree complained of is not erroneous and it will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

NOTE.

In the reported case it is held that a certified copy of a recorded written agreement of separation between a husband and his wife fully sustains an averment of a voluntary separation, barring an action for a divorce on the ground of desertion. For the general discussion of the question whether a separation agreement is a bar to an action for a divorce, see the note to Canning v. Canning, reported ante, this volume, at page 344.

ECCLES ET AL.

Utah Supreme Court—June 7, 1913.

43 Utah 91; 134 Pac. 614.

Party Walls.—Termination of Right — Destruction of Wall.

Where one has acquired an easement of support in a party wall, its accidental destruction determines the easement, and extinguishes all rights arising thereunder.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Plaintiff, by purchase, acquired an easement for the support of its building to the height of three stories in a wall five stories high, standing wholly on defendant's land. Defendant's building was thereafter entirely destroyed by fire, leaving the wall standing and furnishing the same support to plaintiff's building as it did before, but not sufficiently strong to support the kind of building which defendant intended to erect on the same site.

Held, that the plaintiff's easement had not terminated, that defendant had the right to remove the wall using ordinary care to avoid injury to plaintiff's building and to rebuild without unnecessary delay, provided he gave to plaintiff the same right of support in the new wall that he had in the old.

Appeal from District Court, Weber county: HARRIS, Judge.

Action for injunction. Commercial National Bank of Ogden, plaintiff, and David Eccles et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. AFFIRMED.

[92] This action was originally commenced against David Eccles, S. T. Whitaker, and Roy Sheedy to enjoin them from tearing down and removing a certain stone and brick wall situated along the south of defendant Eccles' land, which constituted the north boundary of the land and building owned by the plaintiff. During the pendency of the action on this appeal, David Eccles died, and the cause is continued in the name of his administrator. For the purpose of brevity and convenience, the name of Eccles will be used in this opinion instead of the administrator. It appears from the record that the other defendants have no interest in the subject-matter of the action other than as employees of the defendant Eccles; hence further reference will not be made to them.

The findings of fact made by the trial court, all of which are within the issues, are so far as material here, as follows:

"(2) That the defendant, David Eccles, is the owner and in possession of the following described real property situated in Ogden City, Utah, to wit: A part of lot seven (7), block twenty-five (25), plat 'A,' Ogden City survey, and further described as beginning at the northeast corner of said lot seven (7), running thence south along the west boundary of Washington Avenue 71.80 feet to the," etc.

"(3) That the plaintiff Commercial National Bank of Ogden, was and is the owner and holds the title to certain lands lying south of the land of the defendant, and that between [93] such lands so owned by the plaintiff and the south boundary of defendant's land described in finding of fact No. 2 there is an intervening irregular strip of land which the plaintiff purchased from the defendant David Eccles in the year 1903, and paid to said defendant for said irregular strip of land the sum of $1894, and upon said strip of land the north side of the plaintiff's building was constructed and is situated.

"(4) That along the south boundary of the premises described in the second finding of fact there is a stone foundation and a brick wall upon said foundation extending upward from the ground three stories; that said foundation is thirty-six inches thick, that the first story of said brick wall is thirty-two inches thick, and the two upper stories are twenty-eight inches thick. That the said wall is situated wholly upon the said ground belonging to the defendant David Eccles.

"(5) That the plaintiff constructed its building upon its land immediately south of the said land of the said defendant David Eccles in the year 1903, and at that time, for the sum of $634.67 paid to the said defendant, the plaintiff purchased and became the owner of an easement in the foundation and brick wall situated along the south boundary of said defendant's premises from the basement to the center of the sills of the third story, and the said plaintiff has used said wall for the support and maintenance of its building situated on its said premises from the time of the construction of the same. That no interest in the wall and foundation other than the easement aforesaid, and no interest in the lands upon which said wall stands was purchased by the plaintiff from the defendant.

"(6) That the joists supporting the roof and different floors of plaintiff's building situated upon its said land along the north side thereof rest upon and are supported by the wall on the south boundary of said defendant's land, and the steam and water pipes attached to and as a part of plaintiff's building are now attached to and placed in said wall, and were placed there at the time of its construction [94] under the rights granted to plaintiff by the said defendant, and that the said wall, together with the openings for the joists and other supports and for the placing the steam and water pipes therein, are necessary for the support of plaintiff's said building, and are a part of said building, and the rights to have the joists and other supports, steam and water pipes placed in the north wall of said defendant's building belong to and are a part of the rights belonging to plaintiff's easement in and to said wall.

"(7) That at the time of the construction of plaintiff's building on its said premises, and prior thereto, and since that date, up to and including the 15th day of November, 1911, there was situated upon the premises of the defendant David Eccles a five-story brick and stone building with a basement, and that the said building was on said 15th day of November, 1911, partially destroyed by fire, but that the walls of said building were left standing, and that the south wall was and is sufficient and ample for the support and maintenance of the plaintiff's building as constructed on its said premises.

"(8) That the said five-story building on the lands of defendant has been twice wholly destroyed by fire, so that the walls alone were left. That by reason of the action of said fires and the elements thereof said south wall has been so impaired and damaged that it is insufficient upon which to safely rebuild or to support such a building as was formerly situated and supported on defendant's land, and that same is insufficient to support such higher modern building as defendant proposes to erect on his land.

"(9) That the plaintiff's building has no other or additional support along its north side, save the support of the said wall, and, that the taking out and removing of said wall would cause the plaintiff's building to fall, and become a mass of ruins.

"(10) That the said defendant David Eccles is desirous of and intends to construct a new and more modern building upon his said land, and that the said south wall of said building is insufficient in its present condition to support [95] the building which the said defendant contemplates and is desirous of and intends to construct upon said premises, and that the said wall cannot be made sufficiently strong to support the contemplated building without great expense and without reinforcing same by taking additional space of the said defendant's premises, and for that reason the said defendant desires to remove and tear down the present wall along the south boundary of his said premises to make room for and permit the construction of the new building as aforesaid.

"(11) That prior to the institution of this action the said defendant David Eccles served written notice upon the plaintiff of his intention to tear down and remove said wall, but without offering any easement or support in the new wall which he proposed to construct, or any protection or support to the plaintiff's premises by reason of the removal of said wall, and maintained and contended that the said plaintiff had no right or interest in the present wall, and should have no right or interest in the wall to be constructed.

"(12) That all of said plaintiff's building is occupied by tenants, and that the Fred M. Nye Company hold the ground or first floor and basement under lease, and have therein an extensive and large stock of men's furnishing goods."

As conclusions of law the court found:

"(1) That the plaintiff is the owner of an easement for the support of its building in the present wall situated on the defendant's premises along the south boundary thereof, and that the said plaintiff is entitled to a like easement and support and right in the wall to be constructed by said defendant over and along the south boundary of his said premises.

"(2) That the defendant David Eccles is the owner of the said wall and the ground on which it has stood, subject only to the easement of support of the plaintiff in said wall, as stated in the findings of fact.

[96] "(3) That said wall is insufficient to support another building of like kind as that destroyed, and insufficient to support such new and modern building as defendant proposes to erect, and that the defendant David Eccles is entitled to tear down and remove the wall situated along the south boundary of his said premises, exercising such due care and diligence in the prosecution thereof as will prevent injury to the plaintiff's premises.

"(4) That the said defendant will be required to replace said wall at his own expense with such new and stronger wall as will meet the requirements of his said new proposed building, and shall so construct the said wall so as to afford and give to the plaintiff the same easement, right, and support and use for its building in the said wall to be constructed as the plaintiff now has and enjoys in the present wall."

A judgment responsive to and supported by the foregoing findings of facts and conclusions of law was rendered in favor of plaintiff. The judgment, among other things, provides that "David Eccles is hereby permitted to remove the wall mentioned . . . at his own expense with due care so as not to injure plaintiff's building; . . . and the said plaintiff is hereby adjudged and is hereby awarded the same rights, easement, and support in the wall to be constructed by said defendant, David Eccles, and the south boundary of his premises as plaintiff now has and enjoys in the present wall." To reverse the judgment, defendants appeal.

Richards & Boyd for appellants.

Valentine Gideon and J. G. Heywood for respondent.

MCCARTY, C. J. (after stating the facts).

—One of the grounds upon which appellants ask for a reversal of the judgment is that the findings of facts are not supported by the greater weight of the evidence. We do not deem it necessary to a clear understanding of the questions presented for us to either review the evidence in detail or set forth the substance thereof. We think it is sufficient to here state that we have carefully examined the record; and, while we find that there is a conflict in the testimony of some of the [97] witnesses on certain issues, we are of the opinion that the findings of fact are supported by a clear preponderance of the evidence. The wall in question is entirely upon the land of appellant Eccles, and, as found by the court, respondent has "no interest in the lands upon which said wall stands."

There is much evidence, however, which tends to show that respondent purchased an interest in and became part owner of the wall up to the third story thereof. But since the court found that respondent acquired an easement only in the wall, and as respondent has not appealed or filed a cross-assignment of errors, we shall, for the purposes of this appeal, assume that respondent acquired no greater property right in the wall than an easement.

The important question, therefore, is: Did respondent's right to an easement in the wall terminate when the wall was rendered useless to appellant Eccles by the destruction of his building of which the wall formed a part? The position of appellants on this question is clearly stated by their counsel in their printed brief as follows: The purposes of the wall were "to support mutually two buildings, one of five stories and the other (respondent's building) of two stories. The rights of the adjoining owners therein were mutual, a cross-easement, each with the right to have its building supported. When from calamity or accident such wall became useless for either of these mutual purposes, the condition or relation ceases. The purposes were gone." And again they say: "The destruction of a party wall for the purpose for which it was used during the easement attaching thereto ends the easement and all rights thereunder." Respondent acquired by purchase from appellant an easement in the wall up to the third story thereof, and has used the same as the north wall of its building. The joists of respondent's building are fastened to and rest on the wall.

The authorities practically all agree that, where a party has acquired an easement of support in a party wall, the accidental destruction of the wall terminates the easement [98] and extinguishes all rights arising thereunder. Therefore, if the wall in question had been rendered useless or unsafe as a support to respondent's building, or if it had been entirely destroyed by the fire, it might be argued with much force that such impairment or destruction terminated the easement. But this case does not fall within this well recognized rule. Under existing conditions respondent's easement—property right—in the wall is just as valuable and available as a support to its building as it was before the destruction of appellant Eccles' building. The question therefore arises: May Eccles, because of the destruction by fire of his building which so weakened the wall that it cannot be retained and used as a support for the kind of building he contemplates erecting on the site of the one destroyed, deprive respondent of its property, easement, in the wall which furnishes the same support to its building as it did before the fire occurred? To permit Mr. Eccles to tear down the wall and remove this support from respondent's building without requiring him, at his own expense, to erect another wall in its place, and thereby provide the same support for respondent's building as the present wall furnishes, would in effect be a confiscation of respondent's property.

It does not follow because the wall is unsafe as a support for the kind of building appellant Eccles intends to erect that he has the right to terminate respondent's easement of support therein for its building, and proceed to take down and remove the wall to the irreparable damage of respondent. That Eccles has the right to remove the wall and erect another in its stead suitable for the building he contemplates erecting no one will deny, but in doing so he is bound to use ordinary care to avoid injury to respondent's building and to rebuild without unnecessary delay. (Putzel v. Drovers' etc. Nat. Bank, 78 Md. 349, 28 Atl. 276, 22 L.R.A. 632, 44 Am. St. Rep. 298; Lexington Lodge v. Beal, 94 Miss. 521, 49 So. 883.) In the case last cited the principle of law applicable to the case at bar is well illustrated in the following language:

[99] "Where one of the buildings supported by a party wall has been destroyed, and the wall itself has been so weakened as to be dangerous or insufficient as a support for the building which the owner of the destroyed building is about to erect, he has the right to tear down the insufficient or dangerous party wall and replace it with one stronger and better, provided he gives to the adjoining house the same right of support as it had in the old one. He is but exercising his legitimate rights of property. If it follow from this that the owner of the adjoining building will be put to inconvenience while the work of demolition and construction is going on, this is an unavoidable consequence attendant upon the adoption and use of party walls. It cannot be the law that the fortunate adjoining owner, whose building is not destroyed, and who may be content with the wall, although weakened or partially destroyed, can, by refusing to the co-owner, whose building has been destroyed, permission to tear down and rebuild the wall, compel him either not to build again or to build only such a structure as the wall remaining may suffice to support. . . . While the adjoining owner, whose building has been destroyed, and who wishes to tear down and rebuild an insufficient or dangerous party wall, will be accorded this right, it must be exercised so as to work no avoidable injury to the owner of the adjoining building. He will be liable if the work is done negligently and damage to the co-owner results therefrom."

See, also, 30 Cyc. 781, 782.

The judgment is affirmed, with costs to respondent.

STRAUP, J.—I concur. The plaintiff, for a valuable consideration, purchased an interest, not in the defendant's building, but a portion of the south wall of his building five stories high. The portion of the wall in which such interest was purchased was but three stories high, and in length that of plaintiff's building. It was purchased to furnish the north wall for its building three stories high, and to support the north side of it. True, it purchased no interest in the soil. But the interest purchased in the wall and the purpose for which it was purchased necessarily gave the plaintiff an interest also in the soil upon which the wall rested, so long as it remained and was suitable for such purpose. Such interest was perpetual and unconditional. The defendant's building was injured by fire. The south wall was injured to such an extent as not to be sufficient, as found by the court, [100] to support a building as was formerly supported on the defendant's land or such a building—ten or eleven stories high—as the defendant proposes and intends to erect. But that portion of the wall in which the plaintiff for a valuable consideration purchased an absolute and perpetual interest was not materially injured, and is sufficient to safely and properly support the plaintiff's building in the future as it did in the past, and for such uses and purposes is substantially as good now as it was before. That interest, that use, that purpose—the thing bought, the thing sold and for which the plaintiff paid its money—was not destroyed or materially impaired. The plaintiff still has what it had bought and what the defendant had sold. That the wall was damaged or impaired for other purposes is the defendant's misfortune. The plaintiff is not to blame for that, nor should it be charged with it by compelling it to surrender that which it bought and paid for and still owns and possesses. Observations are made that the defendant should not suffer the whole loss occasioned by the accidental fire. Every one under such circumstances must bear his own loss. What the plaintiff suffered in such respect it must bear. So, too, must the defendant. The plaintiff with respect to the question in hand suffered none, for it still has about all it had before the fire. That the defendant has not is his, not the plaintiff's loss. And for this reason do I see a distinction between the case here and one where had the wall been wholly destroyed or damaged, or that portion of it in which the plaintiff has an interest. For, in the latter, the interest of the plaintiff as well as that of the defendant would be destroyed or damaged. The thing in which they both had a common interest would no longer exist or be useful to either. But they had no common interest in the whole wall. The common interest was only to the extent of three stories and the length of plaintiff's building. That was all the defendant sold and all the plaintiff bought. Above or beyond that, the defendant granted, and the plaintiff acquired, no interest. The thing so bought and sold and the purpose for which it was [101] bought and sold was unrestricted and unconditional. Of course, they had the right to make their own bargain; but that is the bargain made by them. So above or below the third story, wind may blow and fire rage, but if they do not damage or impair what the defendant sold and granted, and what the plaintiff unconditionally bought and paid for and still possesses and enjoys, I see no reason why it should be compelled to surrender it because the defendant sustained a loss of property in which the plaintiff was given and had no interest whatever. Then it is also said that, if the plaintiff is permitted to use the new wall for the same purpose it used the old, it is granted or given something without consideration. Not so. It now has what it theretofore bought and paid for. The wall, for that purpose, is substantially as good now as it was before the fire. It, however, is not sufficient to support such a building as the defendant proposes and intends to erect. So the court, under its equitable powers, and as is proper, has given the defendant the right to remove it if he will erect another and give back to the plaintiff what he, by tearing down and removing the old wall, will take from the plaintiff. Thus, the surrender of what the plaintiff now has, and what it had theretofore bought of the defendant and now owns, possesses, and enjoys, is the consideration for requiring the defendant, if he takes down and removes the old wall, to erect a new one and give the plaintiff that right and interest in it which it owned, possessed, and enjoyed in the old wall at the time of its removal by the defendant. That is but equity, and is, I think, within the adjudged cases.

FRICK, J. (dissenting).—I regret my inability to agree with the conclusions reached by my associates. I cannot do so for the reason that, if the judgment in this case becomes the settled law in this jurisdiction, much unnecessary litigation as well as much injustice must inevitably result between the owners of adjoining buildings, one of which, as in this case, is made uninhabitable through its destruction by fire. My associates [102] base their conclusions entirely upon the one fact found by the court that the wall in question was not entirely destroyed by the fire, but that a portion sufficient for the purposes of respondent was left standing, although such portion is entirely useless as a wall for the proposed building which appellant intends to erect, or for a building similar to the one that was destroyed. It is conceded upon all sides that the wall in question stands entirely upon the land of appellant; that the respondent never had nor now has any interest in the soil on which the wall rests; and that, if it has any rights whatever, it is merely an easement in the remaining wall, and nothing more. It is also conceded that appellant's building was accidentally destroyed by fire, and that the remaining walls are wholly insufficient to support another building, and are therefore practically useless to him. My associates also concede, stating the fact in their own language:

"The authorities practically all agree that, where a party has acquired an easement of support in a party wall, the accidental destruction of the wall terminates the easement, and extinguishes all rights arising thereunder."

In view of this concession, so frankly stated, I need not refer to the authorities upon the subject. They, however, seek to exclude this case from the consequences stated above for the reason, they say, that the remaining wall is just as valuable and available as a support to its (respondent's) building as it was before the destruction of appellant Eccles' building. In this statement, therefore, is contained the theory upon which my associates approve the judgment of the court below. This theory in my judgment is wholly fallacious. By the enforcement of it the loss occasioned by the fire is placed wholly upon appellant, and the respondent is permitted to escape from the consequences thereof, although it is conceded that appellant's building, as such, and his walls for every purpose that he could use them for walls, are destroyed. Moreover, it is in effect held that, while respondent had a right or easement in the building that was destroyed by fire, it nevertheless has sustained no loss. From [103] such holding it follows that if the wall in question had suffered greater destruction, or if it had been entirely destroyed, then respondent's rights or easement thereunder would have been extinguished. From this I am authorized to assume that if respondent had been so unfortunate as to have its building destroyed by the fire in question, or by another, it would have lost all right to join another building to any new building that appellant might choose to erect, but since it had the good fortune not to lose all therefore it has lost nothing, and appellant must not only stand the whole loss, but in case he chooses to improve, and use his own property by erecting thereon a suitable building he must yield a portion thereof to the use of respondent without any consideration whatever. I say without consideration since it must be conceded that all respondent purchased was an easement in one of the walls of appellant's building, and when that building was destroyed the easement, in my judgment, was also destroyed. If this be true, how can respondent claim a right in an entirely different wall from that in which it purchased the easement? It seems to me that the fact which in my judgment is controlling is entirely overlooked. This fact is that respondent acquired an easement in a wall only while it was and continued to be a part of a building, and that when the wall from any cause over which the appellant had no control was so affected that it no longer was fit to support the building of which it was a part, so that the building ceased to exist, then the wall must also be held to have ceased to exist for the purposes of the easement. When, therefore, the building was destroyed, the wall for all practical purposes was also destroyed, and hence the easement in the language of my associates was extinguished.

If respondent desires to obtain an easement for all time in any building that appellant might erect in place of the old one, if that should be destroyed, it should have entered into a contract to that effect. Would any one familiar with the record in this case seriously contend that the respondent could have obtained what my associates now hold it did obtain [104] for the amount it paid for the alleged easement in the old wall, namely, an easement in a new wall which may continue for an indefinite period, or for so long as the building may last, and, if the old walls happen to continue to stand, that the easement would continue for all time?

But it is contended that, if respondent is not permitted to attach its building to the new one, it means a practical confiscation of its property rights in the remaining wall. This assumes that the respondent acquired a right in a wall which continued after it had been destroyed to such an extent that it could no longer be used as appellant's building, or as a part of any new one he might erect upon the ruins of the old. Respondent is thus given a right in a thing that has ceased to exist for the purposes contemplated by the parties when the easement was acquired, and has ceased to exist for every purpose except a pile of brick or stone and mortar which by accident, merely, is left large enough to answer the purpose of respondent, although it answers no other purpose whatever. The mere fact that the wall has to be removed by the wrecker, instead of having been consumed by the fire cannot change its character either as a matter of fact or as a matter of law. Nor can any amount of words make that a wall which merely constitutes the debris of a ruined building. Neither was it contemplated by the parties that it should be so. The fact that the respondent now claims that the wall is sufficient for its purpose is the result of mere accident and is not based upon any contractual rights. For the purposes of the easement the wall was destroyed when it no longer could be used as a part of appellant's building or as a part of any building he might choose to erect. Had appellant willfully destroyed the building, or torn it down for the purpose of erecting another, with the intention of preventing the respondent from using the wall, the conclusion reached by my brethren might be justified. Under the undisputed facts in this case the conclusion reached, in my judgment, is not only unsound, but it takes from one and gives to another that which the court has no right to take or grant. In my judgment adjoining owners [105] should be permitted to make their own arrangements, if they can, with respect to the rights one may obtain in the property of the other.

The judgment should therefore be reversed and the action dismissed.

NOTE.

Termination of Right to Maintenance of Party Wall.

It is well settled that in the absence of an agreement to rebuild a party wall its accidental destruction terminates the right of either adjoining owner to have it maintained as such. Antomarchi v. Russell, 63 Ala. 356, 35 Am. Rep. 40; Bonney v. Greenwood, 96 Me. 335, 52 Atl. 786; Hoffman v. Kuhn, 57 Miss. 746, 34 Am. Rep. 491 (buildings destroyed); Sherrad v. Cisco, 4 Sandf. (N. Y.) 480; Heartt v. Kruger, 121 N. Y. 386, 24 N. E. 841, 18 Am. St. Rep. 829, 9 L.R.A. 135, affirming 56 Super. Ct. 382, 5 N. Y. S. 192; Connelly v. Fish, 152 N. Y. S. 371; Fewell v. Kinsella (Tex.) 144 S. W. 1174 (wall torn down by order of city council); Hawkes v. Hoffman, 56 Wash. 120, 105 Pac. 156, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1038; Duncan v. Rodecker, 90 Wis. 1, 62 N. W. 533. See also Moore v. Shoemaker, 10 App. Cas. (D. C.) 6; Dowling v. Hennings, 20 Md. 179, 83 Am. Dec. 545; Partridge v. Gilbert, 15 N. Y. 601, 69 Am. Dec. 632, affirming 3 Duer 184; Odd Fellows' Hall Assoc. v. Hegele, 24 Ore. 16, 32 Pac. 679; Ebert v. Mishler, 234 Pa. St. 609, 83 Atl. 596. And see the reported case. In Sherrad v. Cisco, supra, the court said: "The parties being confessedly restrained from destroying the wall without mutual consent, how is it when the wall has been destroyed by the elements? The lands on each side are vacant. The agreement upon which the party wall was built related to that wall only. There was no agreement to build a second wall, or to build houses a second time, in the event that the original wall, and the houses which it supported, should be destroyed. . . . It might well have occurred to them, that if the buildings were destroyed, one or the other might not wish to rebuild; or that one might desire to erect a very strong warehouse for heavy goods, requiring thick walls, and the other a private dwelling, with a wall only half as thick. But without pursuing the views which parties may well be supposed to entertain, on their attention being called to the event of a total destruction of the building they are about to erect on a party wall, it suffices to say, that when two owners of adjoining city lots unite in building two stores with a party wall, we have no right to infer, from that act, an agreement binding upon them and their heirs and assigns to the end of time, to erect another like party wall at their mutual expense, when that one is casually destroyed, and so on, as often as the new one shares the same fate."

So it has been held that an adjoining owner who rebuilds a party wall which stands one-half on his land and one-half on the adjoining owner's land, cannot compel his neighbor to pay part of the cost of reconstructing the wall. Antomarchi v. Russell, 63 Ala. 356, 35 Am. Rep. 40; Sherrad v. Cisco, 4 Sandf. (N. Y.) 480. See also Partridge v. Gilbert, 15 N. Y. 601, 69 Am. Dec. 632, affirming 3 Duer 184; Hawkes v. Hoffman, 56 Wash. 120, 105 Pac. 156, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1038. Compare Campbell v. Mesier, 4 John. Ch. (N. Y.) 334. And where one of the adjoining owners rebuilds a party wall which stands on the property of both; the other owner may bring an action of ejectment to recover his portion of the ground which is occupied by the wall. Heartt v. Kruger, 121 N. Y. 386, 24 N. E. 841, 18 Am. St. Rep. 829, 9 L.R.A. 135, affirming 56 Super. Ct. 382, 5 N. Y. S. 192; Connelly v. Fish, 152 N. Y. S. 371.

It has been held that no agreement will be inferred on the part of adjoining owners to rebuild a destroyed party wall which stood partly on the land of each merely because originally it had been built jointly by them. Antomarchi v. Russell, 63 Ala. 356, 35 Am. Rep. 40; Sherrad v. Cisco, 4 Sandf. (N. Y.) 480. But in Huck v. Flentye, 80 Ill. 258, wherein the doctrine of the reported case was approved, an implied agreement to contribute to the cost of erecting a party wall was found in the fact that both owners of adjoining lands erected connecting buildings at the same time, and the owner who was asked to contribute to the cost of the party wall which the other had built had full knowledge that it was being constructed.
